

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

ANN. CAS.

1918 B.

BACON

REICHELT ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—February 16, 1916.

272 Ill. 90; 111 N. E. 565.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Parties.

The decree in a mechanic's lien foreclosure suit, to which B. was a party defendant, under Mechanic's Lien Act (Hurd's Rev. St. 1913, c. 82, § 25), § 11, as a person having a claim to the premises, that R. was the owner of the premises in fee simple, and that W. was entitled to a lien thereon, and ordering sale of the premises free of all claims of the parties, is conclusive between the parties as to the matters actually determined, and to every other thing within the knowledge of the parties which might have been set up as ground for relief or defense, and is a bar to subsequent suit by B., based on the fact, known by him at the time of the lien suit, that R. had bought the premises with money embezzled by him from B., to have it decreed that the land was held in trust for B., and for that reason to have issuance of deed on sale under the decree in the lien suit enjoined.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cook county:
BALDWIN, Judge.

Action by Edward R. Bacon, plaintiff, against Otto E. Reichelt et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Moses, Rosenthal & Kennedy, Walter Bachrach and Sigmund W. David for appellant.

Simon LeGrou, S. C. Irving and Emory D. Frazer for appellees.

Ann. Cas. 1918B.—1.

[91] DUNN, J.—The circuit court of Cook county dismissed for want of equity, upon a hearing, the appellant's bill of complaint, the relief sought by which was a decree declaring certain real estate to have been purchased by the appellee Otto E. Reichelt with the money of the appellant and to be held in trust for the benefit of the appellant, and to enjoin the execution of a deed by a master in chancery upon a sale of such real estate made under a decree in proceedings for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien.

The facts claimed by the appellant and found by the master are, that Otto E. Reichelt, in the years 1910, 1911 and 1912, was in the employ of the appellant and through a series of forgeries and embezzlements appropriated $24,329.60 of the appellant's money, with a part of which he purchased and obtained the title to the real estate in controversy. The appellant discovered Reichelt's fraudulent appropriation of his money in April, 1912, and on May 14, 1912, began an action of assumpsit in the circuit court of Cook county against Reichelt for the money so misappropriated and caused an attachment in aid to be levied on the real estate in controversy. The cause was tried, and on July 11, 1914, a judgment was rendered in favor of the [92] plaintiff on the issue in assumpsit but against him on the attachment issue, and the writ of attachment was dismissed. An appeal was taken by the plaintiff and is still pending in the Appellate Court. On May 14, 1912, Reichelt conveyed the premises by warranty deed to the defendant John W. Barker for the purpose of indemnifying Barker as bail for Reichelt on an indictment which had been returned against the latter, and in March, 1914, Reichelt executed a trust deed of the premises to the defendant Andrew J. Redmond for the purpose of securing his promissory note for $6,000, payable to and indorsed by himself, for the purpose of securing the attorneys' fees and expenses of the defendants Andrew J. Redmond, B. A. Dunlap and Simon La Grou while acting as attorneys for Reichelt. The defendant Emil Wetzel was engaged in the wire and iron works business, and prior to May 12, 1912, erected upon and around the real estate in question an iron fence for Reichelt, for which the latter was indebted to Wetzel in the sum of $1595.20, for which Wetzel filed a bill in the circuit court of Cook county to establish and foreclose his mechanic's lien. The appellant, as well as Reichelt, was made a defendant and answered, admitting Reichelt's ownership of the premises prior to April 24, 1912, but filed no cross-bill, though he had then knowledge of all the facts upon which the present bill is founded. The mechanic's lien proceeding was referred to a master, and in the taking of testimony it was stipulated on the part of appellant that on April 24, 1912, and prior thereto, Reichelt was the owner in fee simple of the premises in controversy and that the interest of appellant in such premises arose under an attachment suit filed by him against Reichelt, in which a levy had been made upon the interest of Reichelt in the premises. The master made a report, in accordance with which a decree was entered, finding, among other things, that Reichelt was the owner of the premises in fee simple; that the appellant's interest arose by virtue of the attachment suit; that Wetzel [93] was entitled to a lien on the premises for $1595.20 and costs, and ordering a sale of the premises free of all claim, title and interest of the parties to the cause. Under this decree the master sold the premises on January 31, 1914, to Wetzel for the sum of $1800. At the time Wetzel erected the fence on the premises he had no knowledge of the manner in which Reichelt had acquired title to the premises or of the appellant's rights in them, if any, but before his purchase under the decree he was informed of Reichelt's defalcation and of the manner in which he had obtained the title. No redemption has been made from the master's sale. After the expiration of twelve months and before the expiration of fifteen months from the date of the sale Wetzel sold the certificate of sale to the defendant Redmont, who purchased for the benefit of himself, La Grou and Dunlap with money obtained by means of a loan from the defendant Reinhold Anders, to whom the certificate of sale was delivered, with the understanding that he was to have a first mortgage on the premises for his loan as soon as a master's deed was obtained therefor.

The appellant was a defendant to the proceeding to enforce the mechanic's lien, and under the statute had a right to redeem the premises at any time within twelve months from the sale. He had no right, under the statute, to redeem at any later time. He was properly made a defendant to the proceeding under the Mechanic's Lien act, section 7 of which requires all parties interested to be made defendants, and declares that parties in interest, within the meaning of the act, shall include "all persons who may have any legal or equitable claim to the whole or any part of the premises upon which a lien may be attempted to be enforced under the provisions thereof, or who are interested in the subject matter of the suit." It was the duty of the appellant to set up in that proceeding his interest in the premises, and the decree in that case is conclusive upon him, not only as to the issues which were actually made and [94] determined in the case, but also as to every matter which was properly involved and which might have been raised and determined. A prior adjudication between the same parties is conclusive upon them, not only as to the matters actually determined, but as to every other thing within the knowledge of the parties which might have been set up as a ground for relief or defense. Ruegger v. Indianapolis, etc. R. Co. 103 Ill. 449; Rogers v. Higgins, 57 Ill. 244; Hamilton v. Quimby, 46 Ill. 90; Roby v. Calumet, etc. Canal, etc. Co. 165 Ill. 277, 46 N. E. 214.

The object of the mechanic's lien proceeding was to adjudicate the amount due the complainant and have the interest of the defendant Reichelt in the premises sold for the payment of that amount. The statute provides that whatever right or estate the owner had in the land at the time of making the contract may be sold in the same manner as other sales of real estate are made under decrees in chancery. At the time of making the contract Reichelt appeared to be the owner in fee simple of the premises. That was the title to which the lien of Wetzel attached and it was that title which he had a right to have sold for the payment of his claim. Subsequent conveyances were made and subsequent liens accrued, but they did not affect the prior right of Wetzel to have the premises sold. They were all subject to the priority of his claim. Each one of the parties to the suit was required to set up everything within his knowledge which might constitute a ground for relief or defense. Wetzel had a right to a decree for the sale of the premises, unincumbered. Nothing effecting that right was set up in the answers filed and he obtained such a decree. His right, or the right of any other person to purchase, was not affected by knowledge of equities acquired subsequent to the accruing of his right. The master's sale was of the title in fee simple, free of any right or interest of any of the parties to the suit, and the purchaser acquired the title free of any right of redemption or of any right [95] to the property by reason of its having been purchased by Reichelt with the appellant's funds which Reichelt had embezzled or otherwise unlawfully obtained.

The decree of the circuit court was right and it will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

I. Introductory.

The lien of a mechanic or materialman on buildings and land, while recognized by the civil law (1 Domat, § 174) and by the Code Napoleon (Art. 2103, § 2) was unknown either at common law or in equity (18 R. C. L. p. 872). The proceeding for its enforcement is therefore in the nature of a statutory special proceeding. (18 R. C. L. p. 982.) The necessity or propriety of joining particular parties, when not fixed by the terms of the statute, is to be determined on the basis of the fundamental principle that no property right can be divested without notice and hearing, and hence the general rule is that in a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien all persons interested in the property to which the lien attaches must be made parties. See the cases cited throughout this note. In jurisdictions wherein the distinction between law and equity is preserved proceedings to foreclose a mechanic's lien are said to be equitable in their nature (18 R. C. L. p. 978) and the same rule as to parties has been declared as the result of the application of equitable principles. Thus, in Lombard v. Johnson, 76 Ill. 599, the court said:

"A proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien is, in effect, a suit in chancery, and the rules that govern causes in equity usually control cases instituted under the statute to enforce a mechanic's lien. The general rule in courts of equity, as to parties, is, that all persons materially interested in the subject-matter ought to be made parties to the suit, either as plaintiffs or defendants."

II. Plaintiffs.

1. IN GENERAL.

It has been held that only such persons as have a common interest may unite as parties plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Bush v. Connelly, 33 Ill. 447; Harch v. Morgan, 1 Kan. 293; Rockwood v. Walcott, 3 Allen (Mass.) 458; Perry v. Swanner, 150 N. C. 141, 63 S. E. 611; Oldfield v. Barbour, 12 Ont. Pr. 554. Compare Barber v. Reynolds, 33 Cal. 497, id. 44 Cal. 519.

Thus in Oldfield v. Barbour, supra, it appeared that the plaintiffs, four carpenters, had worked for the contractor in erecting a building. They each filed their liens and thereafter brought a joint action to enforce the same. It was held that while each could bring an action in his own name they had no right to unite in one action. The court said: "These four men have each a claim against Barbour—not any joint claim of the four—and each can and should sue him for it in the division court. If they cannot maintain their mechanic's lien that has been filed, they cannot maintain any joint action."

So in Bush v. Connelly, 33 Ill. 447, the court said: "The complainants by their own showing have no community of interest in the subject-matter of the suit. Their interests have been severed by the settlement of the building accounts, and the indebtedness distributed among the contractors, and separate notes executed to the separate parties for the respective amounts due. By the complainants' own showing, Eller has no interest in the note executed to Bush & Benhart, nor have they any interest in the note executed to Eller. They are separate and independent claims, and should have been sued for separately. No joint interest is shown, and consequently, the demurrer should have been sustained. Sutherland v. Ryerson, 24 Ill. 517. The parties here do not show they are jointly entitled to a lien on the premises, but the contrary."

Compare Rockwood v. Walcott, 3 Allen (Mass.) 458, wherein it appeared that Rockwood and one Dickinson who were not general partners, undertook jointly to perform labor for the defendants. Thereafter they joined in an action to foreclose their lien. During the pendency of the action Dickinson died. It was held that Rockwood could maintain the action in his own name and as the surviving partner of Dickinson.

In Fischer v. Hanna, 8 Colo. App. 471, 47 Pac. 303, it was held that one who superintended the erection of a building had a right to intervene as a party plaintiff in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien on the building. The court said: "It is contended by appellant that the allegations in the petition do not bring the intervenor within the provisions of the statute as entitled to a lien. The statute provides a lien for 'whoever shall do any work. . . . For the purposes of this act the term "work" shall be deemed to include labor of every kind, whether skilled or unskilled.' I see no good reason why the superintendence of the construction of a building is not within the statute without a special designation. It is certainly work and labor. . . . The language of the statute is clear and comprehensive, and includes all persons who perform labor, whether skilled or unskilled. The person superintending the construction performs labor as truly as the mason who lays the wall."

As a general proposition the known members of a partnership which furnishes labor or materials for the erection of a building, are proper parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Roberts v. Gates, 64 Ill. 374; Lombard v. Johnson, 76 Ill. 599; Goble v. Gale, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 218, 41 Am. Dec. 219 (dormant partner not necessary party); Sharon Town Co. v. Morris, 39 Kan. 377, 18 Pac. 230 (one partner may sue for partnership); Kleinert v. Knoop, 147 Mich. 387, 110 N. W. 941; Holmes v. Shands, 27 Miss. 40; Jones v. Hurst, 67 Mo. 568; Hammersmith v. Hilton, 8 Mo. App. 564; Davis v. Church, 1 Watts & S. (Pa.) 240 (surviving partner may bring action in his own name).

In Jones v. Hurst, 67 Mo. 568, it appeared that the plaintiff in conjunction with his partner had performed work and furnished materials on the property of the defendant. Thereafter the plaintiff's partner assigned to the former his share of the interest in the lien against the defendant's property. It was held that the plaintiff's assignor was not a necessary party to the action to foreclose the lien. The court said: "In addition to being the assignee of his copartner's interest, Embree was a joint owner of the debt, and an original party to the contract, and as such partner and contractor he had an undoubted right to use the firm name to perfect the lien. The statement constituting the lien recites a contract with, and an indebtedness to, the firm, and, though sworn to by Embree alone, is in all respects sufficient as a lien filed by the firm. The statute provides that the account filed may be verified by the contractor himself, or by some credible person for him. 2 Wag. Stat. p. 909, § 5. The recital therein that the debt had been assigned to Embree, and that he alone was entitled to the benefit of the lien, is mere surplusage, and does not alter its effect or impair its value. Nor will the fact that the lien was filed in the name of the firm after the assignment to Embree of his copartner's interest affect the validity of the lien."

In Lombard v. Johnson, 76 Ill. 599, it appeared that the defendant had purchased from the plaintiffs certain building materials, and had obtained from them labor and services. The plaintiffs were partners at the time of the purchase. An action to foreclose the lien for the goods sold was thereafter brought in the name of the two partners composing the firm. It was held that both partners were proper parties plaintiff. The court said: "In this case, while the contract was made in the name of one of the appellees, yet it was made for the benefit of both. One was as much interested therein as the other, and, under the chancery practice, it was proper to file the bill in the name of both, and the contract was properly admitted in evidence. From this it follows that the proof admitted by the court that the work was done by Johnson & Epling was proper, and the second position relied upon is not well taken."

But in Roberts v. Gates, 64 Ill. 374, it appeared that one of the plaintiffs had furnished to the defendant materials to be used in the erection of a building. Thereafter, and while the building was nearing completion, the plaintiffs entered into a partnership for a future business. Before the building was completed the partnership furnished a small proportion of the material used. It was held that the partner who as an individual furnished the material from the beginning, was the only proper party plaintiff. The court said: "Upon no principle can this decree be sustained. The goods were furnished under an express contract with one person, and the formation of the partnership gave to the incoming partner no lien by virtue of the contract. Upon the allegations of the petition no joint lien was created, and the court had no power to declare a lien in favor of the partners. It may be that, after the partnership, both petitioners were equally interested in the goods then delivered, but this equal interest alone could not make a lien, and only the persons who have a lien are entitled to the benefit of the statute. The principle, that all persons interested in the subject-matter should be made parties, has no application to this case. To entitle a person to be a petitioner, he must not only have an interest, but a lien within the purview of the statute."

2. ACTION BY ASSIGNEE OF LIEN.

In some jurisdictions it is expressly provided by statute that a mechanic's lien may be assigned and that the assignee may bring an action in his own name to foreclose the lien; and by the weight of authority the assignor is not a necessary party to the foreclosure proceedings. Davis v. Billsland, 18 Wall. 659, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 969; Pensacola R. Co. v. Schaffer, 76 Ala. 233; Barnett v. Wright, 116 Ark. 44, 172 S. W. 254; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Batchen, 6 Ill. App. 621; Friedman v. Roderick, 20 Ill. App. 622; Moore v. Dugan, 179 Mass. 153, 60 N. E. 488; Tuttle v. Howe, 14 Minn. 145, 100 Am. Dec. 205; Peters v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 24 Mo. 586; Goff v. Papin, 34 Mo. 177; Jones v. Hurst, 67 Mo. 588; McCormick v. Lawton, 3 Neb. 449; Rogers v. Omaha Hotel Co. 4 Neb. 54; Hoagland v. Van Etten, 31 Neb. 292, 47 N. W. 920; Skyrme v. Occidental Mill, etc. Co. 8 Nev. 219; Hallahan v. Herbert, 57 N. Y. 409, 11 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 336 (assignor may sue for benefit of assignee); Williams v. Deutscher Verein, 14 N. Y. S. 368; Williams v. Edison Electric Illuminating Co. 16 N. Y. S. 857; Shannon v. McDuffee, 2 Pa. Dist. 230; Oliver v. Fowler, 22 S. C. 534; Austin, etc. R. Co. v. Daniels, 62 Tex. 73; House v. Schulze, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 243, 52 S. W. 654 (one claimant may, by assignment, sue for himself and on claim of others); Iaegre v. Bossieux, 15 Grat. (Va.) 83, 76 Am. Dec. 189; Pairo v. Bethell, 75 Va. 825 (assignors, while not necessary, are proper parties); Harrington v. Miller, 4 Wash. 808, 31 Pac. 325. See also Dye v. Forbes, 34 Minn. 13, 24 N. W. 309; Kerr v. Moore, 54 Miss. 286. See also Brown v. Harper, 4 Ore. 89. Compare Fitzgerald v. Port Huron First Presb. Church, 1 Mich. (N. P.) 243.

In Pensacola R. Co. v. Schaffer, 76 Ala. 233, it appeared that the Pensacola Railroad Company, entered into a contract with one Beuz by which the latter undertook to erect a building for the former. Beuz later abandoned the work, and with the consent of the defendant assigned his rights under the contract to Schaffer, the plaintiff. Schaffer completed the work and thereafter brought an action in his own name to foreclose his lien. It was held that Beuz was not a necessary party to the action.

In Tuttle v. Howe, 14 Minn. 145, 100 Am. Dec. 205, the court said: "We can conceive of no reason in the nature of things why an assignment of the debt or account, and the lien, such as was made in this case, should not be valid, so that the assignee can enforce the lien in his own name. The claim of the materialman and the lien are certainly the property of the materialman, and why should he not have the right to dispose of both? There is nothing in the lien right of the nature of a personal trust. The lienholder is not intrusted with the possession of the property bound by the lien. His lien is a security. What difference can it make to the lienor who holds the lien? His duty is to pay the debt. If he pays it his property is discharged. If he fails to pay it, and so loses the property, of what moment is it to him whether the lien is enforced by the materialman or by his assignee?"

In Harrington v. Miller, 4 Wash. 808, 31 Pac. 325, it was said: "Actions to enforce liens of mechanics and materialmen are equitable in their nature, and the procedure is the same as governs in the foreclosure of mortgages on real estate. See Gen. Stat. § 1677; Washington Iron-Works v. Jensen, 3 Wash. 584, 28 Pac. 1019; Fox v. Nachtsheim, 3 Wash. 684, 29 Pac. 141. The principle is well established that a mortgagor of real estate who has sold and conveyed his equity of redemption is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose the mortgage, where no personal judgment is sought against him. Stevens v. Campbell, 21 Ind. 471; Story's Equity Pleading (6th ed.) § 197; 2 Jones on Mortgages, 1404. And the same rule applies in the foreclosure of liens. The object of the action is to affect the property, not the debt, and after assignment the assignor has no longer any interest in the property to be affected, and is not a necessary party under the rule that all persons interested in the subject-matter in controversy should be made parties, either as plaintiff or defendant."

But in Fitzgerald v. Port Huron First Presb. Church, 1 Mich. (N. P.) 243, the court said: "The statute under which this proceeding is commenced is a special and peculiar one, and must be strictly construed and as strictly pursued. It in distinct terms gives the lien to the contractor or subcontractor, and makes it personal to them, and to none other. The contractor or subcontractor are alone authorized to file a petition, and this right cannot be extended to an assignee. There are no words in the statute in any way implying that such lien may be held or enforced by an assignee, and in this case it seems to have been so understood when Marshall made his certificate of lien five months ago after the assignment to Fitzgerald, and only a few days before the petition was filed. In that certificate he states that there is then due to him the $1,199 previously assigned to Fitzgerald, and says: 'I claim a lien upon said lots and appurtenances for the sums aforesaid.' This claim was not, on its face, for the benefit of Fitzgerald, but was personal to Marshall. Fitzgerald files no certificate of claim of lien, but depends on Marshall's claim. The claim made by Marshall cannot inure to Fitzgerald's benefit."

To the same effect see Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Batchen, 6 Ill. App. 621, wherein the court said: "But we think the lien given by the statute to a mechanic or materialman is so far a personal right that the proceeding to establish it, even if the right itself should be held to be assignable in equity, should be carried on in the name of the assignor rather than that of the assignee. Whether a mechanic's lien is assignable at all, is a question upon which the authorities are far from being harmonious. In Cairo, etc. R. Co. v. Fackney, 78 Ill. 116, the supreme court of this state expresses a grave doubt as to whether the liens given by the statute upon the property of railway companies are susceptible of assignment. In other states, courts of the highest respectability have held that mechanics' liens are not assignable so as to enable the assignee to prosecute, in his own name, suits to establish and enforce them."

III. Defendants.

1. PRINCIPAL CONTRACTOR.

The great weight of authority is that the principal or original contractor is a necessary party defendant to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien and that the lien cannot be enforced without making him a party unless the owner waives his right to have him joined.

In American Radiator Co. v. Connor Plumbing, etc. Co. (Mo.) 184 S. W. 907, the court said: "By force of section 8233 of the statute (as well as by the necessity of the situation between the owner, contractor, subcontractor, materialman, and laborer), it is made the duty of the contractor in lien actions, other than his own, to defend them at his own expense; and the owner may deduct the amount of the judgment lien against his property from what he may owe such contractor; or, if he has paid him, that he may have recourse against him. . . . From these considerations it is clear that, in fairness to all concerned, the contractor should be bound by the judgment rendered, and, since he will not be bound if not a party, it becomes necessary, unless waived, to make him a party defendant."

In Griffin v. Gaineaville Iron Works, 144 Ga. 840, Ann. Cas. 1917D 994, 88 S. E. 201, L.R.A. 1916F 216, it was held that in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien the principal contractor is a necessary party defendant and that, therefore, the plaintiff cannot recover against the owner of the premises the value of the material furnished, unless the principal contractor is personally served with a summons. The court said: "The facts in the case of Clayton v. Farrar Lumber Co. 119 Ga. 37, 45 S. E. 723, were substantially similar to those of the present case, and it was there ruled: 'In a suit to foreclose a lien on real estate, for materials furnished to a contractor and used by him in improving said real estate, the contractor is a necessary party; and where no process is prayed against such contractor, though he may be referred to in the petition as one of the defendants, and though the clerk annexes a process against "the defendants" generally, he is not thereby made a party, and a demurrer setting up these objections should be sustained.'"

In Estey v. Hallack, etc. Lumber Co. 4 Colo. App. 165, 34 Pac. 1113, it was held that since the principal contractor is an indispensable party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien a failure to make him a party cannot be waived. The court said: "It is claimed that by proceeding to trial without urging and relying upon the want of the contractor as a necessary party the irregularity was waived. In such cases there can be no waiver. A judgment against the contractor is an indispensable prerequisite to a lien upon the property. The owner and subcontractors cannot adjudicate and settle the accounts and equities between the contractor and the subcontractors, nor can they adjudicate and adjust claims and matters between the owner and the contractor. In one case the owner and contractor are the contracting parties, in the other the contractor and subcontractors. The right to the lien is purely statutory, is subsidiary and contingent, dependent upon the enforcing the judgment against the contractor. The owner is not primarily liable—hence the indispensable necessity of the contractor being before the court as a party to a triangular adjudication, and the necessity, primarily, of a judgment against the contractor as a basis of proceedings against the property of the owner."

In Davis v. John Mouat Lumber Co. 2 Colo. App. 381, 31 Pac. 187, the court said: "The initial question naturally presented in the order of events concerns the parties to the suit and the method by which they have been brought into court. Our statute lacks the definite direction which some enactments contain that all persons in interest, including owners, contractors and lienors, shall be made parties. But the essential character of the suit, the indebtedness upon which the right to a lien rests, and the general provision concerning the entry of judgment, as clearly as the definite direction of the other acts, require the presence of the contractor in a suit by the materialman to recover for that which he has furnished. However true it may be that the principal purpose of that suit is to enforce the lien against the property and thereby recover the debt due from the contractor, it is as equally certain that that debt is the foundation of the action, and unless it exists, and is then enforceable, the incidental right to enforce the lien cannot prevail. Many of the cases which have passed upon the question, put their decisions upon the ground that the inquiry necessarily involves the contract relations and state of accounts existing between the contractor and the one seeking to enforce the lien; that without the establishment of that debt there can be right of recovery by the subcontractor, and his right to a lien is dependent upon the establishment of his claim or debt against the contractor. With this, say the authorities, the owner has nothing to do, and the burden of establishing that claim is put by the law upon him who brings the suit and seeks the relief. On this broad general basis, regardless of the statute, it has been often held that the contractor was an indispensable party to the action. With this view we agree, and adjudge that the contractor is not only a proper, but a necessary and indispensable party, against whom a debt must be established as the foundation of the decree for the foreclosure of the lien. . . . While the statute does not directly require that the contractor shall be a party to the suit, it undoubtedly provides for a judgment in his favor against the party personally liable for the claim, to be followed by a decree in his favor against the property to the betterment of which his material has gone. It was within the evident contemplation of the legislature that the original promisor should be a party to the suit, and that a judgment against him should precede a decree against the owner, who would probably be entitled to compel the collection of the personal judgment if he could show assets belonging to the contractor before the one holding the derivative right, and proceeding in invitum could take his land in payment of the debt. At all events the reasons for the presence of the original debtor are so conclusive that in the absence of any statute it should be adjudged necessary to bring that debtor before the court prior to the entry of any decree against the owner of the land."

In Casey Mfg. Co. v. Viaduct Place, 1 Ga. App. 707, 58 S. E. 274, it was held that a materialman could not enforce his lien against the owner of the premises, because the principal contractor had been discharged in bankruptcy. The latter, who was a necessary party to the action, could not, because of the discharge, be joined in the action nor could the owner be sued alone.

In Giant Powder Co. v. San Diego Flume Co. 78 Cal. 193, 20 Pac. 419, the court said: "It has been the constant and uniform practice ever since we had a lien law in this state for the benefit of materialmen and others, in actions for the foreclosure of such liens, to make the owner and contractor parties defendant, and to unite a personal action against the contractor for the money, with the action to establish the lien and for its foreclosure against the owner. The practice is much to be commended, in that it prevents a multiplicity of suits, and thus saves labor and expense. If each materialman or person performing labor on a building had to bring separate actions against the contractor for the recovery of his money, it is manifest the expense of the litigation would be greatly increased. This constant and uniform procedure continued for so long a time is strongly persuasive that the practice is correct. . . . The person personally liable for the debt in the case of materialmen would usually be the contractor, though sometimes the owner might be, as the purchaser himself of the materials. When the contractor is personally liable for the debt, the section 1194 of the Code of Civil Procedure, just referred to, authorizes his being made a defendant along with the owner, and a determination in such action of the amount for which he is liable to each lienholder, and in case of deficiency above pointed out, a docketing of the judgment against him for such deficiency as he may be personally liable for. As this could not be done without his being made a defendant, the law must authorize his being made a defendant. We have no doubt from the provisions of sections 1193, 1194, and 1195 that it was the intent of the lawmakers that in an action to enforce a lien under this statute, all the persons claiming liens under the statute, including the contractor and owner, should be made parties, so that there might be a complete determination of all matters in controversy between the materialmen and other lienholders, the owner and the contractor, and in this point of view, the contractor is a necessary party; and if he was not made a party, the court should order him to be made a defendant, that there might be a full and complete determination of the matters in controversy." But see Green v. Clifford, 94 Cal. 49, wherein the court said: "We do not know of any law which makes the contractor a necessary party, so far, at least, as the rights of the owner of the building are concerned. . . . Graham (the contractor) was certainly not a necessary party to the actions brought to enforce liens for labor and materials furnished after the abandonment of his contract."

In Brace, etc. Mill Co. v. Burbank, 87 Wash. 356, Ann. Cas. 1917E 739, it appeared that the owner of the premises did not require the plaintiff to make the principal contractor a party defendant until the close of the trial. It was held that the owner had waived his right to request that the principal contractor should be made a party. The court said: "We are not prepared to say that the owner, under some circumstances, might not rightfully insist upon the contractor being made a defendant, but it is not reversible error for the trial court to proceed to final judgment of foreclosure, in the absence of such request until the close of the trial. This view finds abundant support in the authorities, and we think must necessarily be correct in the light of our statute. Crawfordsville v. Barr, 65 Ind. 367; Russ Lumber, etc. Co. v. Garrettson, 87 Cal. 589, 25 Pac. 747; Osborn v. Logus, 28 Ore. 302, 37 Pac. 456, 38 Pac. 190, 42 Pac. 997; 27 Cyc. 356. Our decision in James v. Brainard, 64 Wash. 175, 116 Pac. 633, is in harmony with this view, though that case involved the foreclosure of a mortgage. We conclude that the Modern Bungalow Company, as contractor, was not a necessary party to the foreclosure of these liens, and that, in any event, appellants waived whatever right they had to insist upon the Bungalow Company being made a defendant, by their silence on that question until the close of the trial."

In Leeper v. Myers, 10 Ind. App. 314, 37 N. E. 1070, it appeared that a materialman furnished materials to the principal contractor, who had been engaged by the owner of the premises to repair the same. Thereafter the parties agreed among themselves that the owner would pay to the materialman the debt of the contractor. It was held that the contractor was not a necessary party to an action to foreclose the materialman's lien. The court said: "In this case there was a settlement between all of the parties. It was mutually agreed between appellant, appellees and Pollock that appellant should become the debtor to appellees, and that in consideration thereof their debt against Pollock should be released. The old debt against Pollock was extinguished, and appellant was substituted as a new debtor for Pollock. If, as is alleged, the amount due and owing from appellant to Pollock was settled and determined, and if Pollock was owing the same amount to appellees, and, under such circumstances, it was mutually agreed between all of the parties that appellant should pay the amount she owed Pollock to appellees, and appellees, in consideration of such agreement, released Pollock from liability, there was no necessity for making Pollock a party to this action."

In Emmet v. Rotary Mill Co. 2 Minn. 286, the court said: "Where there is an intermediate contractor to whom the credit is given, it is all important that he should be the party to an action for materials furnished him, as he alone can be presumed to know about the correctness of the claim made, or the proper defense to make, should any exist. The owner of the property may know nothing of either, and would not therefore be in a condition to defend his property against even an illegal demand. He may even have paid the contractor in full, according to the terms of the contract, before notice of any claim by a subcontractor. Justice to the owner, therefore, requires that the subcontractor should first exhaust his remedy against his immediate debtor, the contractor, before resorting to the owner and compelling him to pay, perhaps, a second time. Besides, a judgment against the owner in an action by the subcontractor would not be conclusive on the intermediate contractor, and the owner would be driven to another action against him to recover the amount he has been obliged to pay, and might, in such action, recover less than the amount of the judgment against himself."

In Rumsey, etc. Co. v. Pieffer, 108 Mo. App. 486, 83 S. W. 1027, it appeared that a subcontractor furnished materials for the erection of a building at the request of another subcontractor. Thereafter he brought an action to foreclose his lien. He joined as parties defendant the owners of the property and the other subcontractor but left out the principal contractor. A statute of Missouri provided that in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien all the necessary parties must be served with process within ninety days from the accrual of the right of action. After the time expired the plaintiff sought to make the principal contractor a party. It was held that he could not do so.

In Hilton Bridge Constr. Co. v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 390, 40 N. E. 86, the court said: "This case arises under the Mechanic's Lien Law, and it is an action peculiar to itself and one in which we think it proper that the contractor should be brought in where the plaintiff's cause of action depends upon the payments made by the owner to the contractor before they were due under the terms of the contract."

In Kloeppinger v. Grasser, 25 Ohio Cir. Ct. 90, it appeared that the principal contractor had assigned his rights to a subcontractor.

It was held that in an action by another subcontractor to enforce a mechanic's lien the principal contractor was not a necessary party.

In Cooper Mfg. Co. v. Delahunt, 36 Ore. 402, 51 Pac. 649, 60 Pac. 1, it was held that while the principal contractor is a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien he is not a necessary party to an appeal from a judgment in such an action where no personal judgment is asked against him. To the same effect see Hand Mfg. Co. v. Marks, 36 Ore. 623, 52 Pac. 612, 53 Pac. 1072, 59 Pac. 549.

In Warner v. Yates, 118 Tenn. 548, 102 S. W. 92, the court said: "Where the suit is brought by a subcontractor the principal contractor and the owner of the property upon which the lien is claimed must both be made parties defendant. The principal contractor is a necessary party, because he is the debtor sued, and the owner of the property, because it is sought to reach his or her property. They are both interested, and must have their day in court; otherwise, there would be a failure of due process of law. The principal contractor has the right to controvert the indebtedness claimed, and the owner of the property the existence of the lien sought to be enforced, and the action cannot be maintained." See also Slade v. Amarillo Lumber Co. (Tex.) 93 S. W. 475, wherein the court said: "It is the established practice in this class of cases to make not only the owners, but also the contractors parties, and no reason is perceived why the usual course should not be pursued in this case. They are undoubtedly proper parties, and at least some members of the court are inclined to the option that they are necessary parties."

In Massachusetts Bonding, etc. Co. v. Realty Trust Co. 142 Ga. 499, 83 S. E. 210, the owner of the premises brought an equitable action against the principal contractor and his surety, and also sought to restrain the materialmen from enforcing their liens against the contractor. It was held that in view of the fact that the principal contractor had absconded he was not a necessary party to the action to foreclose the materialmen's liens. The court said: "The present litigation was initiated by the landowner at a time when the materialmen could have come into court and foreclosed their liens. The owner of the premises undertook to bring the contractor before the court, and procured an order enjoining the materialmen from instituting any suit against the owner or its property, looking to the foreclosure of their liens, and that the whole matter should be settled in this litigation. The owner so tied the hands of the materialmen as to prevent an action outside of this litigation. It brought them into this litigation, and it does not lie in its mouth to say that they cannot obtain a judgment of foreclosure of their liens because they have not independently obtained a judgment against the contractor. They were enjoined from taking any steps looking to the foreclosure of their liens against the Realty Trust Company or its property. One of the necessary steps in a proceeding to foreclose that lien was to sue the contractor in an independent suit and obtain judgment, or to sue him concurrently with the owner of the premises. We therefore think that by the voluntary action of the realty company (the owner of the premises), requiring these materialmen to establish their liens in this litigation, it cannot contend that the contractor has not been personally served. The bond was given to furnish a security against the default of the contractor. It cannot be that if the contractor not only defaults but is without the jurisdiction, so as not to be personally served, the security is destroyed. Such construction would render a bond of this character a security in name only in a case like this. None of the decisions referred to by counsel are contrary to what is above stated."

In Kansas the courts have held that in an action by a subcontractor to foreclose a mechanic's lien he must give notice thereof to the principal contractor. Moreover he is liable in damages to the owner for his failure to do so. Tracy v. Kerr, 47 Kan. 656, 28 Pac. 707; Sash, etc. Co. v. Heiman, 65 Kan. 5, 68 Pac. 1080. Thus in Tracy v. Kerr, supra, the court said: "¶ 4738, General Statutes of 1889, provides: 'Where such action is brought by a subcontractor, or other person not the original contractor, such original contractor shall be made a party defendant, and shall at his own expense defend against the claim of every subcontractor, or other person claiming a lien under this act; and, if he fails to make such defense, the owner may make the same at the expense of such contractor; and until all such claims, costs and expenses are finally adjudicated and defeated, or satisfied, the owner shall be entitled to retain from the contractor the amount thereof, and such costs and expenses as he may be required to pay.' In view of the provisions of this section, it practically makes no difference whether we consider Kerr technically as a subcontractor, or one of the other persons claiming a lien under this act,' for the language is so plain, the command that the contractor be made a party so imperative, that requirement is so mandatory, and the result of a failure or refusal to make him a party is so specifically stated, that there seems to be no fair ground, either by construction or otherwise, on which to place approval of the ruling of the trial court. The provision in question is a just and equitable one for the owner of the building. He ought not to be required to litigate at his own expense all the differences that naturally and inevitably arise between the contractor and the men who furnish material to him, and those who are hired by the contractor to perform labor on the building. This provision was designed to relieve him from the trouble and expense of a litigation in which he has practically no interest. This provision, and the one that the owner shall not become liable to any claimant for any greater amount than he agreed to pay the original contractor, are designed for the protection of the owner of the land and building, and are deserving of such liberal interpretation as will best accomplish the intent of the legislature. It may be suggested that if the subcontractor, or other person not the original contractor, neglect or refuse to make the contractor a party, the owner may do so on his own motion, and while it is probably true that the trial court would permit or order this to be done, yet the plain command of the statute is, that the contractor shall be made a party, and we think it is primarily the duty of the party instituting such an action to do so. In this case Kerr was requested so to do and refused, and Tracy was compelled to assume the burden and to pay the expenses of a litigation that the legislature casts upon the contractor. He now seeks to recover the costs and expenses of such litigation from the assignee of the contractor. We think he cannot do this, for the evident reason that there is no showing in the record that Connacher ever had notice or knowledge of the pendency of the original action; but he has a cause of action against Kerr personally for the recovery of the costs and expenses necessarily incurred by him because of Kerr's wrongful institution of that action."

In Simonson Bros. Mfg. Co. v. Citizens' State Bank, 105 Ia. 264, 74 N. W. 905, it was held that while the principal contractor was a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien it was not necessary that he should be served personally with process. The court said: "The contention of appellee is that plaintiff's claim against Lofgren [the principal contractor] was purely personal, and that there can be no adjudication against him until the court has jurisdiction of his person, and that this cannot be acquired on service by publication. It would, indeed, be a singular defect in our law if a subcontractor, who has a right to a mechanic's lien, can be prevented from enforcing it by the absconding of the principal contractor. We have always regarded an action to enforce a mechanic's lien as in the nature of a foreclosure of a mortgage. Where no personal judgment is asked, it is strictly a proceeding in rem."

In New Home Lumber Co. v. Ryal (Okla.) 156 Pac. 637, it was held that while the principal contractor is a necessary party defendant to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, a materialman may enforce his rights against the property without obtaining a personal judgment against the principal contractor where it appears that process cannot be served on the latter.

It has been held that where the principal contractor is a firm consisting of several members all the members of the firm are necessary parties defendant to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. McDonald v. Backus, 45 Cal. 262; Snodgrass v. Holland, 6 Colo. 596. Compare Barnes v. Colorado Springs, etc. Dist. R. Co. 42 Colo. 461, 94 Pac. 570.

In Cohen v. Bernstein, 170 Ill. App. 113, it appeared that at the time the owner of the premises contracted for material and labor the principal contractor was a partnership composed of three members. Soon thereafter one of the partners severed his connection with the firm. The contract was then executed by the remaining two partners. They were treated by all persons concerned as the principal contractor. It was held that, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the retiring partner was not a necessary party. To the same effect see I. Lurya Lumber Co. v. Bernstein, 168 Ill. App. 85.

In New York it was held in two early cases that while the principal contractor is a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien the fact that he is not made a party is not a ground for the dismissal of the action. Foster v. Skidmore, 1 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 719; Lowber v. Childs, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 577, 1 Abb. Pr. 415. Apparently the rule is otherwise under later statutes. Lien Law, § 44, McKinney's Consol. Laws, Book 32, p. 118; Maneely v. New York, 119 App. Div. 376, 105 N. Y. S. 976; Maltby, etc. Co. v. Charles P. Boland Co. 152 App. Div. 596, 137 N. Y. S. 470.

2. OWNER.

a. In General.

By the weight of authority the owner of the premises against which a mechanic's lien is sought to be foreclosed is of course a necessary party, and no foreclosure may be had without joining him.

Canada.—Hovenden v. Ellison, 24 Grant Ch. (U. C.) 448.

In Hilliker v. Francisco, 65 Mo. 598, the plaintiff brought an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien against the principal contractor and the owner of the property. It was held that while the owner was not a necessary party, having been made a party he could prosecute an appeal from a judgment in the foreclosure proceedings.

In Hooper v. Flood, 54 Cal. 218, it was held that while the owner of the property was a necessary party defendant to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, his agent, who acted on his behalf in contracting for the work and materials furnished, was neither a necessary nor a proper party to the proceedings.

In San Juan, etc. Min. etc. Co. v. Finch, 6 Colo. 214, a proceeding to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the corporation which owned the property on which the lien attached was not served with process. It was held that the judgment against the corporation was void.

In Peabody v. Eastern Methodist Soc. 5 Allen (Mass.) 540, it was held that a mechanic could not maintain an action to foreclose a lien without making the owner a party defendant.

In Green v. Sanford, 34 Neb. 363, it appeared that at the time the mechanic performed labor and furnished materials the premises were occupied by one Nancy Dishong under a contract of purchase from Sanford, the owner of fee simple. The contract for materials was made by Jacob Dishong, husband of Nancy Dishong, acting as her agent. The mechanic did not know of the contract of purchase between Nancy Dishong and Sanford until long after he commenced an action to foreclose the lien against Jacob Dishong.

Thereafter she was made a party. Sanford was not made a party until after the expiration of the time allowed by statute within which to bring an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. It was held that inasmuch as Sanford, as owner of the property, was a necessary party to the proceeding he should have been joined in the action within the statutory period, and that plaintiff's failure to do so released him. The court said: "It also appears that Sanford was not made a party defendant until more than three years after the lien was filed. The legal title to the land being in Sanford, he was not only a proper but a necessary party to the proceeding to enforce the lien. The rule as to parties defendant in a mechanic's lien foreclosure is the same as in a suit for the foreclosure of a mortgage. Is the suit barred as to Sanford? The plaintiffs in error contend that the statute was complied with by the commencement of the proceeding to foreclose the lien against Jacob Dishong within the statutory two years, and that it was proper to bring in new parties after the expiration of that time. . . . It is manifest that the only way a mechanic's lien can be continued in force beyond the two years is by instituting a suit within that time to enforce the lien, and the plain meaning of the statute is that it is only preserved as to the persons who are made parties to the suit prior to the limitation of the time for the bringing of such an action. A person who is not party to a suit ordinarily is not bound by the adjudication, nor is a suit deemed commenced against one until he is made a party to it, and when, in an action to enforce a mechanic's lien, the plaintiff by amendment of his petition, as in the case at bar, brings in a new party after the limitation of two years has run, as to such new party the suit is barred. . . . So far as we are able to discover, all the authorities, with the single exception of Manly v. Downing [15 Neb. 687] supra, affirm the doctrine that where, after a suit has been commenced, a new defendant has been brought in after the expiration of the period limited by statute for bringing the action as to such defendant the suit is barred."

In Martens v. O'Neill, 131 App. Div. 123, 115 N. Y. S. 260, the plaintiff, a mechanic, instituted an action to foreclose a lien against the principal contractor. He also made the owner of the premises a party defendant but not until after the statute of limitations had barred his claim. It was held that the owner was discharged. The court said: "The owner of the premises and a contractor for work thereon are not joint contractors as to the subcontractor. (Phillips Mechanics' Liens [3d ed.] § 397.) And they are not 'otherwise united in interest.' The interest of the contractor is to defeat the claim, or to reduce it to the saving of his own claim against the owner. The interest of the owner is confined to see that the claim of the subcontractor rests upon a sum justly due from the owner to the contractor under their contract, inasmuch as the lien of the subcontractor attaches perforce of the owner's indebtedness to the contractor. . . . I am of opinion, then, that the service of the summons and complaint on the contractor was not a beginning of the action against the owner. As the plaintiff did not begin his action of foreclosure, or secure an order to continue it within one year from the time of filing his lien, the lien was discharged."

In McCoy v. Quick, 30 Wis. 521, the court referring to a failure to join the owner said: "The general rule of law is, that all persons having an interest in the subject-matter of an action, when the same is commenced, should be made parties thereto, and that none but parties and privies are concluded by the adjudication. This rule is so eminently reasonable and just, that no exceptions should be made to it unless clearly created by law."

In Snodgrass v. Holland, 6 Colo. 596, it appeared that the plaintiff had performed labor for the defendant and one Warwick, the latter's tenant in common. The plaintiff brought an action to foreclose his lien against the property owned by the defendant and Warwick was not made a party to the suit. It was held he was a necessary party. The court said: "The only question in issue upon the trial seems to have been as to the terms of the contract and the performance by Holland in doing the work and the proper amount due thereunder. Upon what ground the proceedings were dismissed as to Warwick in the county court, and for what reason he was not afterwards held to be a party defendant in the district court upon being ruled to show cause therefor, the record is silent. He was certainly, so far as this record discloses, a proper and necessary party defendant. He was a tenant in common of the premises, owning an undivided interest in fee thereto; that the contract was made on his behalf, as that of his cotenant Snodgrass, by his authority or sanction, does not appear to have been disputed, and the work done, from the very nature of it, inured to the benefit of both owners, and appears to have been so intended. And notwithstanding there was a judgment against Snodgrass personally for the amount found due, or what amounts to the same thing in that he was decreed to pay the same, the decree for the lien was not limited to the interest of Snodgrass therein, but was against the entire premises, directing a sale of the whole property in the event of nonpayment by Snodgrass. It is scarcely necessary to say that a judgment or decree cannot affect the estate of one who was not a party thereto, and in this proceeding a judgment could not be rendered against the property generally, and against but one of the owners thereof, in a right of action clearly against both jointly. . . . Upon the state of the case as presented by the record, we must hold that the district court erred in not making Warwick a party defendant to the proceedings therein. If, however, for any good reason not disclosed by this record, Warwick was not a necessary or proper party, then the decree for the lien on the premises should have been against the interest therein of Snodgrass alone."

b. Effect of Conveyance of Premises.

A grantee who is the owner of the premises at the time the action to foreclose a mechanic's lien is brought is a necessary party to the foreclosure action, and if he is not joined no judgment of foreclosure may be rendered. Harrison, etc. Iron Co. v. Council Bluffs City Water-Works Co. 25 Fed. 170; Burbank v. Wright, 44 Minn. 544, 47 N. W. 162; Clark v. Brown, 25 Mo. 559; Kling v. Railway Constr. Co. 4 Mo. App. (appendix) 574; Koenig v. Boehme, 14 Mo. App. 593; Robbins v. Burn, 34 N. J. L. 322; Gross v. Daly, 5 Daly (N. Y.) 540 (grantee in fraudulent conveyance may be made party); Garland v. Van Rensselaer, 71 Hun 2, 24 N. Y. S. 781; Bierschenk v. King, 38 App. Div. 360, 56 N. Y. S. 696 (intermediate grantee need not be joined); Cullers v. Greenville First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 29 S. W. 72 (purchaser who agreed to pay lien necessary party); Walter v. Dearing (Tex.) 65 S. W. 380 (owner at time lien attached necessary party); Rice v. Hall, 41 Wis. 453. Compare Boyle v. Robbins, 71 N. C. 130.

In Clark v. Brown, 25 Mo. 559, the court said: "It [mechanic's lien action] is essentially a proceeding in rem, that seeks to condemn the property to satisfy a legal claim against it. And, as there can be no general judgment against the original debtor, if he is absent or insolvent, or is indifferent about protecting his vendee, he may have neither motive nor interest to defend the suit, or may even be in collusion with the plaintiff; and, therefore, the plainest dictates of justice require that the real owner, whose property it is proposed to condemn to pay another's debt, should at least have the opportunity of being present to show that no lien lawfully exists against his property. . . . This proceeding was commenced by scire facias, and the proof shows that Blood was the purchaser from the defendant, with a recorded deed, not only before the suit was begun, but before the last of the materials were furnished, and in our opinion, no judgment could be rendered in the case without the presence of Blood on the record. If it be said that Brown owed the debt, and had no right to object to the judgment being rendered, it may be replied that he ought to have paid it, and the argument would be unanswerable, if the proceeding affected nobody but himself; but if the court had no authority, as the case stood, to render a judgment against Blood's property to pay Brown's debt, any party to the record had a right to object." Compare Schaeffer v. Lohman, 34 Mo. 68; Hilliker v. Francisco, 65 Mo. 598.

One who becomes the owner of premises after an action is instituted to foreclose a mechanic's lien thereon is not a necessary party. Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 547, 70 Am. Dec. 748; Hillyard v. Robbins, 53 Ind. App. 107, 101 N. E. 341; Colley v. Doughty, 62 Me. 501; Laud v. Muirhead, 31 Miss. 89; Goff v. Papin, 34 Mo. 177; Crandall v. Cooper, 62 Mo. 478; Coe v. Ritter, 86 Mo. 277; Koenig v. Boehme, 14 Mo. App. 593; Goodwin v. Cunningham, 54 Neb. 11, 74 N. W. 315.

Nor is one a necessary party who is not the owner of premises at the time the action is brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien although he was the owner at the time the lien accrued. Kilbourn v. Sunderland, 130 U. S. 505, 9 S. Ct. 594, 32 U. S. (L. ed.) 1005; Case Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 40 Fed. 339, 5 L.R.A. 231; Rose v. Persee, etc. Paper Works, 29 Conn. 256; Kellenberger v. Boyer, 37 Ind. 188; Howard v. Robinson, 5 Cush. (Mass.) 119; McLundie v. Mount, 145 Mo. App. 660, 123 S. W. 966; Southard v. Moss, 2 Misc. 121, 20 N. Y. S. 848; Pierce v. Kinney, 75 Misc. 328, 135 N. Y. S. 537 (grantor of property before lien is sought to be enforced is proper, but not necessary party). See also Work v. Hall, 79 Ill. 196; Cullers v. Greenville First Nat. Bank (Tex.) 29 S. W. 72. Compare Carswell v. Patzowski, 4 Penn. (Del.) 403, 55 Atl. 342, 1013; Bierschenk v. King, 38 App. Div. 360, 56 N. Y. S. 696.

In Rose v. Persee, etc. Paper Works, 29 Conn. 256, it was held that the grantors of the property sought to be foreclosed were not necessary parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The court said: "After assignment, he [the assignor] has no longer any interest to be protected, and the circumstance that his deed contains covenants which may render him liable if the property was incumbered, can make no difference. If he is ever called upon for any claim arising out of any such covenants, he will be left with the same means of defending against it as if no decree, affecting other parties, had passed in reference to the property. This objection therefore must be overruled."

3. WIFE OR WIDOW OF OWNER.

Ordinarily the wife of the owner of property is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien thereon. Franklin Sav. Bank v. Taylor, 131 Ill. 376, 23 N.

E. 397; Vorhees v. Beckwell, 10 Ind. App. 224, 37 N. E. 811; Flake v. Central Hardware Co. 96 Miss. 838, 51 So. 461; Washburn v. Burns, 34 N. J. L. 18. See also Schnell v. Clements, 73 Ill. 613; Charleston Lumber, etc. Co. v. Brockmyer, 18 W. Va. 586.

But where the premises to be foreclosed under a mechanic's lien constitute a homestead, the owner's wife is a necessary party. Weston v. Weston, 46 Wis. 130, 49 N. W. 834. However, where the lien attaches to property which subsequently becomes a homestead the owner's wife is not a necessary party to the action to foreclose the lien. Watkins v. Spoull, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 427, 28 S. W. 356.

The widow of the owner is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a lien which attached during the life of the husband. Schaeffer v. Weed, 3 Gilman (Ill.) 511; Pifer v. Ward, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 232.

Where the property on which a mechanic's lien attaches is owned jointly as community property by a husband and his wife they are both necessary parties to an action to foreclose the lien and without the joinder of the wife no decree can be entered affecting the title. Littell, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 3 Wash. 480, 28 Pac. 1035; Sagmeister v. Foss, 4 Wash. 320, 30 Pac. 80, 744; Peterson v. Dillon, 27 Wash. 78, 67 Pac. 397; Powell v. Nolan, 27 Wash. 318, 67 Pac. 712, 68 Pac. 389; Northwest Bridge Co. v. Tacoma Shipbuilding Co. 36 Wash. 333, 78 Pac. 996. See also Rasmussen v. Liming, 50 Wash. 184, 96 Pac. 1044. In Littell, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Miller, supra, the court said: "Notwithstanding the fact, however, that the husband individually can incur the debt in all suits to foreclose liens upon community real estate the wife is a necessary party defendant. She has at least as much right to contest the facts making the same a charge against the community as the husband has. There can be no sale of the husband's or wife's interest in the community property separately during the existence of the community."

In Powell v. Nolan, 27 Wash. 318, 67 Pac. 712, 68 Pac. 389, it was said: "The court below was not, therefore, justified in assuming jurisdiction over the community property where the husband had not been brought into the action by the service of summons upon him. The affidavit as to the service of the amended complaint of Powell on James Nolan is entirely silent as to the service of any summons with it. James Nolan was not, therefore, so far as appears from the record, ever served with a summons in this action, and was therefore never brought into the action, and, as he never appeared in the action, the court had no jurisdiction over the community property belonging to himself and wife, so as to enter a decree affecting the same."

4. HUSBAND OF OWNER.

It has been held that in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien where the owner of the property is a married woman the husband is a necessary party defendant. Greenleaf v. Beebe, 80 Ill. 520; Hutchinson v. Preston, 2 Pittsb. (Pa.) 303.

It has been held that an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien against the property of a married woman should not proceed to judgment without the joinder of her husband, but the decisions to that effect appear to be based largely on the common-law disabilities of married women or on the existence of an existing interest by the husband in the title. Herbert Boiler Co. v. Lewis, 185 Ill. App. 384; Clark v. Boarman, 89 Md. 428, 43 Atl. 926; Latshaw v. McNees, 50 Mo. 381; Fink v. Hanegan, 51 Mo. 280. Compare Greenleaf v. Beebe, 80 Ill. 520.

In other jurisdictions it has been said that the husband is a proper but not a necessary party. Vorhees v. Beckwell, 10 Ind. App. 224, 37 N. E. 811; Seary v. Wegenaar, 120 App. Div. 419, 104 N. Y. S. 1055.

5. LESSEE.

The owner of a leasehold interest in part of the premises to be foreclosed in a mechanic's lien action is a necessary party. Wright v. Cowie, 5 Wash. 341, 31 Pac. 878. So in Meyers v. Le Poidevin, 9 Neb. 535, 4 N. W. 319, it was held that a person who had erected a building on leased property was a necessary party to an action to enforce a lien for the labor and materials entering into the building.

But a tenant who buys tiling, which is used by the contractor with the knowledge of the owner, is not a necessary party. Texas Builders' Supply Co. v. Beaumont Constr. Co. (Tex.) 150 S. W. 770.

6. LESSOR.

Where a lien is asserted against a leasehold interest only, the lessor is not a necessary party to an action for its foreclosure. Horn v. Clark Hardware Co. 54 Colo. 522, 131 Pac. 405, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 100, wherein the court said: "The final question urged is, that the liens must fail because the owner of the property—that is, the Pewabic Consolidated Gold Mines Company—was not made a party. This contention is based upon section 4035, R. S. 1908, which provides that 'the owner or owners of the property to which such lien shall have attached, and all other parties claiming of record any right, title, interest or equity therein, whose title or interests are to be charged with or affected by such lien, shall be made parties to the action.' The owner meant by this section is the person upon whose interest in the property the lien is claimed, and sought to be established. No claim was made by claimants as against the interest of the Pewabic company. The liens asserted and sought to be established by claimants were limited to the interest of the lessee, and it was, therefore, the owner of the property, as contemplated by the section of the statute above quoted."

As to cases wherein a lien is sought to be enforced against the fee, see supra, this subdivision, 2. Owner.

7. HEIR.

The heirs of a deceased owner of premises being by the devolution of title the owners thereof are necessary parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien thereon. Hughes v. Torgerson, 96 Ala. 346, 11 So. 209, 38 Am. St. Rep. 105, 16 L.R.A. 600; Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 547, 70 Am. Dec. 748; Sorg v. Crandall, 233 Ill. 79, 84 N. E. 181; Pifer v. Ward, 8 Blackf. (Ind.) 252; Simonds v. Buford, 18 Ind. 176; Gurrant v. Dawson, 34 Miss. 149; Belcher v. Schaumburg, 18 Mo. 189; Russell v. Howell, 74 N. H. 551, 60 Atl. 886. Compare Ferry v. Moore, 18 Ill. App. 135 (heirs without interest); Wilson v. Sherwin-Williams Paint Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 418.

In Belcher v. Schaumburg, supra, it appeared that the owner of the property against which the plaintiff acquired a mechanic's lien died while the action to foreclose the same was pending. It was held that in reviving the action the heirs of the decedent were necessary parties. To the same effect see Hughes v. Torgerson, 96 Ala. 346, 11 So. 209, 38 Am. St. Rep. 105, 16 L.R.A. 600, wherein the court said: "Dr. Hughes, who was the owner of the building in question, and under a contract with whom, as claimed by the plaintiff, the services were rendered, died intestate, before the suit was instituted. The only defendant was the administrator of his estate. On the death of the intestate, his heirs became the owners of the property. A lien cannot be declared and enforced in a proceeding to which the owner of the property on which the lien is claimed is not a party. Roman v. Thorn, 83 Ala. 443. If the suit had been brought against the intestate in his lifetime, it could have been revived and prosecuted against his personal representative alone, without making his heirs parties. The statute expressly provides for that contingency. Code, § 3031. This provision does not apply to suits brought after the death of the owner or proprietor of the property. In such case, the general rule applies, that he who is, at the time the suit is commenced, the owner of the building or structure upon which the lien is sought to be enforced, is a necessary party defendant, without whose presence the lien cannot be declared or enforced. 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law 165; Phillips on Mechanics' Liens, § 393. The personal representative of the deceased owner may also be made a party defendant. The prohibition against bringing suits against personal representatives within six months after the grant of letters, does not apply to suits for the enforcement of such liens. Code § 3043. Because of the absence of necessary parties defendant, the judgment must be reversed."

In Wilson v. Sherwin-Williams Paint Co. (Tex.) 160 S. W. 418, it was held that neither the heirs nor the personal representatives of a deceased insolvent subcontractor were necessary parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The court said: "The first, second, third, and fourth assignments of error are to the same effect; that is, they complain of the court's overruling of defendant's exceptions to plaintiff's petition, the ground being the want of necessary parties, in that the representatives of Hieatt, deceased, were not parties to this action. We think no error was committed by the court in this particular. Hieatt was dead, and surviving him were a widow and seven children. He died insolvent, and the only property he had was homestead and some exempt personal property. The Alex Watson Construction Company owed him $101.33, and there was nothing which made it worth while to have an administrator of the estate appointed. The widow and children had received from him no property which would make them liable to account to creditors, and to have made them parties to this proceeding would have increased the costs of the proceeding and otherwise proven absolutely useless. The law does not require the doing of a useless thing. The making of the widow and children parties would have proven of no practical benefit to either party, and therefore, if the strict rules of the law required such, the defendants have in no way been injured by the overruling of the exception."

In Iowa it is not necessary to join the heirs of a deceased owner as parties to a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien, the personal representative being deemed to represent their interest. Shields v. Keys, 24 Ia. 298; Welch v. McGrath, 59 Ia. 519, 10 N. W. 810, 13 N. W. 638. Compare Gammel v. Young, 3 Ia. 297.

8. PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVE.

The personal representative of a deceased owner of premises must be made a party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien thereon. Watson v. Bardwell, 154 Ill. App. 326 (necessary party only when deficiency judgment is sought against estate; otherwise proper party); Holmes v. Humphreys, 181 Mass. 181, 63 N. E. 396; Guerrant v. Dawson, 34 Miss. 149; Security Mortg. etc. Co. v. Caruthers (Tex.) 32 S. W. 837. See also the Iowa cases cited in the preceding subdivision. Compare Holmes v. Humphreys, 187 Mass. 513, 73 N. E. 668; Crystal v. Flannelly, 2 E. D. Smith (N. Y.) 583.

In Holmes v. Humphreys, 181 Mass. 181, 63 N. E. 396, the court said: "In suits to enforce a claim for a mechanic's lien, two interests properly are represented in defense; first the interest of the person primarily liable for the debt sought to be collected, and secondly the interest of the owners of the property upon which the lien is claimed. The statute which is invoked by the petitioners is R. L., c. 197, § 22, which provides that on the death of the respondent in a case like this, the petition 'may be prosecuted against his executor, administrator, heirs or assigns as if the estate or interest had been mortgaged to secure the debt.' The petitioners contend that the petition may be prosecuted against any of these parties, and that therefore the case may go on against their heirs alone, although they have no possible interest in it. The true meaning of the provision is, as we understand it, that the petition may be prosecuted against such of the parties mentioned as properly represent the interest to be affected. In a case like the present there is no doubt that the executor or administrator is a proper person to be summoned in as respondent. He represents the primary liability for the debt and he should have an opportunity to defend the suit. Inasmuch as the bond stands in the place of the land, he also, as principal, represents the security to be affected if the lien is established. In both relations he is interested, and he should be summoned to appear. The principal and sureties on the bond stand in the place that would be held by the heirs or assigns if the lien had not been discharged. In that relation, not as representing the primary liability for the debt, but as representing the security which is to be used to pay the debt if the lien is established, we are of opinion that they should have an opportunity to be heard as to the validity of the lien, and that at least in the absence of the administrator as a party, the sureties should be summoned before the suit can proceed further. Whether facts exist which make it possible to procure the appointment of an administrator de bonis non who can be summoned into court, we do not know; if not, and if on this account the petitioners were to lose their claim, it would be the result of their own negligence in allowing so many years to elapse without action. It may be, but upon this we express no opinion, for the matter is not now before us for adjudication, that as there were no assets in the estate of the respondent, and as his estate has been settled and his administrator has deceased, and no interest of his estate can now be affected by an adjudication either upon his primary liability upon the debt or upon his secondary liability as principal in the bond, that the case may properly go on against the sureties alone, if they are brought into court as parties. The ruling that the suit was ripe for further proceedings without other parties was erroneous. The proceedings must be stayed until all necessary parties have been summoned to appear and defend."

9. TRUSTEE.

It has been held that a trustee of the property to be foreclosed being the owner of the legal title, is an indispensable party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. Johnson v. Bennett, 6 Colo. App. 362, 40 Pac. 847; Williams v. Chatham Real Estate, etc. Co. 13 Ga. App. 42, 78 S. E. 869; Lomax v. Dore, 45 Ill. 379; McGraw v. Bayard, 96 Ill. 146; Bennitt v. Wilmington Star Min. Co. 119 Ill. 9, 7 N. E. 498; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Batchen, 6 Ill. App. 621; Columbia Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Taylor, 25 Ill. App. 429; La Crosse Lumber Co. v. Grace M. E. Church, 180 Ill. App. 584; Keller v. Tracy, 11 Ia. 531; Schillinger Fire-Proof Cement, etc. Co. v. Arnott, 14 N. Y. S. 326; Farmers' Bank v. Watson, 39 W. Va. 342, 19 S. E. 413; Lunsford v. Wren, 64 W. Va. 458, 63 L. E. 308. See also Badger Lumber Co. v. Staley, 141 Mo. App. 295, 125 S. W. 779. Compare Lookout Lumber Co. v. Mansion Hotel, etc. R. Co. 109 N. C. 658, 14 S. E. 35.

In La Crosse Lumber Co. v. Grace M. E. Church, 180 Ill. App. 584, it appeared that the trustees of the defendant church corporation were not made parties defendant to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. It further appeared that the trustees were also owners, together with the church, of the property. It was held that they were necessary parties. The court said: "It appears from the allegations of the bill that the trustees of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church are by the first paragraph of the bill alleged to be owners of the said real estate, together with the corporation, Grace Methodist Episcopal Church. If the trustees of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church are joint owners with the corporation they are necessary parties, and they are not in court. They must be sued as individual trustees and served with summons as such. They have not been so sued and have not been served except by service on the president and secretary of the board of trustees which is not sufficient. They have entered no appearance, have filed no pleading and they are not named except as a body, and are not alleged to be a corporation anywhere in the bill. Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, a religious corporation, is in court and the demurrer is filed by it alone and this appeal is against the church corporation only. If the trustees hold title to the real estate then appellant's bill here is subject to a demurrer for want of necessary parties (Granquist v. Western Tube Co. 240 Ill. 132)."

Other decisions, proceeding apparently on the theory that the cestui que trust is the real owner, hold that while the trustee is a proper party a failure to join him is not fatal. Roman v. Thorn, 83 Ala. 443, 3 So. 759; Niehaus v. C. B. Barker Construction Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 23.

10. CESTUI QUE TRUST.

Where property is held in trust the cestui que trust should be made a party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien thereon. Roman v. Thorn, 83 Ala. 443, 3 So. 759; McClair v. Huddart, 6 Colo. App. 493, 41 Pac. 832; Lomax v. Dore, 45 Ill. 379; Jennings v. Hinkle, 81 Ill. 183 (church corporation no longer in existence not necessary party); Gaytes v. Franklin Sav. Bank, 85 Ill. 256; Clark v. Manning, 95 Ill. 580; McGraw v. Bayard, 96 Ill. 147; Bennitt v. Wilmington Star Min. Co. 119 Ill. 9, 7 N. E. 498; Paddock v. Stout, 121 Ill. 571, 13 N. E. 182; Bannon v. Thayer, 124 Ill. 451, 17 N. E. 54; Phoenix Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Batchen, 6 Ill. App. 821; Lamb v. Campbell, 19 Ill. App. 272; Columbia Bldg. etc. Assoc. v. Taylor, 25 Ill. App. 429; General F. Extinguisher Co. v. Lundell, 66 Ill. App. 140; Keller v. Tracy, 11 Ia. 530; Sheppard v. Messenger, 107 Ia. 717, 77 N. W. 515; Miller v. Faulk, 47 Mo. 262; Mississippi Planing Mill v. Presbyterian Church, 54 Mo. 520; T. A. Miller Lumber Co. v. Oliver, 65 Mo. App. 435; Farmers' Bank v. Watson, 39 W. Va. 342, 19 S. E. 413. Compare Lunsford v. Wren, 64 W. Va. 458, 63 S. E. 308, (cestui without capacity to be sued).

In T. A. Miller Lumber Co. v. Oliver, 65 Mo. App. 435, it appeared that the plaintiff brought an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. One Oliver was named as one of the defendants, he being the principal contractor. The other defendants were members of a committee representing a church organization, the owner of the property sought to be foreclosed. The defendants contended that all the members of the organization should have been made parties defendant. However, the court held that they were not necessary parties, saying: "As before stated, the foundation of this objection to the petition is that all of the members of the organization should have been sued. This is an erroneous view. The statute is that the parties to the contract only are necessary parties. Others who may be interested in the matter in controversy or in the property charged with the lien may be made parties, but such as are not made parties will not be bound by the proceeding. R. S. 1889, sec. 6713. Here it is averred that Oliver made the contract with the building committee; that they and the other members of the congregation were the equitable owners of the land; that they were in possession of it, and that they had authority from their co-owners to make the contract. Under these averments the demurrer was properly overruled. The plaintiff had the right, if it so elected, to enforce the lien against the interests only of the parties to the suit, and of this they had no right to complain. The interests of their co-owners would in no wise be bound by the proceedings." To the same effect see Mississippi Planing Mill v. Presbyterian Church, 54 Mo. 520, wherein the court said: "It is further insisted by the defendants in this case, that the evidence of the witnesses shows that the Presbyterian Church is a corporation and should have been made a party to the suit, as it had an equitable interest in the property to be effected. It is sufficient to say in answer to this objection, that by answering to the merits of the action the defendants waived any objection they might have urged to the petition on the ground of a defect of parties to the action. The defendants sued were the persons who made the contract for the building, and who held the legal estate in the premises to be charged; they being proper parties, if other parties in interest were not also made parties, that fact would not defeat the action; the only effect that could result would be, that the judgment in the case might not, and in some cases would not, effect the interests of those who were not made parties."

Where the property sought to be foreclosed is held under an active trust the cestui que trust is not a necessary party to the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien. McGraw v. Bayard, 96 Ill. 146, wherein the court said: "This court has repeatedly held that suits to enforce mechanics' liens are substantially chancery proceedings, and are governed by the rules of chancery practice. . . . The general equity rule is, that all persons interested in the subject matter of a suit must be made parties in order that the decree may affect their rights, and this rule requires that in litigation had in respect to trust property, both the trustee and the cestui que trust be made parties. There is an exception to this where the trust is an active one, imposing on the trustee the duty of receiving, controlling and managing the trust fund for the benefit of the cestui que trust."

Some jurisdictions hold that a lien cannot be foreclosed on property held in trust unless the cestui que trust is made a party. Roman v. Thorn, 83 Ala. 443, 3 So. 759; McClair v. Huddart, 6 Colo. App. 493, 41 Pac. 832; Farmers' Bank v. Watson, 39 W. Va. 342, 19 S. E. 413.

In Illinois a failure to join a cestui que trust in a proceeding to enforce a mechanic's lien against the trust property is not fatal to the decree, but his interests are in no manner affected thereby. Portoues v. Badenoch, 132 Ill. 377, 23 N. E. 349, affirming 33 Ill. App. 312. In that case it appeared that the cestui que trust under a trust deed to the property on which a mechanic's lien was foreclosed was not made a party to the proceeding. It was held that the failure to make him a party was not a judicial error as his rights were not affected by the judgment in the foreclosure proceedings. The court said: "The petitions aver, and the answers admit, that there was a trust deed upon the land to one Chandler. Chandler, the trustee, was made a party defendant, and answered, but the cestui que trust, or holder of the note, was not made a party. The failure to make the cestui que trust a party is complained of by appellant. In this regard no error was committed in the court below. The holder of the note is not prejudiced by the decree, because the property is ordered to be sold subject to his incumbrance. The sale is to be made, not for the purpose of making the amount due upon the trust deed, but the amounts due the petitioners. The purchaser, under the decree rendered in this case, will buy the land subject to the lien of the trust deed. It is not perceived how the rights of appellant are prejudiced in any way by the fact that the holder of the note is not a party to the proceeding. Appellant can only urge such errors as affect his interests."

II. MORTGAGEE.

The general rule is that unless one who holds a mortgage on the premises to be foreclosed under a mechanic's lien is made a party to the foreclosure action his rights under the mortgage will not be affected by the decree of foreclosure.

Wisconsin.—Lampson v. Bowen, 41 Wis. 484.

In Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 547, 70 Am. Dec. 748, the court said: "The principles which govern as to parties in those suits apply equally to suits for the enforcement of a mechanic's lien. The mortgage under which the plaintiff claims was placed upon the premises before suit was brought; the mortgagees, as subsequent incumbrancers, were necessary parties to the suit; not being made such parties, they were not bound by the decree or sale under it."

In Cox v. Flanagan (N. J.) 2 Atl. 33, it was said: "October 24, 1884,, a summons was issued on each of said claims. The complainants, then still holding their mortgage, were not made parties, as is required by the first section of the Act of 1884 (Pub. Laws 260) which provides that in every such case every person holding a mortgage of record against the property affected by said lien claim, whose mortgage would be cut off by a sale under said lien claim, shall be made a party defendant to said suit. This requirement is imperative, and was not complied with. I regard it as an omission which cannot be overcome, and which enables the complainant to proceed in the face of the claim made. This provision is another one of the conditions imposed by the legislature upon lien claimants which they must observe. December 27, 1884, one of the complainants and their counsel examined the records of the clerk's office, and discovered that the said lien claims purported to be repairs, and also discovered that there was no indorsement upon them indicating that any summons had been issued thereon. The proof satisfies my mind that both counsel and clients supposed and believed that any claim upon the liens had been abandoned. Afterwards there was an indorsement made upon each of the lien claims in these words: 'Summons issued on the within claim this twenty-fourth day of October, A. D. 187,' which was signed by the clerk. I cannot but regard the omission to make the indorsement upon the claim of the issuing of the summons as fatal. Whatever may be fair and equitable (if such equitable principles are to be applied at all in the construction of statutes beyond the liberty expressed in the statute itself) there is nothing in this case permitting of their application. It is insisted, however, that the lien claimants have their judgments upon their liens, and that the proceedings thereunder cannot be questioned collaterally, however irregular. I cannot concur in this view. It does not seem to me that the principle which sanctifies a judgment has ever been applied against a person in interest who was not a party to the action in which the judgment was obtained. I do not see how I can be mistaken in this, for, plainly, the most high-handed wrongs could be perpetrated against the innocent and ignorant in the name of justice. I do not think that this view, in any sense, conflicts with the opinion expressed by the chief justice in the case of Jacobus v. Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. 27 N. J. Eq. 605, so carefully considered by all of the court; for what is there said I believe to be the law, resting upon the soundest principles of public policy. And that such indorsement should be made at the time of issuing the summons has been settled, I think, upon the soundest principles of construction, in the court of errors and appeals, in the case of Wheeler v. Almond, 46 N. J. L. 161. It may be said that that was a case at law; but the construction of a statute must be the same in every court. The legislative mandate cannot be supposed to have a double meaning. I conclude that the complainants are entitled to the fund, and will so advise."

In Hokanson v. Gunderson, 54 Minn. 499, 56 N. W. 172, 40 Am. St. Rep. 354, the court said: "It is not material at all whether the defendant Marvin had actual notice of the suit, unless she could be legally bound by the adjudication therein. Notice avails nothing unless or until the party receiving it, or the party under whom he claims, has an opportunity to have his rights litigated and determined. . . . The interest of the purchaser at a mortgage sale in this state during the redemption period is somewhat anomalous. But he is certainly a necessary party to a suit affecting the interest of the mortgagee unless the latter is made a party, and it is not sufficient that the mortgagor alone is joined. The purchaser succeeds to the equitable interest of the mortgagee, and when no redemption is made this interest draws to it the subordinate legal title of the mortgagor, and his title then stands under the mortgagee precisely as if the mortgage had been an absolute conveyance at its date; or, in other words, the mortgage ripens into a perfect title through the process of foreclosure. The purchaser is, then, only concerned with the state of the title at the date of the mortgage, and the existence of liens affecting the rights of the mortgagee. His rights are not affected by liens adjudged against the mortgagor in a suit in which neither he nor the mortgagee is a party. The result is that the defendant Marvin was not seasonably made a party to this action, and did not take under anyone who was such at the time she purchased."

In Tompkins v. Horton, 25 N. J. Eq. 284, it was held that a mortgagee was not a necessary party. The court said: "The enforcement of a mechanic's lien is a proceeding at law, where no equity of redemption exists, and we are not aware that it has ever been held to be necessary in such a proceeding, that incumbrancers by mortgage or other liens (except of the same kind) should be made parties thereto, while it will be found upon examination, that it has been held just to the reverse. . . . A mechanic's lien, like that of an attachment, when confirmed or made effective by judgment, is binding upon the parties thereto. And the law, in order to give full effect to the principle by which the parties are held bound by it, equally concludes, by the same proceedings, all persons who are represented by the parties, and claim under them, or are privy to them, and they are estopped from litigating that which is conclusive upon those with whom they stand thus related. Volenti non fit injuria. The mortgagee whose lien is taken with notice of the liability of the land to the lien created by statute, and with notice also of the provision that in the enforcement of that lien no notice will be given to him, cannot complain of a result which he had reason to anticipate and which he is presumed to have contemplated. Every man must be presumed to know the public laws in existence, and to have contracted with reference to their provisions."

In Iowa it has been held that a mortgagee is not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. State v. Eads, 15 Ia. 114, 83 Am. Dec. 399; Evans v. Tripp, 35 Ia. 371 (junior mortgagee).

It has been held that a failure to join a mortgagee in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien does not prevent a foreclosure and sale, but the mortgagee is in no manner affected by the decree. Case Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 40 Fed. 339, 5 L.R.A. 231. Thus in Deming-Colburn Lumber Co. v. Union Nat. Sav. etc. Assoc. 151 Ind. 463, 51 N. E. 936, it appeared that after the mechanic acquired a lien right the owner of the premises gave a mortgage thereon. In an action to foreclose the lien the mortgagee was not made a party. The mechanic obtained a conveyance of the premises in satisfaction of his judgment. Thereafter the mortgagee sought to set aside this conveyance on the ground that the judgment in the foreclosure suit was null and void, because of the failure to make him a party. The contention was held untenable, except that the rights of the mortgagee were not affected by the foreclosure suit. The court said: "The mortgage here considered was, however, given after the attaching of the mechanic's lien, and is therefore a junior incumbrance. But it is not absolutely necessary to the validity of a foreclosure proceeding that either senior or junior incumbrancers should be made parties. At most, it is to be said that the rights of those not made parties are not affected. If such rights are not thereby diminished, neither are they increased, and we are to look to the law in each case to see what such rights are. If we should treat appellant's mechanic's lien and appellee's junior mortgage lien as having to each other simply the relation of two mortgages, as appellees would seem to argue they ought to be treated, then, as we have seen, the rights of appellees, as holder of the junior lien, were, at most, not affected by appellant's foreclosure. Its lien remains as before, junior to that of the senior lienholder. . . . Following the analogy of these cases, appellee's right as a junior lienholder—it not having been made a party to appellant's foreclosure suit, and not, therefore, being bound by it—would be precisely the same as it was before such foreclosure suit was begun. The statute as to the foreclosure of mechanics' liens certainly does not give any greater rights to a junior incumbrancer. It is only prior incumbrancers that are there protected when not made parties. . . . But, while the lien was duly foreclosed as against the owner of the property, yet, as we have seen, the appellee, as mortgagee, not having been made a party to the action, its rights were in no manner affected thereby; that is, appellee's mortgage stands just the same as it would have stood if the mechanic's lien had not been foreclosed within the time prescribed by the statute. In other words, the year given by statute having expired without a foreclosure of the lien, as against the mortgage, the lien itself and the judgment based thereon must be, as to such mortgage, absolutely void. Equity cannot, as in the case of mortgages, maintain the senior lien on foot, after the expiration of the year, when the statute itself declares that such lien shall then be void. By its foreclosure the lienholder not having made the mortgagee a party, simply stepped into the shoes of the owner of the property; and, as such owner could not question the right of the mortgagee to foreclose against the property, neither can the lienholder now do so—the year given him by statute to foreclose his lien having expired. It would, of course, be different if the time for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien were not limited by the statute."

So in Riverside Lumber Co. v. Schafer, 251 Mo. 539, 158 S. W. 340, it appeared that the owner of certain property, on which the plaintiff had performed labor and had furnished material, gave a mortgage thereon. The plaintiff thereafter brought an action to foreclose the lien. In the action he failed to make the mortgagee a party defendant. It was held that the mortgagee was a necessary party and that its rights could not be affected by a judgment for the plaintiff against the owner and the other defendants. The court said: "It is the general policy of the law to settle all litigation between the same parties, regarding the same subject-matter, in one suit; and it is upon this principle that all parties interested in the subject-matter of a suit are, by the practice act, or rules of equity, authorized or required to be made parties. The statutes and rules of equity recognize a distinction between proper and necessary parties, the details of which are not here necessary to be noted; but in this class of cases it seems from a careful reading of the act regarding mechanics' liens and the construction placed thereon by the courts of the state, that it was the design of the legislature to compel a party entitled to a lien for labor done, or materials furnished upon a building, to make all persons interested in the subject-matter of the suit, whom he wished to be affected thereby, parties defendant, and if he failed to do so, then their right should not be affected thereby. . . . So, viewing this case upon principle, I am fully satisfied that whatever preference the mechanic's lien had over the school mortgage, was waived and extinguished by the owner thereof not making the county court, the trustee of the school funds, a party to the mechanic's lien suit."

12. OTHER LIEN CLAIMANT.

In most jurisdictions the statutes providing for the foreclosure of a mechanic's lien are held to contemplate a single proceeding in which all liens arising out of a particular improvement shall be adjudicated. Accordingly if all the lien claimants are not made parties the proceeding will be stayed until they are brought in.

Canada.—Horenden v. Ellison, 24 Grant (U. C.) 448.

In John E. Burns Lumber Co. v. W. J. Reynolds Co. 148 Ill. App. 356, it appeared that several materialmen furnished goods to a subcontractor. The materials were used in the construction of the building on the property sought to be foreclosed under a mechanic's lien judgment. The subcontractor was not made a party to the foreclosure proceeding. It was held that he was a necessary party defendant. The court said: "The complainant, John E. Burns Lumber Company, the intervening petitioners, Schaller-Hoerr Company and William T. Waterstraat, who were allowed liens, and the intervening petitioner, South Side Lumber Company, who was not allowed a lien, are all furnishers of material for the subcontract and, being of that class, they, as they are obliged to do, claim liens under section 22 of the mechanic's lien act. They contracted with and trusted the subcontractor and, through that relation, they claim their lien upon the property. Should they eventually establish a right to liens and thereby the amount the owner would be obliged to pay for the carpenter work be made to exceed the contract price, a right to be reimbursed by the subcontractor, if not by the original contractor, would arise. It is, therefore, of the highest importance that the actual subcontractor, a party in interest and under the lien law a necessary party as such, be a party to this proceeding. The owner's right to reimbursement would arise because of his being compelled, in order to protect his property, to pay out money which it was primarily the duty of another to pay. Chudnovski v. Eckels, 232 Ill. 312, 317, and Chicago v. Pittsburg, etc. R. Co. 146 Ill. App. 403. It appears that on March 19, 1906, Nicholson contracted with the owner to furnish 'the material, labor, tools, machinery, etc.,' and to build and complete 'all the general work' of the building in question, to be completed on or before September 1, 1906. In that contract Bradshaw, the owner, as the consideration, agreed to pay Nicholson $45,300 and, in addition to that sum $1,104.39 became due the contractor for extras. The building was completed about November 1, 1906. At the time of the institution of this proceeding, payments had been made by the owner so that only $2,208.80 was due the contractor and, through the owner or his agents, the architects, payments had been made by the contractor to the subcontractor so that there was then only $1,055.53 due to the carpenter subcontractor from the contractor. At the same time there was due the furnishers of material, John E. Burns Lumber Company, the Schaller-Hoerr Company, William T. Waterstraat and the South Side Lumber Company, under their contracts with the subcontractor, an aggregate of $4,892.52, exclusive of interest. This aggregate includes $1,281.84 disallowed to the South Side Lumber Company and $1,405.15 disallowed to the John E. Burns Lumber Company. Thus it appears that there was due to the material furnishers from the subcontractor more than there was due him from the contractor and even more than there was due from the owner to the contractor. Hence it was, in this particular case, of the greatest importance, both to the owner and to the contractor, that the subcontractor should have been made a party and shown, by a preponderance of the evidence, to be the subcontractor."

In Wakefield v. Van Dorn, 53 Neb. 23, 73 N. W. 226, it was held that a mechanic who furnishes labor or materials for the erection of a building is bound to know who the other lien claimants are, and must make them all parties to his action of foreclosure.

Persons whose labor or material claims have been paid need not be joined. Meeks v. Sims, 84 Ill. 422.

In Continental, etc. Trust, etc. Bank v. Corey Bros. Const. Co. 208 Fed. 976, 126

C. C. A. 64, it was said that a claimant over whom the plaintiff does not claim priority need not be made a party.

The holder of a lien acquired after the commencement of the foreclosure action need not be joined. Monk v. Exposition Deepwater Pier Co. 111 Va. 121, 68 S. E. 280; Lavanway v. Cannon, 37 Wash. 593, 79 Pac. 1117.

The failure to join a lien claimant may be waived by the owner. Luttrell v. Knoxville, etc. R. Co. 119 Tenn. 492, 105 S. W. 585, 123 Am. St. Rep. 737.

The omission of a claimant does not render the foreclosure a nullity. Wakefield v. Van Doran, 53 Neb. 23, 73 N. W. 414; Cain v. Parfitt, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 28. But the rights of the omitted claimant are not affected by the decree. Whitney v. Higgins, 10 Cal. 547, 70 Am. Dec. 748.

The sureties on the bond of a contractor or subcontractor given for the faithful performance of his duties, or the sureties on the bond of a purchaser of the premises, should be joined in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien if a recovery on the bond is sought, and their joinder may be compelled to avoid circuity of action. Jones v. McKenzie, 20 Misc. 222, 45 N. Y. S. 412; Brewster v. McLaughlin, 28 Misc. 50, 58 N. Y. S. 989; Whisten v. Kellogg, 50 Misc. 409, 100 N. Y. S. 526; Maneely v. New York, 119 App. Div. 376, 105 N. Y. S. 976 (sureties performing contract on default of contractor); Haberzette v. Dearing (Tex.) 80 S. W. 539 (proper but not necessary); Warren v. Beaumont Hotel Co. 151 Wis. 1, 138 N. W. 102. See also Schultz v. Teichman Engineering, etc. Co. 79 Misc. 357, 140 N. Y. S. 429.

In Warren v. Beaumont Hotel Co. 151 Wis. 1, 138 N. W. 102, it appeared that various persons became sureties on the bond of the principal contractor and the bond of the owner of the property. In an action to foreclose the liens of the subcontractors it was held that the sureties were necessary parties. The court said: "The relations of the sureties to the principal contractors, the subcontractors, and the hotel company, under the terms of the construction contracts and the bonds, have heretofore been considered, and they were held liable on their bonds to the hotel company and the lienors for any claims for material and labor needed to complete the construction of the hotel pursuant to the construction contracts on account of the principal contractors' default, hence they are vitally and adversely interested in the claims presented by the pleadings in favor of the hotel company and the lienors. Under their bonds they are primarily liable for payment of the debts and the liens for material and work. Under the equitable rule declared by sec. 2603, Stats. (1898) 'Any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the questions involved therein.' Since the bondsmen have an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiffs, they are interested in not being subjected to any liability for claims of the lienors in excess of what may be found justly due them, and they are necessary parties to the litigation to determine this liability on doubtful claims should any such be presented for allowance. The sureties being thus adversely interested in the questions litigated it is appropriate for a court of equity, in order to make a complete determination of all the questions involved between the parties, to require their presence so as to enable it to award judgment against them for the payment and discharge of all claims and liens according to the rights established in the action, thus saving the hotel company harmless in the matter."

In Haney v. Moorehead, 61 Pa. Super. Ct. 187, it was held that a title insurance company which insured the property against which an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien was brought, was neither a proper nor a necessary party to the foreclosure.

14. RECEIVER.

It has been held that a receiver of a railroad is a necessary party defendant to an action against the railroad to foreclose a mechanic's lien and no foreclosure can be had without joining him. Central Trust Co. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 54 Fed. 598; Burk v. Muskegon Mach. etc. Co. 98 Mich. 614, 57 N. W. 804. See also Prather Engineering Co. v. Detroit, etc. R. Co. 152 Mich. 582, 116 N. W. 376.

v.

C. B. BARKER CONSTRUCTION COMPANY ET AL.

Tennessee Supreme Court—May 27, 1916.

135 Tenn. 382; 136 S. W. 461.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Limitation of Action — Effect of Amendment.

In a suit to establish a mechanic's lien, complainant did not make the trustees under a prior mortgage parties before the expiration of the ninety days from the service of notice of lien. An amended bill in which the trustees were named as defendants was filed. In that bill the complainant prayed that the court determine the interest, if any, held by the trustees, and that, if the mortgage be found a valid prior lien, complainant be permitted to subject the equity of defendants to the satisfaction of his claim. Shannon's Code, § 4495, declares that at any time before trial new parties may be added. It is held that, as no relief was sought against the trustees, the notice required by section 3536, which is a condition precedent to a mechanic securing priority over the mortgage, not having been served, the amendment will be treated as relating back to the original bill, and the trustees cannot defeat the bill on the plea of limitation.

Parties — Failure to Join — Bringing in by Amendment.

In such case the contractor and mortgagor cannot defeat the lien because the trustees of the mortgage, who held the legal title, were not brought in within the ninety-day period; for, while such parties were indispensable, yet, as no relief was sought against them, limitations do not apply any more than where the contractor is not originally made a party.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where one seeking a mechanic's lien failed to make the trustees of a prior mortgage parties, but later brought them in by amendment, such amendment does not, under Shannon's Code, § 5237, declaring that the attachment laws shall be liberally construed, and plaintiff shall be permitted to amend any defect of form, destroy an attachment levied against the contractor and owner under the original bill.

[See note at end of this case.]

Attachment — Enforcement — Election of Remedies.

A plaintiff, who has attached a person's effects, both at law and in equity, may dismiss his attachment at law and proceed in equity.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Parties.

Where a prior mortgage on the premises upon which complainant sought a mechanic's lien had been discharged save as to a few mortgage bonds, the holders of which could not be discovered, and the amount of such had been deposited for payment, a mechanic's lien against the premises cannot be defeated because the trustees under the mortgage who yet held the legal title were not made parties within ninety days after serving notice as required by law; for in such case the trustees were practically nominal parties.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Shelby county: FENTRESS, Chancellor.

Action by Herman Niehaus, plaintiff, against C. B. Barker Construction Company et al., defendants. From judgment rendered, plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

J. W. Canada and M. E. Lesser for appellant.

H. H. Barker and Wilson & Armstrong for appellees.

[384] GREEN, J.—The Chickasaw Hotel Company let a contract to the C. B. Barker Construction Company to erect the Chisca Hotel in Memphis. The complainant was a subcontractor employed to do the plastering and metal lathing on the hotel building. The account of complainant not being paid, he gave notice as required by section 3540 of Shannon's Case, providing for the lien of mechanics or materialmen, and thereafter, within ninety days, as required by the statute, he brought an attachment suit to enforce the said lien against the Chisca Hotel property. Complainant named as defendants to his bill the C. B. Barker Construction Company, the Chickasaw Hotel Company, and the Bank of Commerce & Trust Company. The [385] last-named defendant was a trustee under a subsequent mortgage, and complainant's lien was superior to the lien of this mortgage.

After some delay the C. B. Barker Construction Company filed an answer denying the claim, and the Chickasaw Hotel Company filed a plea in abatement. The plea in abatement set out that the property was covered by a previous mortgage executed when said property belonged to the Citizens' Street Railway Company. It was averred in the plea that said original mortgage had not been satisfied, and that the attachment levied under complainant's bill was void, inasmuch as the trustees under this prior mortgage, who held the legal title, had not been made parties to the proceedings. The plea in abatement was not filed until after the expiration of ninety days from the notice of lien served by the complainant upon the Chickasaw Hotel Company.

Complainant then filed an amended bill to which all the original defendants were made parties, and the trustees under the mortgage of the Citizens' Street Railway Company were likewise made defendants. It was averred in the amended bill that this old mortgage had been satisfied; that the hotel company was estopped to rely on the existence of said mortgage as a defense; but the amended bill conceded that, if the old mortgage was valid and unsatisfied, complainant's lien would be subsequent to the lien of said mortgage, and the amended bill asked that the rights of the trustees [386] under the first mortgage be determined, and that, if it was found said mortgage was a valid prior lien, complainant be permitted to subject the equity of the hotel company to the satisfaction of his claim.

To this amended bill all the parties filed separate answers; all insisting that, inasmuch as the amended bill was not filed until more than ninety days after the statutory notice of lien was given by the complainant to the hotel company, the suit to enforce the lien was barred. The case was referred to a master, and proof taken upon the complainant's claim. The master made his report, which was slightly modified by the chancellor. The complainant was given a decree against the C. B. Barker Construction Company for the amount found by the chancellor to be due to him. The chancellor, however, was of opinion that the amended bill came too late, and that the plea in abatement was good and denied complainant's asserted lien upon the Chisca Hotel property.

The chancellor based his decree on that line of cases, which hold that the owner of the legal title as well as the owner of the equitable title must be made a party to suits in which it is sought to reach the equitable estate. Lane v. Marshall, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 30; Fulghum v. Cotton, 6 Lea (Tenn.) 596; Blackburn v. Clarke, 85 Tenn. 506, 3 S. W. 505; King v. Patterson, 129 Tenn. 1, 164 S. W. 1191, and cases therein reviewed.

These cases will be referred to later.

Without for the present attempting to otherwise distinguish this controversy from the cases above [387] cited, we think they can have no application here by reason of the amendment made to the bill of complainant, by which amendment the trustees under the old mortgage of the Citizens' Street Railway Company were made parties.

The Tennessee statute with reference to the addition of new parties to a pending suit is in these words:

"At any time before trial, new plaintiffs or defendants may be added to the suit by the plaintiff, upon supplemental process taken out and served, and subject to such terms in regard to costs as the court may impose. If at the appearance term, it may be done without costs; if at any subsequent term, on such conditions as the court may prescribe, so as especially to prevent delay." Shannon's Code, section 4495.

It is true as a general rule, where new parties defendant are brought in by amendment, the statute of limitations continues to run in their favor until they are made parties; that is to say, the doctrine of relation, under which amendments are considered to have been made as of the date of the original suit, will not be applied so as to deprive any defendant of a substantial right. In other words, a defendant will not be made responsible for a proceeding of which he has had no notice. 25 Cyc. 1302; Miller v. McIntyre, 6 Pet. 61, 8 U. S. (L. ed.) 320. See also Flatley v. Memphis, etc. R. Co. 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 230.

If relief is sought against a party defendant, or if his interests are, in fact, involved, he cannot be prejudiced by the application of a fiction of the law. Such [388] a defendant may successfully interpose a plea of the statute of limitations when it is sought to bring his rights into jeopardy by an amendment to an existing action.

There is, however, another class of cases where the addition of new parties merely corrects a defect in the original proceeding. In these cases the statute of limitations may not be relied on, but the amendments are held to relate back to the institution of the suit.

We have several of these cases in Tennessee. In Burgie v. Parks, 11 Lea (Tenn.) 84, an amendment was allowed by which a co-executor was made party to a suit theretofore brought against the other executor. The amendment came more than two years and six months after the qualification of the executors, but the statute of limitations was held not to be available to the executor brought in by said amendment. Likewise, in Love v. Southern R. Co. 108 Tenn. 104, 65 S. W. 475, 55 L.R.A. 471, which was a suit by the administrator of one killed in a railroad accident, without averment of statutory beneficiaries, an amendment to the declaration was allowed more than twelve months after the accident, by which the statutory beneficiaries were brought in. This amendment was likewise held to relate back and the plea of the statute overruled. To like effect see Brooks v. Brooks, 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 12.

There is less justification for a plea of the statute of limitations here than in any of the last cases mentioned.

[389] This is not a case in which it is claimed the mechanic's lien had priority over the existing mortgage. There was no notice to the mortgagee or trustee, which the statute requires, in order to give precedence to the liens of the mechanics. Shannon's Code, section 3536.

The estate of the trustees could not have been affected in any way by the original proceedings, nor could it have been affected by these proceedings after the amendment. The amended bill asked that the rights of the trustees under the Citizens' Street Railway mortgage be determined, and, if it was found that said mortgage was a prior existing lien, that complainant be permitted to reach the equitable estate of the Hotel Company.

Under these circumstances we are of opinion that the trustees were not entitled to avail themselves of the limitation of ninety days prescribed by the statute for the institution of suits to fix mechanics' liens. This limitation is for the benefit of the owner of the property upon which it is sought to enforce the lien. Such limitation is not available to one against whom no relief is asked. The limitation is for the protection of property sought to be charged, not for the protection of an interest in no way involved.

We conclude therefore that the amendment by which the trustees under the old mortgage were made parties should be held to relate back to the beginning of the suits; that the trustees have no standing to invoke the ninety-day limitation, inasmuch as no relief [390] can be had against them, nor can their interests be affected by the proceedings.

In so far as the Chickasaw Hotel Company and the Barker Construction Company are concerned, these parties certainly have no right to insist on any statute of limitations.

It is well settled that bringing in new parties defendant by amendment does not extend the running of the statute of limitations in favor of the original defendants. The amendment relates back in so far as the original defendants are concerned and as to them the commencement of the suit arrests the running of the statute of limitations. No advantage accrues to original defendants by the bringing in of a new defendant.

It was held in Harrison v. McCormick, 122 Cal. 651, 55 Pac. 592, that an amendment to a complaint against a partnership which brings in an additional member of the firm not originally joined, while subject to the defense of the statute of limitations by the new defendant, does not change the action or introduce a new cause of action as to the original defendants nor let in the statute in their behalf.

In Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. People, 209 Ill. 42, 70 N. E. 643, it was held that there was no new cause of action brought in by an amendment which substitutes one party for another so far as the original party was concerned.

"Bringing in new parties defendant by amendment does not extend the running of the statute of limitations [391] in favor of the original defendants to the time of the amendment. As to them the commencement of the suit is the period at which the running of the statute is arrested." 25 Cyc. 1303.

See also cases collected in note 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 306, and note 55, 25 Cyc. 1303.

It has been held in a number of cases that the general contractor, who is a necessary party, may be brought in by amendment after the expiration of the statutory period in which suit to enforce the lien of a materialman or subcontractor must be brought. This is so because the general contractor is not the party against whom the lien is to be enforced, and is not interested in that phase of the litigation. Green v. Clifford, 94 Cal. 49, 29 Pac. 331; Western Sash, etc. Co. v. Heiman, 65 Kan. 5, 68 Pac. 1080; Cassery v. Wayne Circuit Judge, 124 Mich. 157, 82 N. W. 841, 83 Am. St. Rep. 320. And see other cases collected in note 81, 27 Cyc. 344.

These cases are analogous to the cases under consideration, and their reasoning is applicable. The trustees under the mortgage of the Citizens' Street Railway Company are no more interested in the enforcement of this lien than a general contractor would be.

Inasmuch, therefore, as none of the parties defendant are entitled to set up the plea of the statutory period of limitations prescribed for mechanic's lien suits, as against the amended bill, it follows that the amendment must be held to relate back to the commencement [392] of the original suit. As amended by the addition of the new parties, these proceedings conform to all the requirements insisted on by the defendants.

We cannot agree that the attachment herein levied under the original bill can be treated as void in view of the amendment made to that bill.

Our statute provides that:

"The attachment law shall be liberally construed, and the plaintiff, before or during trial, shall be permitted to amend any defect of form in the affidavit, bond, attachment, or other proceedings; and no attachment shall be dismissed for any defect in, or want of, bond, if the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, will substitute a sufficient bond." Shannon's Code, section 5237.

There is no question in this case of any intervening attachments—attachments levied by others between the original bill and the amended bill. As seen before, no claim can be asserted against the interests of the new defendants. Lillard v. Porter, 2 Head (Tenn.) 177; Watt v. Carnes, 4 Heisk. (Tenn.) 532, and such cases are not in point.

The general rule as stated in Ruling Case Law with reference to amendments in attachment proceedings is as follows:

"Under the liberal statutes in force in many states the plaintiff will be allowed to correct defects and irregularities by amendment of the declaration or complaint. Defects in parties or a variance between [393] the names of the parties as stated in the attachment and the declaration or complaint may be cured in this manner. And defects in the form of declaring obviously may be cured by amendment, and neither subsequently attaching creditors nor bail can take advantage thereof. So an amendment changing the form of the action, merely, or adding a new count for the same, will not dissolve the attachment. Nor will the attachment be dissolved by an amendment which merely sets the cause forth with greater detail." 2 R. C. L. p. 851.

The original bill in this case sought to subject to complainant's debt the interest of the hotel company in the land attached upon the supposition that the hotel company owned the entire estate therein at the time complainant's lien accrued. The object of the amended bill was the same, but, inasmuch as part of the estate was asserted to be in the trustees of the old mortgage, the complainant asked that the rights of such trustees, the new defendants, be determined, and that the real interest of the hotel company, whatever it was, should be subjected to his claim.

Such an amendment is permissible, and does not affect the validity of the attachment nor the lien of the complainant. Morrow v. Fossick, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 129, is quite in point. In that case an attachment was levied on the property of a nonresident, and a plea in abatement was filed setting out that the property attached belonged to a firm of which the original defendant was a member, and not to the original [394] defendant himself. The bill was then amended so as to reach the interest of the original defendant in the firm and the other members of the firm were made parties. This amendment was permitted by the court. The court held the property taken under the original attachment and proceeded to determine the rights of the parties.

To like effect see Lookout Bank v. Susong, 90 Tenn. 590, 18 S. W. 389; Wilson v. Beadle, 2 Head (Tenn.) 512.

The Chisca Hotel property was brought before the court by the attachment levy, and the complainant's amendment amounts to a mere release of his asserted lien thereupon, in so far as the title of the trustees is concerned. A plaintiff who has attached a defendant's effects, both at law and in equity, may be allowed to dismiss his attachment at law and proceed in equity. Magill v. Manson, 20 Gratt. (Va.) 527.

The defense made to the lien asserted for the complainant is extremely technical. It has often been said in Tennessee that the mechanic's lien statutes are to be liberally construed, and that technical niceties of construction will not be allowed to defeat their purpose. Williams v. Birmingham, etc. R. Co. 129 Tenn. 680, 688, 168 S. W. 160, and cases therein cited.

The rules announced in Lane v. Marshall, 1 Heisk. (Tenn.) 30, that the equitable interest in land cannot be reached unless the holder of the legal title is made a party to the proceedings, and that proceedings against the equitable title, in the absence of the [395] holder of the legal title, are ineffective, have been adopted in many of our cases. These cases are reviewed in King v. Patter- son, 129 Tenn. 1, 164 S. W. 1191, and these rules again applied. These principles are too firmly embedded in our jurisprudence at this time to be shaken. However, none of the cases have involved the claims of mechanics asserting their statutory liens.

In this case it appears that the old trust deed executed by the Citizens' Street Railway Company has matured. All bonds have been paid off which were secured by this mortgage, except a few that cannot be located. Funds have been deposited in a New York bank to pay these scattering bonds outstanding, and advertisement has been made for the holders thereof. Several years ago the Memphis Street Railway took over the properties of the Citizens' Street Railway Company and assumed the indebtedness of the latter concern. The Memphis Street Railway made arrangements with the Central Trust Company of New York to take care of the bonds of the Citizens' Street Railway and collateral was deposited with the trust company to protect the bonds of the Citizens' Street Railway. So for a long while the bondholders of the Citizens' Street Railway Company secured by this old mortgage have been protected. For years such bondholders have had no real interest in this particular piece of realty involved in this suit. True, the trustees under the old mortgage held the legal title to secure the payment of the old bonds until all of said [396] bonds were satisfied, but, as a matter of fact, said bonds have been protected and arrangements perfected for their satisfaction long since.

Under such circumstances it would be highly inequitable to repel this lien claimant because of his original failure to name as defendants to his suit representatives of those having so little interest in the property sought to be charged. As a matter of fact, such defendants were little more than nominal defendants.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the chancellor's decree, in so far as he denied complainant's lien, was erroneous. In that respect the decree will be reversed. There is no exception taken here to the amount found to be due the complainant. The cause will be remanded to the end that proper steps may be had for the enforcement of the complainant's lien.

There is no doubt but that an equitable estate may be subjected to a mechanic's lien, nor that the owner of such estate is the owner upon whom the statutory notice should be served by the subcontractor, when it is sought to charge the equity. Gillespie v. Bradford, 7 Yerg. (Tenn.) 168, 27 Am. Dec. 494; Reid v. Tennessee Bank, 1 Sneed (Tenn.) 262; Alley v. Lanier, 1 Cold. (Tenn.) 540; Daniel v. Weaver, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 392; Ragon v. Howard, 97 Tenn. 334, 37 S. W. 136.

The levy is upon the same land, whether the equity or legal title be attached. The levy made, taken in [397] connection with the contents of the amended bill, and applying the doctrine of relation, is a valid levy upon the equitable interest of the Chickasaw Hotel Company in the property described.

The costs of appeal will be paid by defendants. Costs below will be taxed by the chancellor.

NOTE.

The ruling of the reported case is that although a trustee of the premises on which a lien is sought to be enforced is a necessary party to the foreclosure of the lien, the failure to make him a party is not a ground for the dismissal of the action. As to who are necessary or proper parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, see the note to Bacon v. Reichelt, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

CAIN

v.

PARFITT ET AL.

Utah Supreme Court—February 8, 1916.

48 Utah 81; 153 Pac. 448.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Parties.

Under Comp. Laws 1907, § 2914, providing that any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, one who, under a contract for sale of land, by instalments, claims a lien prior and superior to mechanics' liens on the property, although not an indispensable party, is properly made a defendant in the proceeding to enforce the mechanics' liens, for the purpose of determining the amount and character of his claim.

Foreclosure Decree as Adjudication.

In an action to foreclose a contract for purchase of land because of a breach by failure of the purchaser to pay instalments, where plaintiff was made a defendant in a prior action by holders of mechanics' liens on the property, and answered, setting forth his contract, its breach, and claiming a lien prior and superior to the mechanics' liens, and obtained a judgment to the full extent of his claims, there is a binding adjudication of his claims, and he cannot bring another action to foreclose the lien.

Appeal from District Court, Salt Lake county: LOOFBOUROW, Judge.

Action by Addison Cain, plaintiff, against George H. Parfitt et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

C. E. Norton and H. J. Fitzgerald for appellants.

F. E. McCracken for respondent.

[83] FRICK, J.—On November 29, 1913, the plaintiff commenced this action against George H. and A. Parfitt, as copartners, Thomas A. Davis, West Temple Terrace Company, a corporation, and Graham Lawrence, to foreclose a certain contract of purchase, whereby West Temple Terrace Company, hereinafter called the company, purchased from the plaintiff a certain parcel of real estate, which is specifically described both in the complaint and in said contract of purchase.

It is, in substance, alleged in the complaint that on the 21st day of November, 1910, said company entered into a contract with the plaintiff, whereby it purchased the real estate described therein for the sum of $1,200, of which sum $200 was paid in cash and the remainder said company agreed to pay in monthly installments of twenty dollars each, commencing with the month of January, 1911; that said contract was duly recorded in March, 1911; that it was therein provided that in case default should be made by said company in making any of said monthly payments, the plaintiff "was authorized to declare the whole amount due and payable at once," and that thereafter the interest on said indebtedness should be increased from eight to twelve per cent per annum; that prior to the 15th day of March, 1911, said company made default on its monthly payments, and that the plaintiff then elected to, and did, declare the whole amount due as in said contract provided. It is further alleged that on July 5, 1913, the defendants George H. and A. Parfitt, Davis and a number of others, obtained judgments in an action against said company for the foreclosure of certain mechanics' liens against the property in question; that said defendants George H. and A. Parfitt and Davis, by reason of said judgments, claimed some interest in the real estate described in said contract, but that such interests are inferior to plaintiff's lien under said contract for the reason that said contract was given for the purchase price of the real estate in question. The amount due on the contract was alleged to be $980, with interest at twelve per cent from March 15, 1911, and plaintiff demanded the sum of $250 in addition as an attorney's fee.

[84] The defendants George H. and A. Parfitt demurred to the complaint. The de-murrer was overruled, and they filed an answer, in which they, in effect, denied the allegations thereof, and, in substance, averred that they, as co-partners, furnished material and performed labor for said company for the erection of a building on the premises described in the complaint and in said contract, and that on the 21st day of April, 1911, in compliance with the statute of this state, they perfected a mechanic's lien against the said company, which became a lien on the premises aforesaid; that said Davis and a number of others had, about the same time, also obtained mechanics' liens for materials furnished and labor performed for said company for the building being erected on said premises as aforesaid; that said George H. and A. Parfitt, pursuant to the statute of this state, in February, 1912, published notice of their intention to foreclose said mechanic's lien; that immediately upon the publication of said notice the said George H. and A. Parfitt commenced an action in the District Court of Salt Lake County against said company and against all other lien claimants, including the plaintiff herein, making all of them defendants; that all of said defendants, including the plaintiff herein, filed their verified answers in said action. The answer of the plaintiff filed in said action is made a part of the record, and by reference thereto it appears that the plaintiff, in said answer, made practically the same averments which are contained in his complaint in this action, and he there declared that he had elected to declare the whole amount specified in said contract as due and payable forthwith. The plaintiff also averred in said answer what payments had been made on said contract, which were the same as alleged in this action; that he is entitled to twelve per cent interest and an attorney's fee. The court, in said action, found that there was due and owing to the plaintiff on said contract the sum of $980, with interest on said sum at the rate of twelve per cent from March 15, 1911, precisely what is found due in this action. As a conclusion of law the court also declared said sum of $980 to be a first lien on the premises in question, and also allowed plaintiff an attorney's fee in the same amount that was allowed to the other mechanic's lien claimants as [85] provided by our statute. The court also allowed plaintiff the amount advanced by him for taxes and costs, the same as in this action. The court ordered foreclosed said mechanics' liens in favor of the lien claimants, found the amount due on each claim, and ordered the premises in question sold, subject, however, to plaintiffs' lien for said $980 and the taxes paid by him as aforesaid. The plaintiff, therefore, was given precisely the same relief in said action that he is given in this, except that in the present action he is awarded an additional sum of $250 as an attorney's fee. The record also discloses that the real estate in question was sold subject to plaintiff's claim to satisfy the mechanics' liens; that the defendants George H. and A. Parfitt purchased the property in question on said sale, and obtained a sheriff's deed therefor. It is further made to appear that the property has again been sold by a receiver to satisfy the amount found due on plaintiff's said contract, together with the taxes and attorney's fee as aforesaid. The defendants George H. and A. Parfitt, it seems, have during all of the time the present proceedings were pending, objected, in season and out of season, to plaintiff's right to maintain the present action and to again foreclose said contract. Having failed in their object in the court below, they now, on appeal, invoke the aid of this court, and in substance contend that the trial court erred in overruling their demurrer, in permitting the plaintiff to maintain the present action, in allowing an additional attorney's fee, in appointing the receiver and in ordering the premises sold by the receiver to satisfy plaintiff's claim, and in confirming the receiver's sale.

It will be observed that the order of sale in the prior action was expressly made subject to the amount found due to plaintiff on his purchase-price money contract, which was declared to be a first or paramount lien on the property in question, and to which all other liens were declared to be subject and inferior. The plaintiff was made a defendant in the preceding action, however, for the express purpose of determining the amount, as well as the character, of his claim. If it were assumed, therefore, that inasmuch as plaintiff claimed to be and was the holder of a prior and [86] superior lien on the premises in question, therefore he was not an indispensable party to the action, yet, under our statute, Comp. Laws 1907, Section 2914, he was properly made a defendant. That section, so far as material here, provides that:

"Any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff."

It is generally held by the courts that under such a statute all who claim an interest in the premises upon which liens are claimed by the parties claiming such liens are proper defendants, notwithstanding that their liens may be prior and paramount. It is, however, also generally held that they are not indispensable parties to such actions.

The fact remains in this case, however, that the plaintiff was made a defendant in the prior action which was commenced to foreclose the mechanics' liens. He appeared in that action and set forth his contract, and asked that the whole amount be declared due and payable forthwith; that his lien be declared to be superior to all the mechanics' liens; that his claim from thenceforth bear twelve per cent interest, and that he be awarded an attorney's fee as against the other lien claimants. All those claims were considered and determined in his favor. The premises were ordered sold, therefore, subject to his lien. Suppose that in that action the court had adjudged plaintiff's claim to be inferior to the mechanics' liens, and he had not assailed that judgment on appeal, would he not have been bound thereby? He was made a defendant the same as all other lien claimants were, and, like all others, he set up his claim and had it adjudicated. Why is he not bound, as all others are bound, by that adjudication? By what process of reasoning can he again come into court and ask that his contract be again foreclosed, and that he be awarded attorney's fees and costs out of the property a second time? As a matter of course, he did not lose his lien simply because the premises were sold subject thereto, but that order did not give him the right to bring a second action for the purpose of obtaining a second judgment or decree of foreclosure of his contract. All that he was entitled to was to have the premises sold and out of [87] the proceeds of sale to be paid the amount found due him in the action, together with the taxes, and interest on both items, and the attorney's fee allowed him in the first action. Plaintiff already had an enforceable judgment and the right to have it enforced continued until the judgment was satisfied or the right to enforce it was barred. In other words, that action, so far as plaintiffs' rights were concerned, continued to be pending until the judgment was satisfied. Sweetser v. Fox, 43 Utah 45, Ann. Cas. 1916C 620, 134 Pac. 509, 47 L.R.A. (N.S.) 145. But instead of merely being allowed to enforce his claim he is not only awarded judgment for the same again, but is allowed an additional $250 as an attorney's fee when he already had been awarded an attorney's fee in the other action. This may not be done. The former action was purely equitable, and so is this one. It was the duty, therefore, of the court in both actions to protect the interests of all concerned. The property in question was, so to speak, the fund out of which all lien claimants were to be reimbursed. The surplus, if any, belonged to the owner of the property. In this case the property having been sold upon the order of the court in the prior action to the defendants George H. and A. Parfitt, they are entitled to all that remains after the amount found due the plaintiff in the first action is paid, unless there are other legitimate claims to which the proceeds equitably shall be applied. Suppose the Parfitts had come into court at any time before the plaintiff obtained judgment in the present action and had paid the amount found due him in the first action with taxes and interest, would it not have discharged the premises purchased by them under the first order of sale from all of plaintiff's claims against it? No one can doubt that. The situation was therefore the same as though they had discharged any other judgment which was a lien upon the premises.

True, one may bring an action upon a judgment and recover, but he may not bring a second action upon the original cause of action, as was done here. Then again, it is not at all likely that a court of equity would permit a claimant to exhaust the property or the fund by making unnecessary costs in bringing successive actions. Nor would any court be authorized [88] to allow an attorney's fee a second time upon the same cause of action. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court erred in allowing out of the proceeds of sale the $250 as an attorney's fee. It is quite enough that plaintiff was permitted to carry along his claim at twelve per cent interest. The court should have ordered the premises sold under the first judgment for all claims, including the plaintiff's, and should then have stopped the accruing of this excessive interest. The Parfitts, however, cannot complain of the court's action in ordering plaintiff's claim under the contract to be paid out of the proceeds of sale. They have a right, however, to insist that the plaintiff shall not be given more than his claim, and that right we have sought to protect.

We have not discussed the assignment relating to the overruling of the demurrer, for the reason that, in our judgment, the defect urged by counsel against the complaint did not sufficiently appear upon the face of it to be reached by demurrer. Besides, we deem it quite as well to dispose of the case upon the whole record.

In view of the present state of the record the other assignments are really not before us for review, and for that reason we express no opinion upon them.

The judgment of the district court by which the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $250 as an attorney's fee is therefore reversed, and the cause is remanded to the district court of Salt Lake county, with directions to set aside its findings of fact and conclusions of law by which it allowed the plaintiff said sum of $250 as an attorney's fee, and that it enter an order or judgment, dismissing the complaint filed in this action as against the appellants George H. and A. Parfitt, and that it enter judgment requiring the plaintiff to repay the said appellants said sum of $250, with interest and costs. Appellants to recover costs on this appeal.

ON APPLICATION FOR REHEARING.

CITY SASH AND DOOR COMPANY ET AL.

v.

BUNN ET AL.

FRICK, J.—Counsel for respondent has filed a petition for a modification of the judgment. In view of the very unsatisfactory [89] condition of the record on appeal, we were in much doubt with regard to what the judgment should be. It is now made to appear that the judgment as it appears in the original opinion should, in some respects, be modified. It is further made to appear that the respondent did not actually receive the amount of the attorney's fee, although it was awarded to him and although the premises in question were sold. The judgment requiring the repayment of said attorney's fees should therefore be modified. It is further made to appear that there are other matters that should be left for the determination of the district court. The judgment is therefore modified to read as follows:

The judgment of the district court by which the plaintiff was awarded the sum of $250 as an attorney's fee is reversed, and the cause is remanded to the district court, with directions to set aside its findings of fact and conclusions of law upon that question, and that it enter judgment disallowing the plaintiff any attorney's fee in this action; that in all other matters the cause is remanded to said court, and it is directed to make disposition of all matters in accordance with the evidence before it. Appellant to recover costs.

Straup, C. J., and McCarty, J., concur.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that while another lien claimant is merely a proper party and not a necessary party to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, an adjudication of such other claimants' rights in the foreclosure suit is final and conclusive. See the note to Bacon v. Reichelt, reported ante, this volume, at page 1, for an extensive discussion of the question who are necessary or proper parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien.

Washington Supreme Court—April 19, 1916.

90 Wash. 669; 156 Pac. 854.

Appeal and Error — Dismissal — Notice of Motion.

Under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1733, providing that motion to dismiss an appeal shall be made at such time as shall be fixed by the rules of court and under supreme court rules 18, 19 (132 Pac. xiii, xiv), a motion to strike the transcript and dismiss the appeal, on the ground that no statement of facts had been brought up and no exceptions taken below, cannot be considered, where not made on ten days' notice.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Parties.

The proceeding to establish and foreclose a mechanic's lien being one in rem, the owner of the property sought to be subjected to the lien is a necessary party, as jurisdiction of the property can be procured in no other manner, so such owner must be made a party within the time limited to institute action.

Institution of Foreclosure — Time.

Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1138, declares that no lien shall bind the property for a period longer than eight calendar months after claim has been filed, unless action be commenced within that time to enforce such lien. Laws 1893, p. 407, § 1, passed at the same session of the legislature, declares that civil actions in the several superior courts shall be commenced by service of process. This section, as amended by Laws 1895, appears as Rem. & Bal. Code, § 220, providing that civil actions in the several superior courts shall be commenced by the service of a summons or by filing a complaint with the county clerk as clerk of the court, but unless service has been had on defendant prior to the filing of the complaint, plaintiff shall cause one or more of the defendants to be served personally. It is held that as the provision with respect to the duration of the lien is not a statute of limitation, but marks the extent of the lien, service of process on the owner of the property on which the lien is sought must be had within the eight-month period, notwithstanding the subsequent amendment of Laws 1893 (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 220) relating to commencement of actions.

Consolidation of Proceedings — Effect — Party Not Served in One Proceeding.

Where several actions to foreclose a mechanic's lien were consolidated, the fact that the court had inherent power to consolidate the several actions does not relieve the several lien claimants of the duty to serve process on the owner of the premises, and by imputation make the service in favor of some of the lien claimants effective as to the others.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county: HUMPHRIES, Judge.

Action by City Sash and Door Company et al., plaintiffs, against Margaret Bunn et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Certain defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

George L. Palmer and Beechler & Batchelor for appellants.

Jas. A. Dougan for respondent City Sash and Door Company.

Reeves Aylmore for respondent Taylor Mill Company.

[670] ELLIS, J.—Action to foreclose a large number of mechanics' liens on lot 7, in block 42, of T. Hanford's addition to Seattle. The case is here upon the transcript, findings, conclusions and decree, which are so voluminous as to prohibit a statement of more than a bare outline. At the time the work was done, materials furnished and liens filed, covering the period from August 29, 1913, to February 10, 1914, Joseph A. McGinty and wife were the owners of the property. The work was done and the materials furnished at their instance for the construction of two houses, one on the north half, the other on the south half of the lot. On September 30, 1914, McGinty and wife conveyed the south half of the lot to Margaret Bunn and husband; and in October, 1914, [671] the north half to Louis Bernheim. Originally, four actions were instituted, numbered and entitled on the records of the superior court for King county as follows: Cause No. 97635, Recchio v. McGinty et al., to foreclose a lien on all of lot 7. In this case, cross-complaints in intervention were filed by Charles Denny and S. W. R. Dally. Cause No. 99669, Hanson v. McGinty et al., to foreclose a lien which, also, covered all of lot 7. Cause No. 99054, City Sash & Door Company v. McGinty et al., to foreclose a lien upon the north half of lot 7. In this case, a complaint in intervention was filed by Bass-Heuter Paint Company to foreclose a claim of lien on the entire lot. Cause No. 99056, City Sash & Door Company v. McGinty et al., to foreclose a claim of lien on the south half of lot 7. Four cross-complaints in intervention to foreclose claims of lien were filed in this case, one by D. J. McHugh covering the south half of lot 7; the second, by Taylor Mill Company, originally covering the north half of lot 7 but amended at the trial to cover the south half of the lot; the third, by Arrow Electric Company covering the entire lot; the fourth, by Bass-Heuter Paint Company covering the entire lot.

The court made specific findings as to the time and character of service and persons served with summons, complaint and cross-complaints in each case, and a general finding that no process of any kind or nature was served upon McGinty and wife other than as in the special findings stated.

On December 22, 1914, after all the services that were ever made had been either made personally or commenced by publication, the four cases were consolidated pursuant to stipulation signed by the attorneys for the various plaintiffs and interveners.

On February 18, 1915, Margaret Bunn and husband and Louis Bernheim appeared specially and moved to dismiss the several causes of action on the ground that they were then the owners of lot 7, had never been served with summons in any of the actions except on the cross-complaint of Arrow [672] Electric Company, and that none of the actions, either by complaint or cross-complaint, had been commenced within eight months after the filing of the respective claims of lien. The motion was denied, and Bernheim and the Bunn were made additional parties defendant to all of the complaints and complaints in intervention, over their objections. This was long after the expiration of eight months from the filing of any of the lien claims. Thereupon the Bunn and Bernheim filed separate answers, setting up substantially the same facts as advanced on their motions. After trial, the court made findings of fact and conclusions of law, and thereon entered personal judgments against McGinty and wife for the amounts found due to each of the respective lien claimants, and a decree establishing as valid all of the liens claimed, and ordered sale of the two half lots and the buildings thereon to satisfy the liens so established against each half respectively, surplus, if any, of the proceeds of the north half to be paid to Bernheim and of the south half to the Bunn. The defendants Margaret Bunn and husband and Louis Bernheim appeal.

No brief has been filed by any respondent in defense of the decree on the merits. Respondents City Sash & Door Company and Taylor Mill Company, on the hearing in this court, filed identical motions to strike the transcript and dismiss the appeal on the ground that no statement of facts has been brought up and no exceptions were taken to the court's findings. There is no merit in the motions. Moreover, they were presented on only three days notice. Our rules require ten days notice. Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1733 (P. C. 81, § 1219), Supreme Court Rules 18 and 19.

No exceptions were taken to the findings. Appellants concede that they are sufficient to sustain the judgments and decree in favor of Recchio, Denny, Dally and Arrow Electric Company, but insist that they are wholly insufficient to sustain any decree establishing liens in favor of the respondents Hanson, City Sash and Door Company, Bass-Heuter Paint [673] Company, McHugh and Taylor Mill Company, in that they affirmatively show that no service of process conferring jurisdiction as to any of these was made upon the owner of the premises within the life of any of their liens.

The special statute limiting the life of mechanics' liens, Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1138 (P. C. 309, § 71; Laws 1893, p. 35, § 9) declares:

"No lien created by this chapter binds the property subject to the lien for a longer period than eight calendar months after the claim has been filed unless an action be commenced in the proper court within that time to enforce such lien; . . ."

This is not a statute of limitations. It "limits the duration of the lien." Peterson v. Dillon, 27 Wash. 78, 67 Pac. 397; Davis v. Bartz, 65 Wash. 395, 118 Pac. 334. The general statute governing the commencement of actions passed at the same session of the legislature (Laws 1893, p. 407, § 1) declared:

"Civil actions in the several superior courts of this state shall be commenced by the service of a summons, as hereinafter provided."

The last quoted section was amended in 1895 (Laws 1895, p. 170, § 1; Rem. & Bal. Code, § 220 [P. C. 81, § 131]), to read as follows:

"Civil actions in the several superior courts of this state shall be commenced by the service of a summons, as hereinafter provided, or by filing a complaint with the county clerk as clerk of the court: Provided, that unless service has been had on the defendant prior to the filing of the complaint, the plaintiff shall cause one or more of the defendants to be served personally, or commence service by publication within ninety days from the date of filing the complaint."

Unless the special statute (Id. § 1138) was, by implication, also amended by the amendment of the general statute governing commencement of actions, thus extending the life of the lien merely by filing a complaint, it is plain that the [674] lien is lost as to any necessary defendant who is not served with summons within the eight months.

The owner of property subject to a mechanics' lien at the time of suit is a necessary party to an action to foreclose the lien. The proceeding to establish and foreclose the lien is, in a sense, in rem. Jurisdiction of the subject matter can only be acquired by service, actual or constructive, upon the owner of the interest sought to be subjected and within the statutory life of the lien. Littell, etc. Mfg. Co. v. Miller, 3 Wash. 480, 28 Pac. 1035; Sagmeister v. Foss, 4 Wash. 320, 30 Pac. 80, 744; Peterson v. Dillon, 27 Wash. 78, 67 Pac. 397; Powell v. Nolan, 27 Wash. 318, 67 Pac. 712, 68 Pac. 389; Northwest Bridge Co. v. Tacoma Shipbuilding Co. 36 Wash. 333, 78 Pac. 996; Rees v. Wilson, 50 Wash. 339, 97 Pac. 245; Pickens v. Polk, 42 Neb. 267, 60 N. W. 566; Ortwine v. Caskey, 43 Md. 134; Hughes v. Torgerson, 96 Ala. 346, 11 So. 209, 38 Am. St. Rep. 105, 16 L.R.A. 600.

Our own decisions above cited were nearly all in cases where it was sought to foreclose liens on community property by serving only the husband within the life of the lien. It was held in all of these that the wife was a necessary party because the community of which she was a member was the owner of the property. In those cases, it was also held that service of summons on one spouse is not the commencement of an action as to the other; and in the Peterson and Northwest Bridge Co. cases, it was held that the bringing in of the wife subsequent to the expiration of the lien is of no avail and confers no jurisdiction to enforce the lien. We have also repeatedly held—and the holding was inevitable—that, under the provisions of § 220 above quoted, the filing of the complaint is not the commencement of an action but only a tentative commencement, wholly abortive unless followed by personal service on one or more defendants, or by the commencement of service by publication within ninety days. "Both must exist before the action is commenced." Deming Invest. Co. v. Ely, 21 Wash. 102, 57 Pac. 353; Fuhrman v. [675] Power, 43 Wash. 533, 86 Pac. 940; McPhee v. Nida, 60 Wash. 619, 111 Pac. 1049.

When it is remembered that § 1138 is not a mere statute of limitations limiting the time of commencing actions, but fixes a limit to the very existence of the lien, it is palpable that no action to foreclose a mechanics' lien can be deemed commenced until the necessary parties to its maintenance have been served either personally or by publication of summons. It would seem, also, that this must be done within the eight months of the statutory life of the lien, because jurisdiction of such parties, under the foregoing decisions, is an essential to any action "to enforce such lien" which is the kind of action which must be commenced within that time under the terms of the statute. The life of the lien, as fixed by the special statute on that subject, cannot be held to be extended for ninety days merely by the filing of a complaint within the eight months, though followed by service after the eight months but within ninety days as required by the general statute as to commencement of actions subsequently passed. No such implication is necessary, since the filing of the complaint and the service or publication of summons thereafter at any time within ninety days may both be accomplished within the eight months of the life of the lien, thus giving scope for the operation of all the provisions of the general statute, § 220, without extending the statutory life of the lien as fixed by the special statute, § 1138. Since the implication is not necessary, we cannot indulge it. It follows that personal service must be made upon, or service by publication must be commenced against, such necessary parties within eight months after the lien is filed, else the court acquires no jurisdiction to enforce the lien. We have in effect so held in Rees v. Wilson, supra, and Davis v. Bartz, supra.

An examination of the transcript as to the publication of summons, and of the court's findings as to the filing of liens, complaints, and cross-complaints, and as to service thereon, [676] makes it plain that the court acquired no jurisdiction within the life of their respective liens to enforce the liens claimed in favor of the respondents H. A. Hanson, City Sash & Door Company, Bass-Heuter Paint Company, D. J. McHugh, and Taylor Mill Company, or any of them. As to the complaint of H. A. Hanson, the findings disclose that there was no service of process, either actual or constructive, within eight months or at all, upon any of the parties. As to the City Sash & Door Company, no party was served with summons on either of its complaints within eight months after its lien claims were filed; and the owners of the property, the McGintys, were never served with any process. As to the complaints in intervention of Bass-Heuter Paint Company and D. J. McHugh, no process of any nature was served, either personally or by publication, upon the necessary parties, the McGintys, at any time. As to the claim of Taylor Mill Company, the findings disclose that, though the complaint in intervention was filed within eight months after the filing of the lien claim, the publication of the summons against the necessary parties, the McGintys, was not commenced until long after the expiration of the eight months. In any event, it was fatally defective. The affidavit of publication in the transcript shows that the summons as published described other property than that actually covered by the amended complaint.

It seems to have been contended in the lower court, on the authority of Peterson v. Dillon, supra, that, because of the inherent power of the court to consolidate the several actions, such consolidation gave the court jurisdiction of all parties who theretofore had appeared or had been served in either of the actions, and that, by some sort of imputed service, the appearance of the necessary parties, McGinty and wife, in the Recchio case inured as an appearance to all the other complaints and cross-complaints. The language used in the Peterson case, however, must be confined to the facts in that case. It can only apply where the subject-matter and issues [677] are identical and where the relation of the parties thereto are the same in each case, which was true of the cases there consolidated. Neither this court nor any other court, so far as we are advised, has ever held that a judgment on a complaint, cross-complaint, or complaint in intervention setting up an independent cause of action may be rendered without service on any necessary party merely because the case in which it is filed was consolidated with an action by another party on a different cause of action in which such service had been made. Such a holding would impinge the constitutional guaranty of due process of law. This court has expressly held that no jurisdiction is acquired to render judgment on a cross-complaint setting up a mechanics' lien in the absence of service of summons or copy of such cross-complaint upon the defendant, giving him a chance to plead. Powell v. Nolan, supra.

The decree, in so far as it establishes and forecloses the liens in favor of the respondents Hanson, City Sash & Door Company, Bass-Heuter Paint Company, McHugh, and Taylor Mill Company, is reversed, and the cause is remanded with directions to modify the decree in accordance with this opinion and dismiss their several complaints and cross-complaints in intervention. Appellants may recover their costs.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that in a suit to foreclose a mechanic's lien the owner of the property against which the lien is sought to be enforced is a necessary party defendant. For a discussion as to who are necessary or proper parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, see the note to Bacon v. Reichelt, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

HOPPER ET AL.

Mechanics' Liens — Foreclosure — Parties.

Comp. St. 1910, § 3806, providing that in suits to enforce mechanics' liens the parties to the "controversy" shall be made parties, and those not made parties shall not be bound, adds practically nothing to what the law would be without it, for it leaves the matter of parties to be determined by the court, and does not make the contractor a necessary or indispensable party to a suit by one furnishing labor and materials to the contractor; the word "controversy" being defined as a dispute arising between two or more persons in a civil action at law or in equity or a proceeding at law.

Right to Lien — Contractor Paid in Full.

Where a lien is claimed for labor performed or materials furnished to a contractor, the right to the lien or its enforcement does not depend on the condition of the accounts between the owner and the contractor, and the fact that there is nothing due from the owner to the contractor does not defeat the lien.

Necessary Parties to Foreclosure Action.

Under Comp. St. 1910, §§ 3806, 3809, 3816, providing that in suits to enforce mechanics' liens the parties to the controversy shall be made parties, and constructive service may be had on any nonresident, and providing that, when the debtor has been served by publication, the judgment, if for plaintiff, shall be for the amount of the indebtedness to be levied out of the property charged with the lien, and requiring the contractor to defend an action to enforce a lien, and declaring that, pending the action, the owner may withhold from the contractor the amount of money for which a lien is filed, the contractor is a necessary party in a suit by a subcontractor to enforce a mechanic's lien in the sense that the owner may require that he be made a party, or by proper and timely objection defeat the action for failure to make him a party, though he is not an "indispensable party," who is one who must be brought into court before the controversy may be determined.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The failure of a subcontractor suing to enforce a mechanic's lien to make the contractor a party may be waived by the owner.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where, in a suit to foreclose a subcontractor's lien, the petition named the contractor a party, but there was a failure to make him a party because of the insufficiency of constructive service on him while a nonresident, the owner, on discovering the facts, must raise the objection of failure to make the contractor a party by amended answer, setting forth defective constructive service on the contractor.

Error to District Court, Laramie county: MENTZER, Judge.

Action by John W. Hopper et al., plaintiffs, against Charles Becker et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

Burke & Riner for plaintiff in error, Charles Becker.

Marion A. Kline for defendants in error.

[214] POTTER, C. J.—This was an action brought by the defendants in error, John W. Hopper and Edward T. Bartley, co-partners doing business under the name of Hopper & Bartley, to enforce an alleged mechanics' lien upon certain real estate of the plaintiff in error, Charles Becker, upon which the plaintiff in error, Henry Becker, held a mortgage; the lien being claimed for certain work performed and materials furnished in and about the construction of a building, at the request of and for the firm of Brice & Mitchell, the contractors engaged in constructing said building. The case came to this court on error for review of the judgment entered upon the trial of the action establishing the lien for the sum of $950.27 and costs of suit, including $25 for attorney's fees. Upon the original hearing in this court the cause was ordered remanded to the District Court with directions to modify the judgment by deducting the sum of $392 from the amount of the lien and striking out the amount allowed as attorney's fees, and as so modified the judgment was affirmed. (22 Wyo. 237, Ann. Cas. 1916D 1041, 138 Pac. 179.) The plaintiff in error, Charles Becker, filed a petition for rehearing, complaining only of the conclusion stated in the opinion that the plaintiffs in error as defendants below, by failing to raise the objection by answer, had waived the objection that the surviving member of the firm of Brice & Mitchell, the original contractors, had not been brought into the case as a party defendant by proper constructive service. The defendants in error also filed a petition for rehearing, alleging error in the conclusions of the court in three particulars: 1. In holding the statute allowing an attorney's fee in the case to be unconstitutional. 2. In holding the provisions of Chapter 68 of the Laws of 1911, with reference to the sufficiency of a lien [215] statement, inapplicable to this case. 3. In holding that the item of $1,292 was insufficiently described in the lien statement to entitle the parties filing the same to a lien. A rehearing was granted, and the cause has again been heard. A reconsideration of the points on which a rehearing was asked has failed to convince the court of any error in the previous decision, and the writer hereof, who did not participate in that decision, joins the other members of the court in the view that the conclusions stated in the former opinion should be adhered to. The questions again raised by the petition of the defendants in error are sufficiently discussed in the former opinion, and what was there said as to those questions will be adopted for the purpose of disposing of them upon this rehearing.

In the petition of plaintiff in error for a rehearing it was stated that the objection that there was a defect of parties through the failure to properly bring the contractor into the case as a defendant was disposed of by the court on a ground not referred to in brief or oral argument or suggested at the original hearing, viz.: that the objection had been waived by the failure to raise it by answer. The argument against the view that the objection was so waived is confined to a review of the Missouri cases on the subject, on the theory that they should be followed here since our mechanics' lien statute was taken from that state. And it is contended that the effect of the Missouri decisions is to plainly declare it necessary and essential to a valid judgment enforcing a mechanics' lien that the one with whom the contract for the labor or materials was made by the lien claimant be properly brought into the case as a party defendant, and that where he is not made a party the defect is not waived by a failure to take the objection by demurrer or answer. We are not satisfied that such is clearly the result of the Missouri cases, where the action is brought in a court of record governed in the matter of procedure by the provision of the statute in that state, similar to our own, to the effect that the objection on the ground of a defect of parties is waived unless taken by demurrer or answer. [216] (Horstkotte v. Menier, 50 Mo. 158; Johnson-Frazier Lumber Co. v. Schuler, 49 Mo. App. 90.) In Horstkotte v. Menier, a case decided in 1872, the court said: "What we now hold is that the original contractor ought to be brought before the court as a co-defendant, for the purpose of protecting his own rights and those of the owner. But if he is not so brought before the court at the proper time, the judgment will not for this omission be error or void. The objection should have been taken by the owner by demurrer or answer. If he fails to demur when the defect appears on the petition, or fails to set up the non-joinder by answer when it does not appear on the face of the petition, he will be presumed to have waived the objection. (Wagn. Stat. 1014-1015, Secs. 6, 10.) The defect of parties cannot be reached by way of instruction." In Johnson-Frazier Lumber Co. v. Schuler, an action to enforce a mechanics' lien originally brought before a justice of the peace, the court said: "It is contended by the plaintiff that, although the appealing defendants had the right to have the contractors, Schuler & Muench, made co-defendants and served with process, yet, as that was not done, and as they took no steps before judgment to have it done, that they thereby waived their right. It has been oftentimes decided under our practice act that unless the objection of defect of parties to the record is made, either by demurrer or answer, it will be deemed waived. (Gimbel v. Pignero, 62 Mo. 240; Butler v. Lawson, 72 Mo. 227.) And this rule has been held to apply in actions brought upon mechanics' liens in courts of record. (Horstkotte v. Menier, 50 Mo. 158; Fruin v. Mitchell Furniture Co. 20 Mo. App. 313.) But the statute, Section 2047, upon which the foregoing rule of practice is based, is limited to actions in courts of record, section 2038, and hence is not applicable to actions brought before justices of the peace."

Our attention has not been called to any decision of the supreme court of Missouri overruling the case of Horstkotte v. Menier. But we are cited to a case in one of the intermediate appellate courts of that state, viz.: Steinmann [217] v. Strimple, 29 Mo. App. 478, wherein the court distinguished Horstkotte v. Menier from the case then under consideration by stating that the former was a case where the lien claimant was one whose contract had been made with a sub-contractor, so that the original or principal contractor was not one of the "parties to the contract" within the "mandatory provision" of the mechanics' lien statute that "the parties to the contract shall" be made parties.

The section of the Missouri statute prescribing the rule as to parties in an action to enforce a mechanics' lien provides that, "the parties to the contract shall, and all other persons interested in the matter in controversy or in the property charged with the lien may be made parties, but such as are not made parties shall not be bound by any such proceedings." The provision that the parties to the contract shall be made parties seems to be construed by the courts in that state to refer to the contract under which the lien claimant furnished the labor or materials, whether owner, a contractor, or sub-contractor. But whatever may be the effect of the Missouri decisions as to the question of waiver, though they would be persuasive as authority, they are not controlling, for the reason that while our mechanics' lien statute, as heretofore declared by this court, appears to have been taken from Missouri, the section of our statute with reference to parties in an action to enforce the lien is not the same as the corresponding section of the Missouri statute, but instead of the provision that "the parties to the contract" shall be made parties, it is declared by our statute that "the parties to the controversy shall . . . be made parties." (Comp. Stat. 1910, Sec. 3806.) The entire section reads as follows:

"In all suits under this chapter the parties to the controversy shall, and all other persons interested in the matter in controversy, and in the property charged in the lien, may be made parties, but such as are not made parties shall not be bound by any such proceeding, and constructive service may be had upon any defendant in suits brought under this chapter who may be non-residents of the state and cannot [218] be personally served with the summons within the state in the same manner as constructive service is had in other cases at law."

The provision for constructive service was added by a re-enactment of the section in 1886. (Laws 1886, Ch. 25, Sec. 4.) Otherwise the section remains as originally enacted in 1877. (Laws 1877, p. 79.) It is argued that while our statute requires that "parties to the controversy" shall be made parties, instead of parties to the contract, the provision is even broader than that of the Missouri statute, and must be held to include the parties to the contract. If that be conceded, we would still not be bound by the Missouri decisions construing the provision of their statute that "the parties to the contract" shall be made parties, for our legislature did not adopt that provision.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the comparative meaning and effect of the two statutes. But we are to ascertain whether the provision of our statute that "the parties to the controversy" shall be made parties to a suit brought to enforce a mechanics' lien requires that the contractor shall be made a party to authorize a judgment foreclosing the lien. "Controversy" is defined as "a dispute arising between two or more persons." (1 Bouvier's Law Dict.; 7 Ency. L. (2d ed.) 458.) "A dispute; a disputed question; a dispute arising between two or more persons; a law suit; a suit at law; a civil action or proceeding at law." (9 Cyc. 813-814.) "A dispute between two or more persons; a civil action, or suit, either at law or in equity." (1 Rapalje & Lawrence's Law Dict.) It is apparent that in the provision under consideration the word is not used in the sense of a suit, for that would make the provision read that in all suits the parties to the suit shall be made parties, which would be without practical meaning. It is rather to be understood as referring to the dispute, or the disputed question; so that its only force and effect would seem to be that the parties between whom the dispute has arisen shall be made parties. And that, taken literally, might exclude the contractor where there is no dispute between [219] him and the lien claimant. But if a personal judgment should be sought against the contractor it is clear that for that purpose it would be necessary to make him a party, although he might not dispute the account. And the owner might not dispute the amount claimed or the right of the claimant to a lien, in the sense of denying the alleged indebtedness or the right to a lien, though requiring before making payment, if only for his own protection, that a suit be brought and judgment obtained establishing the amount due and the lien. Manifestly, to apply this provision of the statute as to parties there must be some criterion for determining what constitutes the "controversy" or dispute. We think that criterion, at the outset at least, is the petition, and that in its averments and prayer, showing the cause of action and the relief sought, the "controversy" is to be found disclosed. If we are right in this interpretation of the provision, and we see no reason to doubt it, the provision adds practically nothing to what the law would be without it, for it does not prescribe or define who shall constitute or be deemed to be the parties to the controversy, but leaves that matter to be determined by the court, in the same manner as though the provision had been omitted from the statute. It certainly has no greater effect than if it had declared that the necessary parties to the controversy, or the parties necessary to the granting of the relief, shall be made parties to the suit. Had either phrase been used the provision would still be lacking in a definition of the term or words employed to designate the persons required to be made parties that could aid the court in determining in any case who are or who are not necessary parties to such a suit. Clearly, therefore, in our opinion, this statutory provision affords no ground for holding that the contractor is such a necessary and indispensable party to the suit that no judgment can be rendered establishing and foreclosing the lien unless he is made a party, or that the failure to make him a party cannot be waived by the owner.

Where the lien is claimed for labor performed for or materials furnished to a contractor the right to the lien or [220] its enforcement does not depend in this state upon the condition of the accounts between the owner and contractor. The fact that there is nothing due from the owner to the contractor will not defeat the lien of such a claimant. Hence there is not the same reason for making the contractor a party as under statutes limiting the lien of a sub-contractor, laborer or materialman to the amount due from the owner to the original contractor, or requiring that before the lien can be established the state of the accounts between the owner and contractor shall be adjudicated. But it is provided by our statute (Comp. Stat. 1910, Sec. 3816) as follows:

"In cases where a lien shall be filed under the provisions of this chapter, by any person other than a contractor, it shall be the duty of the contractor to defend any action brought thereon at his own expense, and during the pendency of such action the owner or agent may withhold from the contractor the amount of money for which said lien shall be filed, and in case of judgment being rendered against the owner or his property upon the lien, he shall be entitled to deduct from any amount due by him to the contractor the amount of such judgment and costs, and if he shall have settled in full with the contractor he shall be entitled to recover back from the contractor any amount so paid by the owner for which the contractor was originally liable."

The provisions of this section were evidently incorporated in the statute for the owner's protection, and to accomplish the full purpose thereof the owner has a clear right to insist that the contractor be made a party, if possible, so that he may be bound by the judgment. While no personal judgment can be rendered against the contractor in such a suit unless there has been service of summons upon him within the state, he may nevertheless, if a non-resident of the state, be brought in as a party, for the statute has provided for constructive service in such a case. (Sec. 3806.) And by section 3809 it is provided that if the debtor has not been personally served with process according to law, but has [221] been lawfully notified by publication, the judgment, if for the plaintiff, shall be that he recover the amount of the indebtedness found to be due and the costs of suit, to be levied out of the property charged with the lien. We have no doubt, therefore, that the contractor ought to be made a party, and is a necessary party to the suit in the sense that the owner may require that he be made a party, or by proper and timely objection may defeat the action for a failure to make him a party. But such failure to make the contractor a party may be waived by the owner, for he is not, in our opinion, an indispensable party to the rendition of a valid judgment establishing and foreclosing the lien.

The terms "necessary" and "indispensable" as applied to parties to a suit are often used without distinction or as meaning the same thing, but such custom ought not, we think, to be taken as implying that all so-called necessary parties are equally indispensable to a valid determination of the suit upon the issues between the parties before the court. "Indispensable" parties are of course "necessary" parties, but some parties are necessary only in a limited sense, as where their presence may be required for the protection of some other party to the suit, or to save further litigation, though the distinction is perhaps not of much importance except when applying the rule as to waiver. Referring to the rules in equity upon the subject, the Supreme Court of the United States has classified parties as follows: "1. Formal parties. 2. Persons having an interest in the controversy, and who ought to be made parties, in order that the court may act on that rule which requires it to decide on, and finally determine the entire controversy, and do complete justice by adjusting all the rights involved in it. These persons are commonly termed necessary parties; but if their interests are separable from those of the parties before the court, so that the court can proceed to a decree, and do complete and final justice, without affecting other persons not before the court the latter are not indispensable parties. 3. Persons who not only have an interest in the controversy, but an interest of such a nature that a [222] final decree cannot be made without either affecting that interest or leaving the controversy in such a condition that its final determination may be wholly inconsistent with equity and good conscience." (Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 130, 15 U. S. (L. ed.) 158.)

That these three classes of parties clearly exist is conceded by the author of the article on the subject in the Encyclopedia of Pleading and Practice, though it is said therein that the terminology seems to be inapt and misleading, since the definition between "indispensable" and "necessary" is not readily apparent, and the two terms are used synonymously in a majority of the decisions. Therefore, in that article the two classes designated by the Supreme Court as "formal" and as "necessary" parties are treated as subdivisions of the class designated as "proper but not indispensable" parties, and named respectively as "formal or nominal parties" and "parties with separable interests." And, referring to the latter class it is said: "Parties who are proper but not indispensable include all persons who have an interest in the controversy, but whose interests are separable from those of the parties before the court and will not be directly and necessarily affected by a decree which does full justice between them and is comformable to equity and good conscience. The class corresponds to the class designated 'necessary parties' in the classification adopted by the United States Supreme Court." (15 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 610-611, 651, 653.) However, it is said (page 614) that the term "necessary" parties "includes persons who, while not necessary or indispensable on account of their own interest, yet are so connected with the subject-matter of the controversy that it is necessary to have them before the court for the proper protection of those whom the decree will necessarily and directly affect;" and (page 690) that "where the parties omitted are necessary only for the purpose of protecting the defendant from further litigation, the court may, in its discretion, disregard the objection if first raised at the hearing," following a statement of the general rule that the non-joinder of proper but not indispensable parties [223] must be raised by plea, answer, or demurrer, and if not so raised the defect is waived and not available at the hearing. This is to be understood, because of the classification employed in the article, as referring to all who are not indispensable parties. Whatever may be the appropriate classification of parties in stating the general rules on the subject, it is clear that there may be persons who are not indispensable but who ought to be made parties, so that where that has not been done the defendant may object, or may waive the defect by failing to object on that ground. Of course no person, whether a necessary or only a proper party, will be bound by a judgment in an action in which he was not a party. If the owner of the property is not made a party in an action to enforce a mechanics' lien no judgment can be rendered which will bind him or the property; and likewise if the contractor for whom the labor was performed or the materials furnished is not made a party, he will not be bound by the judgment. In the case of Reformed Presbyterian Church v. Nelson, 35 Ohio St. 638, it is said: "The proposition that, where no objection is made by demurrer or answer on account of the defect of parties, the objection is to be deemed as waived, applies only in cases where it is competent for the party pleading to waive the objection." The contractor would not be competent to waive the objection that the owner was not made a party, so as to authorize a judgment enforcing a lien upon the property, but he might waive the objection so as to permit a valid personal judgment to be rendered against himself for the amount of the indebtedness. So the owner, in our opinion, is clearly competent to waive the objection that the contractor or other subordinate who procured the labor or materials is not made a party, so far as to permit a valid judgment to be entered foreclosing the lien. But the fact of such waiver will not justify a personal judgment against the contractor.

As shown above, the statute does not require that a personal judgment be recovered against the contractor as a prerequisite to the enforcement of the lien. And the fact that he is the debtor does not make him an indispensable party [224] to the suit to enforce the lien. His position in that respect is, it seems to us, analogous to a mortgagor who has disposed of all his interest in the mortgaged property. Notwithstanding that such mortgagor remains the debtor, and the only one personally liable, he is not regarded as an indispensable or necessary party to a suit to foreclose the mortgage, where no personal judgment is sought against him. "A necessary party" in a foreclosure suit "is one whose presence before the court is indispensable to the rendering of a judgment which shall have any effect upon the property; without whom the court might properly refuse to proceed, because its decree would be practically nugatory. The person who in this sense is a necessary party defendant is the owner of the equity of redemption." (2 Jones on Mort. sec. 1394.) It is further said in the section cited: "To obtain a judgment for any deficiency there may be after the sale, the debtor and any other person who may have assumed the debt are necessary parties; but as the primary object of the suit is to divest the title of the holder of the equity of redemption, and of others interested in it, and to transfer this by sale to a purchaser, the fact that one is personally liable for the debt makes him a proper party, but not in the general use of the term a necessary one." And in section 1402, it is said that "The mortgagor, if he remains the owner of the equity of redemption, is a necessary party to a foreclosure suit, because without his presence the primary object of the suit, a decree of foreclosure or sale, cannot be obtained. Even if he has wholly parted with his interest in the premises he should be made a party to the bill if a judgment is sought against him for any deficiency of the debt that may remain after applying to it the proceeds of the sale. Therefore, where the laws provide for a judgment for such deficiency he is always a proper party, though not a necessary one, after he has conveyed his interest, so far as effecting a complete foreclosure of the equity of redemption is concerned. If no personal judgment is sought against the mortgagor, or none can be had, he should not be made a party to the bill after he has ceased to have any interest in [225] the subject of the mortgage." (See also 27 Cyc. 1572; Boutwell v. Steiner, 84 Ala. 307, 4 So. 184; 5 Am. St. Rep. 375; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 461, 76 Am. Dec. 540; Coney v Winchell, 116 U. S. 227, 6 S. Ct. 366, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 610; Ayres v. Wiswall, 112 U. S. 137, 5 S. Ct. 90, 28 U. S. (L. ed.) 693.)

The following cases support the view above expressed that the rule as to waiver of a defect of parties applies in a suit brought to enforce a mechanics' lien, where the contractor has not been made a party. 27 Cyc. 346, 358; Osborn v. Logus, 28 Ore. 302, 306, 37 Pac. 468, 38 Pac. 190, 42 Pac. 997; Northwestern Cement, etc. Pavement Co. v. Norwegian-Danish Evangelical Lutheran Augsburg Seminary, 43 Minn. 449, 45 N. W. 868; Frederickson v. Riebsam, 72 Wis. 587, 40 N. W. 501; Eberle v. Drennan, 40 Okla. 59, 136 Pac. 162, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 68; Luttrell v. Knoxville, etc. R. Co. 119 Tenn. 492, 105 S. W. 565, 123 Am. St. Rep. 737; Duignan v. Montana Club, 16 Mont. 189, 40 Pac. 294.

It is, however, argued that the statute requiring the objection to be taken by demurrer or answer should not be held applicable, where the contractor is named in the petition as a party defendant, and the failure to bring him in as a party results from a defective service by publication. It is contended that in such a case the objection is sufficiently raised by a motion to dismiss, though made during the trial, as in the case at bar. We cannot agree with this contention. The argument that the defendant may not, under such circumstances, be sufficiently advised to raise the objection by answer, since the defect may not be apparent when the answer is due, is unsound, for the reason that it ignores the statutory provisions permitting amendments to pleadings. In Gilland v. Union Pac. R. Co. 6 Wyo. 185, 43 Pac. 508, where it was sought to raise the question of defect of parties by an instruction to the jury, and a motion was made after verdict to amend the answer by adding the defense of a defect of parties, so as to conform the pleadings to the proof, it was said by this court that, "when the testimony of the plaintiff disclosed the facts upon which the defendant was [226] willing to rely and maintain its proposition, the objection should have been made at that time, and application then made to amend its answer upon trial, setting forth the facts constituting the alleged defect of parties." And in Mau v. Stoner, 15 Wyo. 109, 87 Pac. 434, 89 Pac. 466, the allowance of an amendment to the answer at the close of plaintiff's evidence alleging a misjoinder of parties defendant was held proper, upon a showing that the amendatory facts were unknown to the defendants prior to the time when the plaintiff rested his case.

If it did not appear until the time of the trial, or during the trial, that the attempted service by publication was defective, the defendants might then have applied for leave to amend their answer so as to set up the defense. As to all but one of the objections urged against the sufficiency of the constructive service the facts were shown by the files of the case before the answer of either defendant was filed. It appears that the petition was filed March 11, 1911, and that summons was issued on that date, which was afterwards returned showing personal service upon Charles Becker and Henry Becker, and that Brice was not found within the county. On March 15, 1911, an affidavit for publication was filed, and thereupon publication was made for service upon Brice in a daily paper for the requisite number of weeks. Proof of the publication was filed November 2, 1911, but the proof was defective for the reason that the affidavit was insufficient in that it was not properly sworn to. After some preliminary motions had been made and the plaintiffs had been permitted to amend the petition by striking out the prayer for personal judgment against Brice, and an averment supporting that prayer, a general demurrer was filed on November 4, 1911. That being disposed of and the petition being again amended, it appears that the answer was filed on December 23, 1911. The trial appears to have occurred on March 13 and 14, 1913. A motion was made at the close of the evidence for the plaintiffs to dismiss the case so far as the attempted enforcement of a lien is concerned upon the ground that Brice, the surviving member of [227] the firm of contractors, had not been brought into the case as a party and had not voluntarily appeared therein; it being alleged in the motion that said Brice had not been served personally with summons, that proper constructive or other service had not been made upon him, and that the pretended proof of publication filed in the case was void. Thereupon, it appears, that by leave of court over the objection of the defendants another or amended proof of publication was filed.

As shown above, the defective proof of publication had been on the files since November 2, 1911. An objection based on that defect or any infirmity in the publication itself might, therefore, have been presented by the answer filed several weeks later. One objection urged against the sufficiency of the service is based upon the provision of Section 4367, Comp. Stat. 1910, requiring that where the residence of a defendant to be served by publication is unknown, so that a copy of the publication cannot be mailed to him directed to his residence named therein, immediately after the first publication, the party who makes the service, his agent or attorney, shall before the hearing make and file an affidavit that the residence of the defendant is unknown, and cannot with reasonable diligence be ascertained. The affidavit for publication which must precede the service by publication, and was filed in this case at the proper time, is required to show that service of summons cannot be made within this state upon the defendant to be served, and that the case is one in which service by publication is authorized. (Id. Sec. 4368.) Such affidavit in this case stated among other things that the "present residence" of the defendant, George R. Brice, was unknown, and the notice was directed to the said defendant as one "whose present address is unknown." But it does not appear that any affidavit was filed before the hearing or at any time, that the residence of the defendant cannot with reasonable diligence be ascertained, as required by Section 4367. The fact that no such affidavit had been filed might have been known to the defendants at the time of the commencement of the hearing, and clearly [228] was known to them when the plaintiffs had closed their evidence and the motion to dismiss was made. And an application could have been made when the fact first came to the knowledge of defendants to amend the answer so as to set up the defense.

We do not wish to be understood as conceding that the service upon Brice was insufficient. The trial court found that there had been due and sufficient service upon him by publication, and his default was entered, on motion of counsel for plaintiffs, when the parties announced themselves ready for trial. We find it unnecessary to consider the question, having concluded that the objection on the ground of defect of parties was waived.

The judgment will be modified as directed in the former opinion, and as so modified affirmed, and the cause will be remanded accordingly.

NOTE.

In the reported case it is held that in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien the original or principal contractor is a necessary but not an indispensable party defendant. For a comprehensive discussion as to who are necessary or proper parties to an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien see the note to Bacon v. Reichelt, reported ante, this volume, at page 1.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY

v.

HARMON'S ADMINISTRATOR.

Kentucky Court of Appeals—December 15, 1916.

173 Ky. 1; 189 S. W. 1135.

Master and Servant — Federal Employers' Liability Act — Existence of Relation.

The federal employers' liability act (Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584]) has no application to an employee who incurs an injury while not engaged in interstate commerce, or an injury incurred by a person who is not an employee of the railroad at the time.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The relation of master and servant must be based upon a contract, either express or implied, and the terms and conditions of the contract must, in a large measure, be looked to, to determine the duties which each owes to the other, so that it may be ascertained what acts of the employer may or may not constitute negligence, as applied to the employee.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A "student" fireman, who receives no wages or other return, except information, for his services, performed by virtue of a permit authorizing him to ride on the engine only of defendant's trains at his pleasure, although an employee and entitled to a reasonably safe place to work in places where he must necessarily be while performing the duties contemplated by the arrangement, is not an "employee" within the federal employers' liability act, when killed in a rear-end collision while in the caboose after having abandoned his duties temporarily.

Action under Federal Act — Review — Scope of Decision — Rights at Common Law.

Where the only question before the court on an appeal from an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), was whether an employee was engaged in interstate commerce when killed, which was decided adversely, it is not necessary to decide whether a common-law right of action existed.

The decision on appeal that decedent's administrator had no right of action for decedent's death under the federal employers' liability act does not preclude his seeking remedy under state law if he has any.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Floyd county.

Action by Mack Harmon's administrator, plaintiff, against Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Harkins & Harkins, Worthington, Cochran & Browning and F. T. D. Wallace for appellant.

May & May for appellee.

[2] HURT, J.—This action was instituted, under the federal employers' liability act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), by the administrator of the estate of Mack Harmon, deceased, against the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Company to recover the damages suffered by the estate of Harmon on account of his death, which it was alleged was caused by the negligence of the employees of the appellant, railroad company. At the time of his death, the decedent was riding in the caboose of a freight train of the appellant, which was called train No. 81, and consisted of forty-eight cars and was proceeding from Shelby, Kentucky, to Russell, over appellant's track. Just as this train was passing over Burrough's Hill, another freight train of the appellant, known as train No. 83, which was proceeding in the same direction, overtook and collided with the rear of train No. 81; crushed into pieces the caboose, and instantly killed the decedent. The action for damages was based upon the allegations that the appellant was engaged in interstate commerce, and that decedent was an employee of the appellant, and, also engaged in appellant's business of interstate commerce at the time of his death, and that the proximate cause of his death was the negligence of appellant's servants, in negligently permitting and causing the collision of the trains. The appellant, by its answer, denied that it was engaged in interstate commerce, at the time and place of the injury, to decedent, and, further denied, that decedent was an employee of it, or was engaged in assisting it in interstate commerce, and that his death arose from a risk, which he assumed, and further, that he was contributorily [3] negligent. The affirmative averments of the answer were denied by a reply. The trial in the Floyd circuit court resulted in a verdict of the jury and a judgment of the court in favor of the appellee. The appellant filed grounds for a new trial and entered a motion to set aside the verdict of the jury and judgment of the court, but its motion was overruled and hence this appeal.

It seems to be conceded, that each of the trains and the crews, in charge of them, were, at the time of the collision, engaged in interstate commerce, and that the collision was caused by the negligence of one or both of the crews of the trains, but it is seriously insisted for the appellant, that the decedent, at the time of his death, was not an employee of it and was not engaged in interstate commerce, and that, if he was an employee, he was not, at the time of his death, engaged in any duty, which was within the scope of his employment; that it owed him no duty at the time and place of his death, and hence, the court should have sustained its motion made at the conclusion of all of the evidence to direct a verdict in its favor.

The act of Congress, under which the action was instituted, deals only with the liability of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce for injuries sustained by its employees while, also, engaged in such commerce. It has no application to an employee, who incurs an injury, while not engaged in interstate commerce, or an injury incurred by a person, who is not an employee of a railroad company at the time. The admitted facts and such as are proven by the uncontradicted evidence, upon which it must be determined, as a matter of law, whether the decedent was an employee of appellant within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act, are substantially as follows:

The decedent resided at Prestonsburg, and in December, 1913, was employed by appellant as an engine watchman. After continuing in that service, for a short time, at Prestonsburg, he had employment of the same kind for some time and up to about the 28th day of May, 1914, upon the Elkhorn & Beaver Valley Railroad. There is a disagreement between the parties as to whether his employment upon the latter road was really a continuance of the employment by appellant, or whether the Elkhorn & Beaver Valley Railroad was an independent road, and the employment by it, was, as it [4] was pretended to be; but whether it was the one or the other is not material, since, on account of his services not being further needed, his employment, as engine watchman, came to an end on the 28th day of May, 1914, and he ceased to be employed in any way by either of the railroads. In the latter part of May he approached the train master and road foreman of engines of appellant, with a request for permission to go upon the trains of appellant and learn the duties of a fireman of locomotives, and to qualify himself for services of that kind, so that in the future, if his services were needed, he could be able to secure a place of that kind. He informed this official, that he had been engaged for some time, theretofore, as an engine watchman, under the directions of one Mr. Allen, who had some kind of connection with the Elkhorn & Beaver Valley Railroad, but that he had lost that position on account of his services being no longer needed. He was then informed, that it would be necessary for him to secure a letter of recommendation from Allen, which he said he felt he would be able to do. The train master and road foreman of engines, according to his statement, conveyed a direction to the general foreman of the motor power department of appellant, at Russell, to give decedent a "permit" to learn the duties of a fireman upon the Big Sandy division of appellant's road. The decedent secured the requested letter from Allen on the 28th day of May, but, it does not appear, that he secured the "permit" from Butler, the general foreman of the motor power department of appellant, at Russell, until the 4th day of June, which authorized him to ride upon the locomotive engines of appellant with the engineers and firemen and learn the duties of a fireman. There seems to be something, which is unexplained about the "permit," which the decedent had, as the train master seems to be under the impression that Butler gave the decedent a "permit" about the time decedent first approached the train master on the subject, as he says, that thereafter the decedent approached him again on the 31st day of May, according to his recollection, and informed him that he had secured the endorsement of two engineers upon his "permit," but had lost it or mislaid it, and the train master then informed decedent that it would be necessary for him to preserve his "permit" and to secure the endorsement of three engineers upon it and return it to him before he [5] would be authorized to consider an application for a position from him, and that Butler was directed to give decedent a "permit" in lieu of the former one, but Butler is emphatic in the declaration, that he gave decedent but one "permit," which was the one exhibited on the trial and bears the date of June 4th. The widow of decedent gave testimony to the effect, that on the night of the 28th of May he was awakened after he had retired for the night by some one, whom, she said was a brakeman, who requested him to come at once and assist them, as they had a "double header" and wanted to reach some point, which she did not remember, before the arrival of some other train, and that decedent immediately arose and went toward a train, which was then at Prestonsburg, and did not return to his home until the following Tuesday morning, about four o'clock, and that he was covered with coal dirt and appeared to have been working; that he remained at home on Tuesday and left again upon the engine of a train and did not return until Thursday evening, when he remained but a short time and went away. As to what decedent was doing between the Thursday night, when he was called from his home, and the following Thursday evening, when he returned on a train, is not material, as he, on Thursday, June 4th, on the evening of which he returned to his home at Prestonsburg upon the train, had secured the "permit," which is exhibited, in the evidence, and there is no pretense that he was on the trains under any other kind of arrangement than the one indicated, to learn the duties of a fireman. On Thursday afternoon, when train No. 81, which was proceeding from Shelby to Russell, arrived at Woods, which is a station between Prestonsburg and Shelby, an engine, with a caboose attached, arrived from in the direction of Prestonsburg. Decedent was riding in the engine cab with the engineer. When train No. 81 had arrived within a few miles of Prestonsburg, the decedent came over the train, from towards its rear, to the engine and got upon the engine, where he exhibited the "permit," which Butler had given him that day, to the engineer, and thereupon the engineer directed the fireman to stand aside and to permit the decedent to act as fireman, which he did until the arrival of the train at Prestonsburg. The train remained at that point for about one hour, during which the boiler was filled with water, the engine inspected, and the ash pan cleaned [6] out by the regular fireman. Decedent said to the engineer, that he would go to his home, which was nearby, and secure some clothing, and that if the train pulled out before his return, that he would catch on to the caboose and then come on to the engine along the train and perform the duties of fireman. The conductor testified, that just before the train proceeded on its way, decedent returned and entered the caboose; that the engineer had requested him to tell the decedent to come and ride upon the engine and assist the fireman, and that he delivered the message, but that decedent said that he had "fired" an engine from Russell that evening and was tired and would rest a while; that he urged decedent to leave the caboose, and said to him that he had no right to permit him to ride in it, but the decedent declined it and exhibited his "permit," but the conductor told him, that he did not authorize him or permit him to ride in the caboose, but that he must go and ride upon the engine. The decedent, however, remained in the caboose and when the train arrived at Paintsville, the engineer again requested the conductor to tell the decedent to come and assist in "firing" the engine; that he delivered the message to decedent and again requested him to leave the caboose, but the decedent declined to do so, but said that he would go to the engine when the train arrived at Richardson. The train thereafter stopped at Richardson and at Chapman and, also, at Torchlight, at each of which places the conductor testifies that he requested the decedent to leave the caboose and go to the engine, and upon one of the occasions said to him, that he could never learn the duties of a fireman by riding in the caboose, and that at one of these places the engineer again sent a message to decedent to come on over to the engine. The decedent remained until the next stop, which the train made at Catalpa. The fireman was very tired and somewhat exhausted by this time and the engineer again requested decedent to come and assist. The message to him from the engineer was again conveyed to the conductor. The engineer corroborates the conductor in these statements. The decedent did not make any motion to go to the engine, until after the train was proceeding from Catalpa, when the conductor advised him, that because of the darkness, it was not safe for him to undertake to go over the train to the engine with the train moving as it was. After leaving that point and as the train had [7] arrived at the top of Burnaugh Hill, the conductor and rear brakeman, who were in the caboose, discovered that the engine of train No. 83 was dangerously near and approaching very rapidly, and the certainty of a collision seemed to be imminent. The decedent was lying asleep in the caboose, when the brakeman cried out to him, that the approaching train was going to run into the caboose, and lighted a fuse as a warning to the approaching train; the conductor then ran to decedent and awakened him, but the danger was then imminent and the conductor and brakeman jumped off from the caboose and saved themselves, while the engineer, fireman and front brakeman on train No. 83, sprang down from the engine of their train, just before it struck the caboose, with the result above mentioned. It should be, also, stated, that it was proven by another witness, that just as train No. 81 was leaving Prestonsburg, the decedent was seen standing upon a coal car in the train, with his face in the direction of the engine. This witness, also, stated, that shortly before the train had arrived at Prestonsburg, he saw the decedent upon the engine and engaged in throwing coal into it, while another witness, who says he was in company with the last mentioned witness, testified that as the train was leaving Prestonsburg, he saw the decedent engaged in putting coal into the engine, but the engineer, fireman and front brakeman upon the train all testify that they did not see the decedent, and that he was not upon the engine, at any time, after the train had arrived at Prestonsburg, and in this statement, they are corroborated by the conductor. The train left Prestonsburg about 7 o'clock P. M., and the collision occurred, at about 3 o'clock, on the next morning, and there is no disagreement, in the evidence, as to the fact, that decedent was ever upon the engine, at any time, after the train left Prestonsburg. The engineer, fireman and front brakeman on train No. 81 escaped unhurt from the effects of the collision, and in fact the collision affected the engine, upon which they were riding, so slightly, that they did not know until they had received information of it, what had happened, or that a collision had occurred at the rear of the train. It is apparent, that if the decedent had been upon the engine, where he was authorized to ride, that he would have escaped from the effects of the collision unharmed. All the testimony was to the effect that decedent was occupying the position, which [8] is called in the railroad's parlance, a "student" fireman; that he received no wages or return for his services, except the information, which would enable him to perform the duties of a fireman; that the "permit" authorized him to ride upon the engine of the train and at no other place; that while upon the train he was under the direction of the engineer; that no promise of employment was made him; that the railroad company kept the names of such persons as had received the endorsement of three engineers, as fit persons to be employed as fireman, for future reference, in the selection and employment of fireman; that when a "student" fireman had secured the approval of three engineers, who would endorse him as apparently having the qualities necessary to make a fireman, after an examination by some superior official of the company and found to be acquainted with the duties of the position, his application for employment of that kind would be considered when a man was needed for such a place.

The "permit," which the decedent held and by virtue of which he was upon appellant's trains, was as follows, viz.:

"Russell, Ky., June 4, 1914.

"To M. C. Harmon:

"This will be your authority to learn the road on the Big Sandy division as fireman.

"Yours truly,

"F. R. BUTLER,
"General Foreman."

To be an employee of a railroad corporation, in the capacity of an operative, upon a train, it is apparent, that the relation of master and servant must exist between the company and the individual, who claims to be an employee. The relation of master and servant must be based upon a contract, either express or implied, and the terms and conditions, of the contract, must, in a large measure be looked to, to determine the duties, which each one owes to the other, so that it may be ascertained, what acts of the employer may or may not constitute negligence, as applied to the employee. It has been said that "various tests have been proposed for determining when the relation of master and servant exists, so as to render the master liable to indemnify the servant for personal injuries; but it is impossible to [9] lay down any definite and satisfactory rule applicable to all cases; and the question must be determined as it arises, upon the facts and circumstances of the particular case." 26 Cyc. 1083. When the terms of the arrangement between appellant and decedent is looked to, it is apparent that it does not contain any obligation upon the decedent to ever go upon one of appellant's trains or engines, or to in any manner undertake to learn the duties of a fireman, and that no time is provided, within which, he may take advantage of the permission given to him, to ride upon the engines and receive information as to the duties of a fireman. He may take one trip, and never go upon another, or he may ride from one station to another, and there desist in his endeavors until another time, and if he resumes, he then may go upon some other train and in another direction. He is absolutely free to use his own pleasure, as to when and upon what train, and at what time or times, he will undertake to exercise the permission granted to him, or he may decline to ever exercise it, or he may commence to do so and desist at such time and place, as he may desire. It is, furthermore, apparent that the railroad company may, at any time, withdraw its permission to ride upon its engines or to receive information from its employees or experience in the duties of a fireman upon its trains. If he takes advantage of the permission granted him and learns the duties of a fireman and secures the endorsement of the three engineers, and takes successfully the examination upon the duties of a fireman, he is still free to refuse employment as a fireman, and the railroad company is free, never, to engage his services. While, however, he is exercising his privileges under the permission granted him and is performing the duties contemplated by the arrangement, the railroad company is accepting his services, and in consideration of same is giving him the knowledge and experience, which will fit him for the avocation of a fireman. What the "student" fireman is receiving and what the railroad company is receiving in return is valuable. While the "student" fireman is upon the engine and performing the duties contemplated by the arrangement, and within the scope of his duties under the arrangement the railroad company certainly owes to him the same duties it owes to the regularly employed fireman of an engine in his employment. Rief v. Great Northern R. Co. 126

Minn. 430, 148 N. W. 309. The law makes him an employee [10] while engaged in the duties expected of him under the arrangement, and being accepted by appellant. It is the duty of the railroad company to furnish its servant with a reasonably safe place to perform the work required of him. He is, also, entitled to this duty from the master, while he has to be in places, which are incident to his work—that is such places at which he must necessarily be, in connection with his work. It has been held that the relation of master and servant, in so far as the duty to protect the employee is concerned, begins when the servant is necessarily on the premises of the master, in accordance with his contract of employment. North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, Ann. Cas. 1914C 159, 34 S. Ct. 305, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 591; Gray v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 153 Wis. 637, 142 S. W. 505; Fletcher v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 168 U. S. 135, 18 S. Ct. 35, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 411; St. Louis, etc. R. Co. v. Seale, 229 U. S. 156, Ann. Cas. 1914C 156, 33 S. Ct. 651, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1129. Under the arrangement between decedent and appellant, it was the duty of decedent, when undertaking to take advantage of the terms of his arrangement, to be upon the engine, and under the direction of the engineer. It is apparent that he could not perform any of the duties of his position while riding or sleeping in the caboose, at the farthest point upon a long train from the engine. He had a right, as before stated, to desist from his duties, at any time he chose, but he could not do so and insist upon riding upon a train, at a place where, under the scope of his employment, he had no right to be. The caboose was not a place where his duties necessarily required him to be in connection with the duties of his employment. If the uncontradicted evidence is to be believed, he, when he received his injuries, had for the time being, at least, abandoned and desisted from exercising the duties of his employment, as he had a right to do, and for his own wishes and convenience was at a place where his employment did not make it necessary for him to be, and was refusing to engage in the work contemplated by his arrangement, and, under the facts, was not at the time, an employee within the meaning of the act under which the appellee seeks a recovery and under the arrangement with the appellant. It could not be successfully contended, that even a regularly employed servant of a railway carrier, who received a regular wage for his services, but who received an injury from the negligence of the carrier, when he was not upon duty, and not engaged in any service for the carrier, and was not at a place where he had a right to be, or [11] where it was necessary for him to be in the performance of his duties when on duty, is an employee of the carrier, within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act. One of the reasons is obvious. The injured servant was not, at the time of his injury, engaged in interstate commerce. The duty of a railway carrier to provide a reasonably safe place for its servant to do the work required of him applies to every place where the employee must necessarily be in connection with the duties of his employment, but as was said in Hobbs v. Great Northern R. Co. 80 Wash. 678, 142 Pac. 20, 56 L.R.A. (N.S.) 503:

"But that duty is not incident to a place, where a servant is not required to be in the performance of his work. Nor does it cover the servant when he is not within the scope of his employment or doing some act which is not incident to his employment. This rule is sustained by all the authorities and the Federal act in no wise attempts to change it."

The same rule is upheld by the decisions of this court. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Hocker, 111 Ky. 707, 64 S. W. 638, 65 S. W. 119; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Pendleton, 126 Ky. 605, 104 S. W. 382. Under the terms of the employment of decedent, he was a servant of appellant at the times he was engaged in its service, and in the performance of the duties, which he was, by the terms of the arrangement, expected to perform, and not when he was not engaged in such duties, and at a place entirely without the scope of his employment to be, and where no duty connected with his employment required him to be. There is no sufficient reason shown why he was refusing to perform the duties expected of him, except his own pleasure, and at the time of his injury and since the evening before, he had not been engaged in the service of appellant. For the reasons given, the court should have sustained the motion for a direct verdict made by appellant.

The instruction upon the measure of damages was erroneous, as held by the United States Supreme Court in C. & O. R. Co. v. Kelly, 167 Ky. 745, 181 S. W. 375, decided June 5th, 1916, but with the conclusion we have arrived at upon the main question in the case, as above expressed, it is not necessary to pass upon the other questions raised upon the motion for a new trial.

The judgment is therefore reversed and cause remanded for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

ON PETITION FOR REHEARING.

174 Ky. 850, 192 S. W. 817.

[850] HURT, J.—The question before this court in this case was, whether the appellee's intestate, at the time of his death, was an employee of appellant and engaged in interstate commerce, so as to make appellant liable for damages on account of his death, in an action under the federal employers' liability act. The conclusion arrived at was, that he was not. The recovery was sought solely under the provisions of that statute. Hence the conclusion that the motion for a directed verdict should have been sustained. Whether, under the facts stated, there was a cause of action for any reason under the common law of the state, was not before us then nor now and was not considered. It was not necessary for this court, in order for appellee to take advantage of his common-law remedies, if any he has, upon the return of the case to the trial court, for this court, in advance, to determine such rights and their nature and to give any direction in regard to same, as such questions were in no way before us upon the record. The result of the decision does not preclude [851] the appellee from seeking his remedy under the state law, if any he has, in accordance with the principles announced by this court in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Kelly, 167 Ky. 745, 181 S. W. 375; Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Tucker, 168 Ky. 149, 181 S. W. 940; and Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Hansford, 173 Ky. 126, 190 S. W. 690, upon the return of the case to the trial court.

Hence, the petition for rehearing, modification and extension of the opinion is overruled.

Introductory.

The federal employers' liability act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584) imposes on common carriers by railroad while engaging in interstate commerce a liability in damages "to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce." By the terms of the statute as quoted two conditions to the existence of the liability must co-exist; the injured person must be employed by the carrier and he must be employed in interstate commerce. The present note deals specifically with the first mentioned of these conditions—the necessity that the relation of master and servant shall exist between the carrier and the injured person in order to give rise to a liability under the act. The question when an employee is engaged in interstate commerce so as to come within the terms of the act is discussed in the notes to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Bihrens, Ann. Cas. 1914C 163; Shanks v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916E 467, and Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Winters, reported post, this volume, at page 54. In the construction of the statutory phrase heretofore quoted a third prerequisite to liability under the act has been imposed; viz., that at the time of receiving the injury the employee must have been acting within the scope of his employment. The cases discussing that question are reviewed in the note to Byram v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1918A 1067.

In General.

That in order to give a right of action under the federal employers' liability act, the relation of employer and employee must exist between the railroad and the person injured at the time of the injury is clear from the terms of the statute and is unhesitatingly recognized by all the cases in which the question has arisen. Thus where it appeared that an employee of a business corporation while at work on a vestibule of a building belonging to it and by means of which freight was being unloaded from a car brought from without the state was injured by the negligence of the railroad company it was held that he could not sue the railroad company under the act despite the fact that his employer was engaged in interstate commerce. Ft. Worth Belt R. Co. v. Perryman (Tex.) 158 S. W. 1181, writ of error denied 161 S. W. XV no op. And an employee of one railroad cannot maintain an action under the federal employers' liability act against a second railroad for injuries caused by it while shifting cars in the yards of the first road, there being no evidence of the existence of the relation of employer and employee between the second road and the injured person. Kentucky, etc. R. Co. v. Minton, 167 Ky. 516, 180 S. W. 831.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Tredway (Va.) 93 S. E. 560, in speaking of the character of the relation contemplated by the act, the court said: "The federal act in question does not itself define the meaning of the word 'employee,' or the word 'employed,' also used in the act. That portion of such act (section 1 [U. S. Comp. St. 1916, § 8657]) which is pertinent to the question under consideration, is as follows: 'Every common carrier by railroad . . . shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier . . . or, in case of the death of such employee, to his . . . personal representative.' The learning and exhaustive search of able counsel on both sides of this case have not resulted in citing us to any decision or discussion by any textwriter of the meaning of these terms as employed in such act. The precise question before us seems, therefore, to be a novel one both in our federal and state courts. The word 'employer,' and more especially the word 'employee,' considered apart from their context in the federal act, are ambiguous in their meaning. They may be limited in meaning by the idea that an express contract of hiring by the carrier of and the payment of wages by the latter to the employee are essential to bring him within the provisions of the act. Or they may have a broader meaning and include as employees all who are engaged in the discharge of duties of servants of the carrier, whose service is knowingly accepted by the latter. On a collateral question it has been held that the failure of the Congress to define the meaning of the words referred to above manifests a purpose in the legislation in question that these words should be interpreted and understood in their ordinary sense and according to their usage in the law of master and servant. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Walker (1915) 162 Ky. 209, 172 S. W. 517. That is to say, the relationship of employer and employee is the same as that of master and servant."

Employee Going to or Returning from Work.

Generally an employee is deemed to be in the master's service whenever present to perform his duty under the contract creating the relation of master and servant and subject to orders, although at the given moment he may not be engaged in the actual performance of any labor, but only on his way to take up his duties. Lamphere v. Oregon R. etc. Co. 196 Fed. 336, 116 C. C. A. 156, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1. Thus in Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Rentz (Tex.) 162 S. W. 959, wherein it appeared that an engineer was injured while on his way to the roundhouse to take out his engine, the rule was stated as follows: "It is contended, however, that when appellee halted in his journey to the roundhouse, stepped upon the track upon which he was injured, and engaged in conversation with his fellow servants, he thereby voluntarily suspended the relation of master and servant, and, his injuries having been received during such suspension, appellant was not liable. Having determined that appellee was in the employ of appellant at the time of the injury, he then comes within that class of cases, . . . which hold that though the employee may not be actually engaged in labor that fact does not destroy the relation of master and servant, and accordingly appellant

So a fireman going on the premises of a railroad in answer to a call for service has been held to stand in the relation of employee within the meaning of the act. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. v. Tucker, 35 App. Cas. (D. C.) 123, wherein it was said: "When Tucker was killed he was upon the premises of the defendant, in response to its call, to assume the duties he had been engaged by the defendant to assume, and for their mutual interest and advantage. Can it be that under such circumstances the relation which the decedent sustained to the defendant was that of a mere stranger? Is it possible that the act under consideration warrants a distinction so fine as to permit a master to escape liability for negligence resulting in the injury of one hired to perform service, because the injury occurs before the service is actually undertaken, notwithstanding that, at the time of the injury, the servant is properly and necessarily upon the premises of the master for the sole purpose of his employment? We think not. Such a rule, in our view, would be as technical and artificial as it would be unjust. We think the better rule, the one founded in reason and supported by authority, is that the relation of master and servant, in so far as the obligation of the master to protect his servant is concerned, commences when the servant, in pursuance of his contract with the master, is rightfully and necessarily upon the premises of the master. The servant in such a situation is not a mere trespasser nor a mere licensee. He is there because of his employment, and we see no reason why the master does not then owe him as much protection as it does the moment he enters upon the actual performance of his task."

It has been held that a brakeman who, having completed his trip, was being sent back on a pass on a passenger train when he was injured, was still an employee of the railroad and not a passenger and so entitled to the benefits of the act. St. Louis Southwestern R. Co. v. Brothers (Tex.) 165 S. W. 488, wherein it was said: "Arriving at Ft. Worth, the end of his run, he was directed to return to Commerce and there report for further duty, which his contract also bound him to do, and for doing which he was compensated. . . . He commenced his journey, and was injured while en route, and under the rule stated and the contract of employment it cannot be said that the relation of carrier and passenger existed, even though Brothers was on a passenger train and performing no actual service, since he was there as a servant receiving compensation and entitled to be on the train solely because of his employment."

The rule as heretofore stated in regard to an employee going to work is equally applicable to an employee injured while leaving the premises of the railroad after completing his work. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Walker, 162 Ky. 209, 172 S. W. 517. Thus it has been held that a section hand injured after working hours while returning on a hand car to his bunk house was still an employee of the railroad. Salabrin v. Ann Arbor R. Co. (Mich.) 160 N. W. 552, wherein it was said: "It is contended that, even assuming the plaintiff to have told the truth with regard to the inception of the journey, it is contradicted upon this record that the quitting time was five o'clock. It is therefore urged that when five o'clock came plaintiff and his companions were at liberty to go in any direction their several fancies might dictate, and that if plaintiff and his companions chose rather to wait for the departure of the hand car from Dundee in order to secure a ride from that point of Lulu, where their sleeping and living car was located, it should be held that in so doing they were acting for their own pleasure and convenience, and not as employees of the defendant company. We are unable to agree with this contention. It seems to us that it would make no difference whether the journey was undertaken before or after the hour when plaintiff usually quit his daily labor, provided it was so undertaken at the command of the master through the foreman and for the benefit of the master. If, as plaintiff testifies, the foreman instructed him to accompany the party for the purpose of obtaining the 'jack,' and he remained with the hand car after obtaining the 'jack' at the command of his foreman until the return of the party from Dundee, and then entered upon the return trip with the rest of the party, we think it should be held that at the moment of collision he sustained the relation of servant to the defendant company as master."

In Grow v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. 44 Utah 160, Ann. Cas. 1915B 481, 138 Pac. 398, it appeared that an employee engaged in installing a block system was injured while being carried from his work on a tricycle operated over the tracks of the railroad. In answer to the contention that the relation of master and servant had ceased as between him and the railroad, the court said: "We think the relation of master and servant between the deceased and the defendant with respect to the latter's liability for the charged negligence as clearly existed at the time of the injury as though the deceased then had been actually engaged in his work along the track."

In Easter v. Virginian R. Co. 76 W. Va. 383, 86 S. E. 37, it was said in a syllabus by the court: "The relation of master and servant between a railroad company and one of its trainmen does not necessarily terminate the instant the train reaches its destination on the company's yards, or the servant ceases to labor, but continues for a reasonable time thereafter to enable such employee to wash himself and change his soiled clothing, in the caboose provided with the conveniences therefor, before going to his lodging place; such being the custom of trainmen. . . . What is a reasonable time is generally a question of fact for the jury to determine from all the facts and circumstances of the particular case; but, when there is no evidence tending to prove the time reasonably required for a trainman to make his toilet, preparatory to leaving the train for his lodging place, and his evidence proves that he consumed no more time than was required for that purpose, the fact that about one hour had elapsed between the arrival of the train and the accident does not warrant the inference that the time was unreasonable; and the giving of an instruction which assumes the existence of the relation of master and servant at the time of the accident is not reversible error. In view of the established facts, it cannot be said, as matter of law, that an hour was unreasonable time."

But in Perez v. Atchison, etc. R. Co. (Tex.) 192 S. W. 274, it was held that a section hand who after his day's work was done was standing behind a box car for shelter from the weather and to watch his children to see them safely across the tracks was not an employee of the railroad company at the time and so could not maintain an action under the federal employers' liability act.

Employee Learning Business.

The holding of the reported case that a student fireman is an employee of the railroad though receiving no compensation for his services finds support in Rief v. Great Northern R. Co. 126 Minn. 430, 148 N. W. 309, wherein it appeared that the injured employee was a student brakeman learning the business under a contract with the railroad which contained among others the following provision: "It being fully understood and agreed by me that while learning the duties and requirements of such position I shall receive no compensation and in no sense be deemed a servant or employee of said company, but merely a licensee upon its property, trains and cars for my own personal benefit and education, the license to be revoked at any time at the option of the company." Holding the brakeman to be an employee of the railroad company despite the quoted provision in the contract the court said: "The court held that plaintiff was an employee of the defendant as a matter of law, and since it was admitted that the train from which plaintiff fell was engaged in interstate traffic, the court excluded the contract as void and of no effect under the federal employers' liability act (Act April 22, 1908, c. 149, 35 St. 65 [U. S. Comp. Stat. Supp. 1911, p. 1322]). We think there was no prejudicial error in the ruling. For, although there is nothing in the contract itself indicating that plaintiff as student brakeman was to render any service whatever for defendant, the testimony conclusively shows that he was expected to perform, and did perform, such tasks as were assigned him by the members of the crew in charge of the trains. He helped load and unload freight at way-stations, threw switches and did whatever he was ordered to do in the operation of the train . . . he was an employee and not a licensee." To the same effect see Findley v. Coal, etc. R. Co. 76 W. Va. 747, 87 S. E. 198.

Employee Violating Order.

The mere violation by an employee while engaged in his duties of an order or regulation of the railroad does not have the effect of suspending the relation of master and servant and so depriving him of the benefit of the federal employers' liability act. Thus, holding that the violation of the rules of the company by an engineer did not place him without the scope of his employment, the court in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Fleming, 194 Ala. 51, 69 So. 125, said: "It was a duty of plaintiff's intestate under his employment to break in, try out, or test engines, and that is beyond dispute what he was doing when he was killed. That he may have acted imprudently, or negligently, or contrary even to some rule provided for his governance, did not necessarily bar a recovery under the federal statute, nor put him without the line and scope of his employment. It is possible, of course, that plaintiff's intestate, in the use of the engine, may have departed entirely from his employment, and in such case defendant would not have been liable to him as an employee, but there was no evidence to sustain such theory in this case. The mere fact that he was operating his engine at a high rate of speed was no evidence that he had wholly quit the purposes of his employer."

In answer to the contention that the violation of an order for the movement of his train by a motorman on an interstate electric railroad terminated the relation of employer and employee for the time being, the court in Spokane, etc. R. Co. v. Campbell, 241 U. S. 497, 36 S. Ct. 683, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 1125, said: "This invokes the doctrine that where an employee voluntarily and without necessity growing out of his work abandons the employment and steps entirely aside from the line of his duty, he suspends the relation of employer and employee, and puts himself in the attitude of a stranger or a licensee. The cases cited are those where an employee intentionally has gone outside of the scope of his employment, or departed from the place of duty. The present case is not of that character; for Campbell, as the jury might and presumably did find, had no thought of stepping aside from the line of his duty. From the fact that he disregarded and in effect violated the order as actually communicated to him, it, of course, does not necessarily follow that he did this wilfully. The jury was not bound to presume—it would hardly be reasonable to presume—that he deliberately and intentionally ran his train out upon a single track on which he knew an incoming train with superior rights was then due. However plain his mistake, the jury reasonably might find it to be no more than a mistake attributable to mental aberration, or inattention, or failure for some other reason to apprehend or comprehend the order communicated to him. In its legal effect this was nothing more than negligence on his part, and not a departure from the course of his employment.”

Employee Serving Two Railroads.

In Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Tredway (Va.) 93 S. E. 560, the question at issue was whether a signalman at a crossing of two railways was an employee of the defendant railroad within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act. It appeared that the Southern Railway Company by agreement with the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company and in pursuance of the Virginia statute relating to the subject had undertaken to construct a crossing over the latter's tracks on consideration that it, the Southern Railway, should bear all expense including the hiring and payment of proper signalmen. Holding that the injured signalman was an employee of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Company, the court said: "In the law of master and servant the principles of the common law determining when this relationship exists are well settled. At common law, upon the question of whether the relationship of master and servant exists, there are four elements which are considered: (1) Selection and engagement of the servant; (2) payment of wages; (3) power of dismissal; and (4) the power of control of the servant's action. . . . The first, second, and third of these elements are not essential to the relationship. . . . The 'power of control' is the most significant element bearing on the question. . . . Is this the ultimate fact to be sought in our inquiry? Manifestly not, where the duties of the servant are nonassignable. If the master could escape liability for the torts of his servants, or for negligent injuries to them, by surrendering his power of control over them, in a qualified way (as was done by the agreement in evidence in the instant case), or by entirely surrendering such control, he might do so. Yet, plainly, in the case of nonassignable duties, the inquiry would still remain, in every case of tort or injury aforesaid: Did the relationship of master and servant in fact exist? If so, the duties imposed by law upon the master as the result of that relationship would remain, independent of the fact in whom the immediate or ultimate power of control of the servant might reside. The defendant had the power of control in question originally. It need not have parted with it. If by the agreement in evidence it did part with it, partly or wholly, it could not thereby divest itself of the legal responsibility it was under to exercise such control. It is indeed illogical and unsound in principle to make the possession of the power of control of a servant the test in the ascertainment of who is the master of such servant, in cases where the duties of the latter are nonassignable. In truth, it follows rather from the relationship of master and servant—from the mutual duties and obligations which the law imposes as the result of such relationship—that the master has the right of control of the servant, than does the relationship follow from the existence of the power of control. The latter may indeed, and does in fact almost invariably, accompany the former; but it accompanies it as an effect and not as a cause. Again, it may not invariably accompany the relationship, as we have seen. This consideration alone condemns it as a test of the existence of the relationship in question. Therefore, while we have not found it elsewhere so expressed in terms, the authorities on the subject have developed and led us to the necessary conclusion, where the duties of the master are nonassignable, that control is not the ultimate fact for which we are in search. The ultimate facts are: Was the person in question engaged in the discharge of the duties of a servant of another, and was that service accepted by that other—was such service rendered and accepted? If so, the law implies the contract of master and servant between the latter and the former—of employer and employee—and the existence of that relationship between them. We are aware that many authorities give no weight to the rendition of the service and predicate the conclusion that one is or is not the master upon the four elements above referred to being present or absent in the conduct of the latter. The effect which a knowing acceptance of the service must have, in principle, is often overlooked. Further: Were the service not accepted as that of a servant, and, by express agreement or otherwise, the master were to attempt to escape responsibility by relinquishing control of the servant—where the duty is nonassignable—the master cannot escape the duty resting upon him by relinquishment of control of the servant, or by otherwise making it impossible for himself to perform the duty. . . .

So, in the instant case, the duties of the plaintiff's intestate (among others) were to operate signals connected with the passage of the trains of defendant and to keep a certain light, which served exclusively the operation of certain of defendant's trains. They were in their very nature duties necessarily to be performed by some one for the defendant, to enable the latter to discharge its public service duties as a common carrier,—its public employment under its franchise.

. . . . They were therefore duties of the defendant, and not of the Southern Railway Company, or of any other person or corporation. Their discharge was the discharge of duties of a servant to the defendant. That service by the plaintiff's intestate was knowingly accepted by the defendant. Hence, upon the established principles of the common law, the plaintiff's intestate was a servant—an employee—of the defendant. If it were thought that ultimate power of control—and, indeed, the selection and engagement of the plaintiff's intestate, the power of dismissal and the payment of his wages, were essential to his relationship to the defendant being that of an employee—all of these elements will be found, on consideration, present and possessed by the defendant in the instant case. With respect to the ultimate power of control, that was possessed by the defendant through the Southern Railway Company. If the latter had supplied an inefficient servant for the discharge of the duties of the plaintiff's intestate and had refused to discharge him, it would have been a breach of contract for which the law would have afforded ample remedy to enable the defendant to accomplish the discharge of such a servant and the engagement of a competent servant in his stead. Indeed, counsel for defendant, in the trial of the case in the court below, very properly and correctly stated, in effect, that, in case there should be a breach of its duty by the Southern Railway Company to the defendant in the matter of supplying the former with efficient servants in and about the signal tower, the defendant 'would find a way' to control the matter. No absolute right of control of the employees contemplated thereby was vested in the Southern Railway Company by the agreement in evidence, or by the Virginia statute on the subject. Quoad the service to be rendered by the employees for the defendant, the agreement imposed the undertaking of the immediate control upon the Southern Railway Company for the benefit of the defendant. The former was merely the agent of the latter in performing such undertaking, both under said agreement and under the Virginia statute. There was nothing in the Virginia statute which forbade or prevented the defendant from exercising such control directly—as indeed the defendant is now doing, the agreement in evidence having been abrogated since the case at bar arose. There is nothing in section 1294b, cl. 3, Pollard's Code Va. 1904, referred to in reply brief for the defendant, inconsistent with the foregoing conclusions. From this it is manifest that while said agreement was in force the Southern Railway Company was merely the agent of the defendant under such agreement to exercise the immediate control of the plaintiff's intestate, with the ultimate power of control remaining vested in the defendant. Qui facit per alium, facit per se. With respect to the selection and engagement of the plaintiff's intestate and the power of dismissal, what is said in the next three preceding paragraphs above holds true. . . . With respect to the payment of wages, they were in effect paid by defendant through its predecessor in title, when the latter furnished the consideration of permitting the crossing, for which the agreement in evidence, and the Virginia statute in such case made and provided, bound the Southern Railway to pay such wages. Hence we have present as the instant case all four of the elements above referred to which are considered upon the question of whether the relationship of master and servant exists."

In Wichita Falls, etc. R. Co. v. Puckett (Okla.) 157 Pac. 112, it appeared that two railroad companies were incorporated under the laws of different states, but their tracks connected at the state line, and together formed a continuous line of railroad extending into both states. Both the companies used the same headquarters, roundhouse, and switch yards, had the same managing and operating officers, employed and used the same engineers and train crews, used indiscriminately each other's engines, cars, and trains, jointly operated through trains and train crews over both lines of road, sold continuous tickets and carried passengers over both roads, and deposited the earnings of both companies in one common fund received, kept and disbursed by a common auditor of both companies, from which common fund the employees and expenses of both companies were paid. The joint earnings and expenses were respectively credited and charged to each company in proportion to the mileage owned by it of the aggregate continuous lines of railroad in the two states. The same common managing officers of both companies had authority to employ, direct, control, and discharge at will the engineers and other employees of both companies, all of whom might be required to work on either company's line of railroad. It was held that an engineer so employed and controlled, who was injured by the negligence of one or both of such railroad companies, while doing the work of both, was an employee of both within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act, and might sue one or both of the companies.

Employee of Lessee Railroad.

An employee of one railroad which operates in part over the tracks of another through an agreement of lease does not thereby become an employee of the lessor road and so cannot maintain an action against it under the federal employers' liability act. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Wagner, 239 U. S. 452, 36 S. Ct. 135, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 379, affirming 265 Ill. 245, Ann. Cas. 1916A 778, 106 N. E. 809.

Independent Contractor.

A person put in charge of the coal chutes of a railroad under a written contract whereby he was to be responsible for his own labor and was to have absolute charge of the handling of the coal, the railroad being interested only as to the results of the work and having no control over the manner or mode in which it was done, was held in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Bond, 240 U. S. 449, 36 S. Ct. 403, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 735, reversing 47 Okla. 161, 148 Pac. 103, to be an independent contractor and not a servant of the railroad and not to come within the federal employers' liability act. The court in that case said: "There was, it is true, and necessarily, a certain direction to be given by the company, or rather, we should say, information given to Turner. But the manner of the work was under his control, to be done by him and those employed by him. He was responsible for its faithful performance and incurred the penalty of the instant termination of the contract for nonperformance. This was only a prudent precaution, indeed, necessary in view of the purpose of his contract, which was to make provision for a daily supply of coal for the operation of the railroad. The power given was one of control in a sense, but it was not a detailed control of the actions of Turner or those of his employees. It was a judgment only over results and a necessary sanction of the obligations which he had incurred. It was not tantamount to the control of an employee and a remedy against his incompetency or neglect. The whole instrument shows system and particular care. It is not the engagement of a servant submitting to subordination and subject momentarily to superintendence, but of one capable of independent action, to be judged of by its results. And the covenants were suitable for the purpose, only consistent with it, not consistent with a temporary employment. This is manifest from the provision for payment, from the careful assignment of liabilities and the explicit provision that Turner 'shall be deemed and held as the original contractor and the railroad company reserves and holds no control over him in the doing of such work other than as to the results to be accomplished.' The railroad company, therefore, did not retain the right to direct the manner in which the business should be done, as well as the results to be accomplished, or, in other words did not retain control not only of what should be done but how it should be done. . . . We do not think that the contract can be regarded as an evasion of § 5 of the employers' liability act, which provides 'that any contract, rule, regulation or device whatsoever, the purpose and intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this act, shall to that extent be void: . . .' Turner was something more than a mere shoveler of coal under a superior's command. He was an independent employer of labor, conscious of his own power to direct and willing to assume the responsibility of direction and to be judged by its results. This is manifest from the contract under review and from the cooperation contract; it is also manifest from his contracts with the other companies to whose industries the railroad company's tracks extended. We certainly cannot say that he was incompetent to assume such relation and incur its consequences. Thus being of opinion that Turner was not an employee of the company but an independent contractor, it is not material to consider whether the services in which he was engaged were in interstate commerce."

Express Agent.

An express messenger employed and paid solely by an express company and entitled under an arrangement between the express company and the railroad to ride on the trains of the latter in the discharge of his duties is an employee, not of the railroad company, but solely of the express company and as such does not come within the terms of the federal employers' liability act. Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Blalack, 105 Tex. 296, 147 S. W. 559; Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. West, 38 Okla. 581, 134 Pac. 655.

A station agent, employed also by an express company, who is injured while attending solely to the business of the express company is at the time an employee of the express company and not of the railroad within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act. Whalen v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 173 App. Div. 268, 159 N. Y. S. 244.

In Bogart v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 171 App. Div. 652, 157 N. Y. S. 420, wherein the facts were similar to those in Whalen v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. supra, the court stated the rule as follows: "The primary question, and the only one I consider, is whether the decedent was at the time employed by the defendant in interstate commerce. There was no relation between the express company and the defendant, except that the latter carried the former's freight, and allowed it to occupy its premises for its receipt and dispatch. The decedent when he was injured was handling the freight as the agent and custodian of the express company, and was responsible to it for fidelity in the discharge of the immediate duty, and it alone was obligated to pay him for the service, and alone was liable to respond for his dutiful performance of it. The inquiry comes at once to this point: Was the injured servant doing an act in furtherance of interstate commerce in the course of employment by the defendant? The decedent was employed by the defendant to do all that falls to the duty of a station agent. He was employed by the express company to do all that falls within the usual employment of an express agent, but to such duties the defendant's responsibility did not extend. Hence Bogart, as the agent of the express company, was doing what it was the duty of that company to do and what it was not the duty of the defendant to do. Therefore, he was not employed by defendant in interstate commerce."

However, where an express messenger was also employed by the railroad to take charge of and operate its electric plant for lighting the cars, which was situated in the express car, he was held to be an employee of the railroad and entitled to sue under the federal employers' liability act. Weaseler v. Great Northern R. Co. 90 Wash. 234, 155 Pac. 1063, rehearing denied 90 Wash. 237, 157 Pac. 461.

Pullman Car Employee.

A porter on a Pullman car employed, paid by and under the control of the Pullman company does not sustain the relation of servant to the railroad company and cannot maintain an action under the federal employers' liability act. Robinson v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 237 U. S. 84, 35 S. Ct. 491, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 849, affirming 40 App. Cas.

(D. C.) 169, L.R.A.1915D 510. See also Lindsay v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 226 Fed. 23, 141 C. C. A. 131.

In the case first cited it was said: "We are of the opinion that Congress used the words 'employee' and 'employed' in the statute in their natural sense, and intended to describe the conventional relation of employer and employee. It was well known that there were on interstate trains persons engaged in various services for other masters. Congress, familiar with this situation, did not use any appropriate expression which could be taken to indicate a purpose to include such persons among those to whom the railroad company was to be liable under the act." And it was further held in this case that the fact that the porter collected tickets from passengers coming aboard in the late hours of the night did not alter his relation to the railroad, the court saying on this point: "This, however, was an obvious accommodation to the passenger in the Pullman car, and in any event it was merely an incidental matter which cannot be deemed to qualify the character of plaintiff's employment as it is to be viewed from the standpoint of the statute."

However, where the Pullman cars are owned and operated jointly by the railroad and the Pullman company, a porter employed thereon is an employee of the railroad within the meaning of the act. Oliver v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 196 Fed. 432, wherein it was said: "In my opinion this question must be answered in the affirmative: The contract between these two companies was entered into long prior to the passage of the act in question, and was therefore not entered into for the purpose of circumventing or avoiding liabilities imposed by law. Nevertheless, if such a contract is recognized and given the effect claimed for it by the defendant, there is nothing to prevent railway companies from avoiding obligations imposed upon them by this or other laws of Congress. It was attempted in argument to draw a distinction between those positive obligations imposed upon public service corporations by law and obligations voluntarily assumed by them for the comfort and convenience of passengers, and for their own profit. Such a distinction may, and in some cases does, exist, but it cannot be gainsaid that persons employed by railway companies in performing obligations voluntarily assumed are as much employees of the company as those servants who are discharging positive duties imposed by law. Persons employed as the deceased was come within the spirit of the statute, and those dependent on them for support should not be denied the protection it affords."

WINTERS.

United States Supreme Court—January 8, 1917.

242 U. S. 353; 37 S. Ct. 170.

Master and Servant — Federal Employers' Liability Act — Applicability — Saving Question for Review.

Error, if any, in basing a recovery in a personal injury action upon the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584]), does not entitle the defendant to have the judgment reversed, where such defendant in no way saved its rights to deny that the parties were engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident, or to object to the application of the federal statute, but, on the contrary, invoked and relied, without qualification, upon that statute and the rights that, because of that statute, it supposed itself to possess.

Employees within Act — Machinist in Roundhouse.

A machinist's helper, engaged, while making repairs in the roundhouse, upon an engine which had been used in hauling over the railway company's lines freight trains carrying both intrastate and interstate freight, and which was used in the same way after the accident, is not then employed in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149 [Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584]), governing the liability of an interstate carrier for injuries to its employees when employed in interstate commerce.

Error to Minnesota Supreme Court.

Action by George H. Winters, plaintiff, against Minneapolis and St. Louis Railroad Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in District Court, Ramsey county. Judgment affirmed by Supreme Court of Minnesota. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Frederick M. Miner and William H. Bremner for plaintiff in error.

Humphrey Barton and John H. Kay for defendant in error.

[354] HOLMES, J.—This is an action for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff, the defendant in error, at Marshalltown, Iowa, on October 21, 1912. The decisions below will be found in 126 Minnesota 260 and 131 Minnesota 181; Id. 496. The declaration alleged that at the time the plaintiff was employed by the defendant in interstate commerce, although it went on to set forth laws of the State of Iowa concerning the liability of railroads and contributory negligence. It alleged that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant in failing to furnish a reasonably safe instrument for the work that the plaintiff was set to do. The answer denied among other things that the plaintiff was employed in interstate commerce and set up the plaintiff's negligence and assumption of the risk. In the course of the trial, the facts touching the employment having been agreed, the counsel for the defendant intimated that he might want to take the question whether the commerce was interstate to this court, but said no more about it and later moved to dismiss the suit upon [355] the ground, among others, that the plaintiff assumed the risk, adverting to a decision that the defence was open under the federal act. Later still the presiding judge in his charge, without objection, told the jury that the action was tried under the law of the United States; and in the assignment of errors to the supreme court of the state one error assigned was that the jury was instructed that they might find a less than unanimous verdict in a suit founded upon the Federal Employers' Liability Act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584)—a proposition disposed of since the trial by a decision of this court. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Bombolis, 241 U. S. 211, Ann. Cas. 1916F 505, 36 S. Ct. 595, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 961, L.R.A. 1917A 86.

It is true that error is assigned because the court affirmed its opinion rendered after a former trial. But in the assignment of errors to the state court no such error is alleged, and beyond judicial recitals that the evidence with some exceptions was the same at both trials and quotations from the decision as to negligence, the record shows nothing but a casual statement of counsel as to what was done or ruled before. In short, at the trial the defendant in no way saved its rights to deny that the parties were engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the accident or to object to the application of the federal statute. On the contrary without qualification it invoked and relied upon that statute and the rights that because of that statute it supposed itself to possess. There is an ambiguous assignment of error that the supreme court of the state erred in holding as matter of law that the plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce and in holding that the question of the plaintiff's assumption of the risk was for the jury "thereby depriving the appellant of a right guaranteed to it under the provisions of" the Federal Employers' Liability Act. But if the first clause is more than an introduction to and reason for the second, then, as we have indicated, no foundation for such an assignment was laid in the proceedings before the state courts. [356] Therefore even if the courts and parties were wrong about the proper basis for the suit that fact does not entitle the defendant to have the judgment reversed. It cannot complain of a course to which it assented below.

The defendant, however, as has been seen, did save the questions concerning its right to a unanimous verdict and the assumption of risk under the act of Congress and also concerning the evidence of its negligence, all of which, of course, in a case arising under the act could be brought to this court. In the present case the facts upon which the act of Congress was supposed to apply are stated and were agreed, so that although, for the reasons that we have stated, an error on that point would not entitle the defendant to a new trial, it necessarily must be determined whether they show a foundation for the attempt to come here upon the questions that were reserved. The agreed statement is embraced in a few words. The plaintiff was making repairs upon an engine. This engine "had been used in the hauling of freight trains over defendant's line . . . which freight trains hauled both intrastate and interstate commerce, and . . . it was so used after the plaintiff's inquiry." The last time before the injury on which the engine was used was on October 18 when it pulled a freight train into Marshalltown, and it was used again on October 21, after the accident, to pull a freight train out from the same place. That is all that we have, and is not sufficient to bring the case under the act. This is not like the matter of repairs upon a road permanently devoted to commerce among the states. An engine as such is not permanently devoted to any kind of traffic and it does not appear that this engine was destined especially to anything more definite than such business as it might be needed for. It was not interrupted in an interstate haul to be repaired and go on. It simply had finished some interstate business and had not yet begun upon any other. Its next work, so far as appears, might [357] be interstate or confined to Iowa, as it should happen. At the moment it was not engaged in either. Its character as an instrument of commerce depended on its employment at the time not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

Employees Entitled to Protection under Federal Employers' Liability Act.

Introductory, 55.

General Rule, 55.

Application of Rule:

Employee Operating Train, 58.
Employee Coupling, Uncoupling or Switching Car, 58.
Employee Engaged in Construction or Repair, 59.
Employee Supplying Fuel or Water, 63.
Employee Guarding or Inspecting Property, 64.
Employee Going to or Returning from Work or Temporarily Diverted Therefrom, 66.
Employee Working on Watercraft, 68.
Other Employees, 68.

Introductory.

The present note reviews the recent cases which consider the question what employees are entitled to protection under the federal employers' liability act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584). The earlier cases discussing the subject are collected in the notes to Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, Ann. Cas. 1914C 163, and Shanks v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1916E 467. For cases dealing with the necessity under that act that the relation of employer and employee shall exist and when the relation exists, see the note to Chesapeake, etc. R. Co. v. Harmon's Admr. reported ante, this volume at page 41.

General Rule.

In construing the federal employers' liability act the courts agree that to warrant an action under the act both the employer and the employee must be engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury. Pryor v. Bishop, 234 Fed. 9, 148 C. C. A. 25; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Feightner (Ind.) 114 N. E. 659; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Cosio (Tex.) 182 S. W. 83. And see the cases cited throughout this note. "It is essential to a case under the statutes of the United States, not only that the defendant was at the time engaged in interstate commerce, but also (as the fact might be the defendant was likewise engaged in transportation within the state) that the plaintiff was, at the time the cause of action arose, employed in interstate commerce work. This is settled beyond the necessity of the citation of authorities laying down the ruling." Lucchetti v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 133 Fed. 137.

In Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Hansford, 173 Ky. 126, 190 S. W. 690, the test as to the character of the traffic was stated as follows: "The true test as to whether one is engaged in interstate commerce is this: Was the employee, at the time of the injury, engaged in interstate transportation, or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it?"

The rule for determining whether a railroad is engaged in interstate commerce so as to bring it within the operation of the federal employers' liability act was stated in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Kindlesparker, 234 Fed. 1, 148 C. C. A. 17, as follows: "In determining whether plaintiff was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of his injuries, consideration must be given to the character of the instrumentality upon which he was working and the nature of the work he was performing. The character of the locomotive, the instrumentality, may be ascertained both from the nature of the railroad on which defendant was accustomed to operate the engine and of the traffic handled by it. In view of all the facts above pointed out, it would seem plain enough that defendant's road constituted a link in interstate lines for all purposes of interstate and intrastate traffic. At the time in question, as we have seen, defendant was transporting freight both ways upon its line, and also handling freight in its yards, which originated upon its connections at points without and was destined to points within the state and also freight which originated within and was destined to places without the state; and, it is true, defendant was also transporting freight originating and destined locally within the state. The former fact, however, concerning freight interstate cannot be ignored because of the latter fact touching freight intrastate. Every road, which physically extends into or through two or more states and is so operated, necessarily carries both classes of freight, interstate and intrastate, and yet we do not see how it can in reason be said of such a carrier that it is any more certainly 'engaging in commerce between any of the several states,' within the meaning of the employers' liability act, than the present defendant was at the time plaintiff received his injuries; the latter situation as well as the former answers to the language of the act, 'that every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states . . . shall be liable in damages . . . by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, road-bed,' etc. 35 Stat. 65 (Comp. St. 1913, § 8657). True, defendant's railroad, in a physical sense, was entirely within the limits of the state of Michigan, but this did not prevent defendant from connecting the road with admittedly interstate lines and so engaging in interstate commerce; in every practical sense, according to the present record, defendant had at the time in question appropriated its road as well as its yards to the transportation and handling of interstate traffic as definitely as it had of traffic of an intrastate character, and these conditions existed at the time of the accident and afterwards. When a company thus in effect dedicates such a road and the yards to a dual use—interstate and intrastate—it invests the road with the characteristics of an interstate line and subjects it to the obligations of that sort of a line. It makes it a part of the through line and becomes entitled to a part of the receipts derived from the through service. Its duties must correspond with the benefits it seeks: it must respond to federal law and regulation; this, however, is not in any true sense violative of its rights and duties as an intrastate carrier."

In Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Parker, 242 U. S. 13, 37 S. Ct. 4, affirming 165 Ky. 658, 177 S. W. 465, the court, holding that the purpose of the act performed governed the determination of the question whether it was interstate commerce, said: "The business upon which the deceased was engaged at the moment was transferring an empty car from one switch track to another. This car was not moving in interstate commerce, and that fact was treated as conclusive by the court of appeals. In this the court was in error, for if, as there was strong evidence to show, and as the court seemed to assume, this movement was simply for the purpose of reaching and moving an interstate car, the purpose would control and the business would be interstate. The difference is marked between a mere expectation that the act done would be followed by other work of a different character, as in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, 233 U. S. 473, 478 [Ann. Cas. 1914C 163, 34 S. Ct. 646, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1051], and doing the act for the purpose of furthering the later work."

A railroad owned and operated by a lumber company for the transportation of logs from the forests to a tidewater point within the same state is not engaged in interstate commerce and an employee injured while working for such a road cannot maintain an action under the federal employers' liability act, and this is true though the logs after being sold at the tidewater point are transported by the purchasers beyond the limits of the state. McCluskey v. Marysville, etc. R. Co. 243 U. S. 36, 37 S. Ct. 374; Ray v. Merrill, etc. Logging Co. 243 U. S. 40, 37 S. Ct. 276.

That the employee must be engaged in interstate commerce at the precise time of the injury is emphasized by the courts. Thus in Erie R. Co. v. Welsh, 242 U. S. 303, 37 S. Ct. 110, the court set out the facts and its holding as follows: "Plaintiff was . . . a yard conductor engaged in night duty at its Brier Hill yard, a mile or more west of Youngstown; that he performed miscellaneous services in the way of shifting cars and breaking up and making up trains, under orders of the yardmaster, and had to apply frequently to the latter for such orders; that when any orders thus given had been performed, or had 'run out,' he usually reported at the yardmaster's office for further orders; that on the night in question plaintiff, with a yard crew, took a freight car loaded with merchandise destined to a point without the state, and a caboose which so far as appears was not to go beyond the limits of the state, from the Brier Hill yard eastwardly to the 'F. D. yard' in Youngstown, where the freight car was placed upon a siding, so that it might be made up into a train by another crew; that they then took the caboose a short distance farther and placed it upon another siding; that they next took the engine to a water plug and took on water, and then returned with it to the Brier Hill yard; that on this return journey the engine was slowed down near the yardmaster's office, which is at the easterly end of that yard, so as to enable Welsh to report for further orders, all previous orders having been executed; and that the injury was received while he was attempting to alight for that purpose. . . . The orders plaintiff would have received, had he not been injured on his way to the yardmaster's office, would have required him immediately to make up an interstate train. Upon the strength of this it is argued that his act at the moment of his injury partook of the nature of the work that, but for the accidental interruption, he would have been called upon to perform. In our opinion this view is untenable. By the terms of the employers' liability act the true test is the nature of the work being done at the time of the injury, and the mere expectation that plaintiff would presently be called upon to perform a task in interstate commerce is not sufficient to bring the case within the act."

As a rule the courts have been content to lay down the rule in general terms that both the employer and the employee must be engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury in order to bring the case within the federal statute and some confusion has arisen in cases where an employee engaged in interstate commerce was injured by an instrumentality of the railroad not so engaged. This, however, was finally settled by the Supreme Court in Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, Ann. Cas. 1914C 153, 33 S. Ct. 648, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1125, wherein it appeared that an employee engaged in interstate traffic was struck by an intrastate train. The court said: "Considering the terms of the statute, there can be no doubt that a right of recovery thereunder arises only where the injury is suffered while the carrier is engaged in interstate commerce and while the employee is employed by the carrier in such commerce; but it is not essential, where the causal negligence is that of a coemployee, that he also be employed in such commerce, for, if the other conditions be present, the statute gives a right of recovery for injury or death resulting from the negligence 'of any of the . . . employees of such carrier,' and this includes an employee engaged in intrastate commerce." To the same effect see In re Second Employers' Liability Cases, 223 U. S. 1, 32 S. Ct. 169, 56 U. S. (L. ed.) 327, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 44; Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 161 Pac. 1139; Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. v. Farmers' Trust, etc. Co. 183 Ind. 287, 108 N. E. 108; Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Walker, 162 Ky. 209, 172 S. W. 517. Compare Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Rogers, 221 Fed. 52, 136 C. C. A. 530. In Grybowski v. Erie R. Co. 88 N. J. L. 1, 95 Atl. 764, affirmed in 98 Atl. 1085, the court commenting on the decision in Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. supra, said: "Although in the Pedersen case it was conceded that the railroad company was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the occurrence of the accident, the principle of the decision would necessarily have compelled such a finding, even in the absence of the concession, for the plaintiff could not, at the time of the accident, have been employed by the carrier in such commerce unless the latter at the same time was engaged therein."

In Mayers v. Union R. Co. 256 Pa. St. 474, 100 Atl. 967, it does not appear from the opinion whether the injured employee was engaged in interstate commerce at the time of the injury. The court, apparently basing its decision entirely on the nature of the traffic in which the train that struck him was engaged, said: "The engine which struck the plaintiff and the cars which had come from Ohio had finished some interstate business, and had not yet begun upon any other. Their next work, so far as appears, might have been interstate or confined to Pennsylvania, as it should happen. At the moment the plaintiff was injured they were not engaged in either. Their character as instruments of commerce depended on their employment at the time, not upon remote probabilities or upon accidental later events." And in Mathews v. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. (Ala.) 76 So. 17, a foreman of a bridge gang injured while on a flat car carrying a pile driver, by a faulty apron of an abandoned coal chute striking him as the flat car was being hauled past the chute, was held not to be so engaged in interstate commerce as to come within the federal employers' liability act. In the two cases last cited, if the facts were such as to bring the injured employee within the class of interstate employees regardless of the nature of the instrumentality causing the injury they would seem to be contrary to the holding in Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. supra, and therefore erroneous.

However, if an employee is not engaged in interstate commerce the mere fact that he is injured by an interstate train will not bring his case within the federal employers' liability act. Hardy v. Atlanta, etc. R. Co. (Ga.) 93 S. E. 18.

Application of Rule.

EMPLOYEE OPERATING TRAIN.

It is not open to question that an employee engaged in operating a train carrying interstate traffic comes within the federal employers' liability act, it being uniformly so held by the courts. Washington R. etc. Co. v. Scala, 244 U. S. 630, 37 S. Ct. 654 (conductor); Waters v. Guile, 234 Fed. 532, 148 C. C. A. 298 (brakeman); Hunt v. Illinois Southern R. Co. 196 Ill. App. 539 (conductor); Daley v. Boston, etc. R. Co. 166 N. Y. S. 840 (brakeman); Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Hughes (Okla.) 166 Pac. 411 (fireman). Nor does the fact that a train carrying interstate shipments was a local train running only between points within the state alter the rule. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Feightner (Ind.) 114 N. E. 659 (brakeman).

An engineer on a gravel train hauling from North Dakota to Montana has been held to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Hein v. Great Northern R. Co. 34 N. D. 440, 159 N. W. 14, wherein it was said that neither the fact that a new train crew would take charge of the train before its going into Montana nor that the gravel was for use on the railroad's own track, whether main or spur, altered the interstate character of the engineer's work.

However, while cars may have an interstate character, this is true only while they are in interstate movement, and the interstate movement ceases when they reach the first distributing point in the state of their destination. Thus in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Feightner (Ind.) 114 N. E. 659, it was held that where the evidence did not show that cars after reaching a point of distribution would be sent out of the state it could not be said that a brakeman on a train taking them up and bound for a point within the state was engaged in interstate commerce. And similarly in Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Pace (Tex.) 184 S. W. 1051, it was held that coal billed to a point in Texas from Oklahoma and there reshipped to other Texas points lost its interstate character on reaching its first destination and an engineer on the local train hauling the reshipment did not come within the statute.

A fireman on an engine belonging to an intrastate road who was killed after the engine had assisted in moving trains carrying interstate traffic but at a time when it was merely reporting for duty at another point, has been held not to be within the act since he was not engaged in interstate commerce, at the precise time of the injury. Hoag v. Ulster, etc. R. Co. 177 App. Div. 433, 164 N. Y. S. 529. And it has been held that a conductor on a freight route between two points within a state could not be said to have been engaged in interstate commerce on his return trip because of the fact that on his outgoing trip the train carried freight destined to points without the state. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Peery, 242 U. S. 292, 37 S. Ct. 122, reversing 123 Minn. 264, 143 N. W. 724, and 128 Minn. 119, 150 N. W. 382, 1103. In that case it was said: "Of course the plaintiff treats the round trip as one, and the return as merely the necessary complement of the trip out. The conclusion is drawn that the plaintiff still was engaged in interstate commerce because the train out had cars destined to Tennessee. But on the other hand the trips out and back were distinct, in opposite directions, with different trains. The plaintiff's journey was confined wholly to Kentucky. Only the circumstance that the southbound train from Paducah carried freight destined to beyond Fulton caused him to be engaged in interstate commerce while on that trip. On the return when he was injured all the freight had domestic destinations. It is true that the greater certainty of getting traffic going south probably was the chief reason for the establishment of the circuit; but they got what they could coming back, generally a train or a part of a train. It seems to us extravagant to subordinate the northerly to the southerly journey so completely that if on the latter there happened to be a parcel destined beyond the state, the conductor should be regarded as still engaged in commerce among the states when going from Fulton to Paducah even though he had a full train devoted solely to domestic commerce. For it must be remembered that if the northerly movement is regarded as the incident of the southerly, that subordination is independent of the character of the commerce, and depends solely on the fact that southerly moving business, no matter what, induced establishing the route. Therefore it does not matter that the interstate traffic moving south was greater than, for purposes of illustration, we have supposed."

EMPLOYEE COUPLING, UNCOUPLING OR SWITCHING CAR.

Members of a switching crew engaged in making up a train for interstate service are engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act. Hurley v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 133 Minn.

101, 157 N. W. 1005; Geer v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. (Tex.) 194 S. W. 939.

And this is true although the cars contain no interstate shipment at the time of the injury, if they have been designated for such service. Christy v. Wabash R. Co. 195 Mo. App. 232, 191 S. W. 241, wherein it was said: "In this case, deceased was engaged in switching a car to a place in defendant's yards, where, it is true, it was to be placed in a local train and taken to a station a dozen miles away, but for the purpose of being loaded that day with an interstate shipment. No sound reason can be suggested why that was not interstate service. We think it was such service in a special and immediate sense. For the use to which the car was to be put was the already ascertained service of a specific shipment into another state; and that shipment was to be made on the day the car was being switched out of the yards for that use."

A conductor of a switch engine engaged in moving cars to be made up into an interstate train is so engaged in interstate commerce as to be within the act. Southern R. Co. v. Fisher (Ala.) 74 So. 580.

While an empty car loses its interstate character as soon as it reaches its destination in a state and subsequent movements of the car preparatory to sending it to another point in the state do not constitute interstate commerce, a car containing an interstate shipment continues its interstate character until the shipment is delivered to its final destination, and a switchman injured while switching such a car after its arrival at one point within the state preparatory to placing it in a local train to be sent to another point within the state, its final destination, is within the act. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Meadors (Ky.) 197 S. W. 440.

Likewise a member of a switching crew injured while coupling cars has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce where it appeared that one of the cars had been brought from without the state and before it was completely unloaded was moved temporarily but was to be returned to complete the unloading, the court holding that the service of the car in interstate commerce had not been completed. Wagner v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 277 Ill. 114, 115 N. E. 201.

And so, a member of a switching crew engaged in moving a refrigerator car which had been iced preparatory to receiving an interstate shipment of fruit has been held to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Alldread v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 93 Wash. 209, 160 Pac. 429.

But a member of a switching crew removing cars from the shops to a shed to be iced has been held not to be within the act where it appeared that none of the cars had been specifically designated for interstate service. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois Industrial Board, 277 Ill. 512, 115 N. E. 647, wherein the court said: "It has been held that if the object of a switching movement is the placing of an empty car in a position to receive a load to be carried out of the state the car is engaged in moving interstate commerce from the moment the switching movement begins. (Breske v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 115 Minn. 386.) This is only where the switching movement is directed for the express purpose of loading the particular car with material to be shipped out of the state. In this case no particular one or more of the fifteen cars were designed to be used to carry an interstate shipment at the time the conductor of the switching crew was ordered to move them to the storage track. It was not until these cars were again moved to the loading platform and it was known what material was ready to be loaded that it was determined that ten of them should be loaded for destinations outside the state and one to carry a shipment to a point within the state. The movement of the string of cars by the switching crew of which the deceased was a member was a local movement, and as none of these cars had at that time been selected to participate in an interstate shipment the deceased was not engaged in interstate commerce, and the circuit court properly approved and confirmed the award and decision of the industrial board. The icing of the cars does not change the situation. The same procedure in icing was required in all the shipments made by Armour & Co. whether interstate or intrastate, and was, in effect, a part of the equipment of the cars themselves."

EMPLOYEE ENGAGED IN CONSTRUCTION OR REPAIR.

The courts draw a distinction between the repair of rolling stock, tools and other appliances of a railroad which may or may not be used in its interstate service, and the repair of its tracks, bridges, etc., which though used also for intrastate commerce are necessarily used for interstate commerce. In the case of the repair of rolling stock, etc., the employee so engaged is held not to be within the act unless the instrument under repair is designated positively for use in interstate commerce. Thus in Narey v. Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. 177 Ia. 606, 159 N. W. 230, wherein it appeared that an employee engaged in repair work on an engine, which had been engaged in interstate commerce but which at the time of the injury was not selected for use in either intrastate or interstate commerce and which might be used in either, it was said: "As to the tracks, bridges, etc., they may be used for both interstate and intrastate commerce. In such case, even though the tracks are used for both, they are necessarily used for interstate commerce. In the case last supposed, the employment by one to keep the track in repair necessarily and directly contributes to its use for interstate commerce, and unless the track is kept in repair, interstate traffic could not be carried on at all. So, too, had it been shown that engine 446 was being prepared for an interstate trip. But an engine may be so used in intrastate commerce. In the instant case, had it been shown that plaintiff was, at the time he was hurt, engaged in preparing engine 446 for use by the defendant for a trip outside the state, the rule might apply, but, as stated, there is no such showing." To the same effect see the reported case.

In New Jersey Central R. Co. v. Paslick, 239 Fed. 713, 152 C. C. A. 547, wherein it appeared that an employee was injured while at work repairing a car belonging to another interstate carrier, the court, quoting and relying on the reported case, said: "If the repair of an engine in the intervals between its interstate occupations is not sufficiently close to commerce to be a part of it, the repair of a car, which moves only when the engine hauls it, is certainly no closer."

Likewise in Hudson, etc. R. Co. v. Iorio, 239 Fed. 853, 152 C. C. A. 641, the court, applying the rule as stated in the reported case to a case wherein it appeared that an employee was engaged in placing rails in a pit for future use, said: "It cannot be said that the rails which Iorio was engaged in storing against a use that was certainly not imminent, and might never occur, were at the moment engaged in, or practically part of, interstate commerce; for that commerce was going on without any present assistance, either from Iorio, or the rails on which he was working, or the men who were working with him. We therefore hold that the actual employment or use at the moment of injury of the thing upon which the person injured was working is the test of applicability of the statute, under circumstances such as shown here. By that test plaintiff below was not practically engaged in or a part of interstate commerce when he was hurt, and the judgment is reversed."

An employee engaged in repairing a car which was used during the previous week in interstate commerce but which was used in intrastate commerce after its repair has been held not to be within the act. Loveless v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. (Ala.) 75 So. 7.

Similarly an employee assisting in unloading wreckage from a car for the purpose of selecting that which is capable of repair is not brought within the act merely because inspectors several days later designate the parts, through which he is injured, to be shipped out of the state for repair. Schaeffer v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 172 Ky. 337, 180 S. W. 237, wherein it was said: "Can it, we may ask, with any pretense of reason be contended that where an employee of a common carrier is killed in unloading from a car in its yards wrecked material, a week before removed from the scene of the wreck, that it may be separated in parts for other employees to later inspect and determine what part of it, if any, shall be repaired for future use, that such employee was engaged in interstate commerce, because other employees, more than a month later, happened to decide that a particular part of the wrecked material, and the same which fell upon and killed the decedent, should be repaired for some sort of use in the carrier's business and even sent into another state for that purpose? In our opinion the evidence contained in the record fails to show that the work appellant's decedent was performing when the injuries that caused his death were received, was a service in interstate commerce, hence the action of the trial court in peremptorily directing a verdict for the appellees was proper."

But in Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Kindlesparker, 234 Fed. 1, 148 C. C. A. 17, it was held that an engine used in both intrastate and interstate commerce partook of the character of both and retained such character while it was laid up for repairs, and so an employee injured while making such repairs comes within the federal act. That case however was decided prior to the decision in the reported case and may be considered as overruled by that case.

However, it has been held that where a workman is engaged in the repair of an engine or car used solely in interstate commerce he may maintain an action under the federal employers' liability act. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. v. Branson, 128 Md. 678, 98 Atl. 225; Smiegal v. Great Northern R. Co. 105 Wis. 57, 160 N. W. 1057.

Where the instrumentality under repair consists of the track, bridges, telephone or telegraph wires or other necessary general means of operation of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce, an employee injured while so engaged is generally held to be engaged in interstate commerce, and the fact that the road may also do an intrastate business is immaterial. Thus a section hand employed in repairing the track of a railroad engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce is entitled to the benefits of the act. New York, etc. R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 147, Ann. Cas. 1917D 1139, 37 S. Ct. 540, reversing 210 N. Y. 284, Ann. Cas. 1916A 817, 110 N. E. 614, 168 App. Div. 351, 153 N. Y. S. 499; Treadway v. St.

Louis, etc. R. Co. 127 Ark. 211, 191 S. W. 930; Denver, etc. R. Co. v. DeVella (Colo.) 165 Pac. 254. Likewise a section hand engaged in repairing an interstate track, who after "smoothing" the track was sent to assist in loading rails to be placed on the track, and was injured while so engaged, has been held to be within the act. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Williams, 175 Ky. 679, 194 S. W. 920. Similarly, a section hand engaged in repairing a spur track leading to scales on which interstate cars were weighed has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the act. Dowell v. Wabash R. Co. (Mo.) 190 S. W. 939.

An employee engaged in removing wreckage from a track used by the railroad in both interstate and intrastate commerce has been held to be within the act. Denver, etc. R. Co. v. Wilson (Colo.) 163 Pac. 857; Schaeffer v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 172 Ky. 337, 189 S. W. 237. And see Southern R. Co. v. Puckett, reported in full post, this volume, at page 69. In Canadian Pac. R. Co. v. Thompson, 232 Fed. 353, 146 C. C. A. 401, it was said: "The main defense, of course, was either that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was not engaged in interstate commerce so far as this transaction was concerned, or that the interstate was not so engaged at the time when the accident occurred. The proofs, as we say, do not contravene the facts substantially as we have stated them. If there are any variances, they are too unimportant to be commented on so far as this case is concerned. In all this class of cases, the effort by the defendant corporations has been to split into fragments what was in fact a unity, and what was in fact a unitary occupation or enterprise. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is notoriously and presumably a single enterprise, extending from the Atlantic Ocean to the Pacific Ocean, in part through the United States, but in the greater part through Canada. Both in the inherent purposes of the organization, and in its operation, there is one, single, consolidated, unitary essence; and so far as any person connected with trains operating thereon, in any way contributed to produce the result aimed at by the corporation, the corporation was a single, consolidated, international, interstate enterprise; and in all its essential aspects the train of cars employed in the present case for the present purpose, connecting, as it did international points, and all the persons employed on that train, were engaged in an international enterprise and operation. In this aspect there were no fragments, but all was combined in a consolidated and single purpose. . . . In the present case the interstate was employed as a conductor or brakeman running trains between Brownville, in the state of Maine, and Megantic and McAdam Junction, in Canada, being east and west terminals in a foreign country, and where the train in which he was engaged was especially set up for and engaged in gathering up rails from interstate tracks, to be taken to other parts of the interstate tracks; and this was being done without any suggestion that they were to be left at intrastate points. It is therefore evident that the deceased was directly employed in an interstate enterprise, which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company as a unit had undertaken."

An employee engaged in cleaning out ditches along an interstate railroad track has been held to be within the act. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Blankenship (Ala.) 74 So. 960. And an employee engaged in cleaning out an ash pit used by both interstate and intrastate engines has been held to have been engaged in work on an interstate instrumentality and so to come within the act. Grybowski v. Erie R. Co. 89 N. J. L. 361, 98 Atl. 1085, affirming 88 N. J. L. 1, 95 Atl. 764.

So, an employee assisting an engineer in making a survey with a view to improving a curve in the track has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce. Southern R. Co. v. McGuin, 240 Fed. 649, 153 C. C. A. 447.

In Grand Trunk R. Co. v. Knapp, 233 Fed. 950, 147 C. C. A. 624, it was held that a carpenter riding in a train carrying equipment for the repair of a bridge used for interstate and intrastate commerce was within the federal act where it appeared that he was to assist in making the repairs. And in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Netherton, 175 Ky. 159, 193 S. W. 1035, a painter working on a bridge used in both interstate and intrastate commerce was held to be within the act.

A carpenter engaged in repairing a pump-house and pumping station used in interstate commerce has been held to be within the act. Newkirk v. Pryon (Mo.) 183 S. W. 682.

And so it has been held that an employee engaged in repairing a telegraph line used by the railroad in dispatching its trains, both intrastate and interstate, was engaged in interstate commerce and so was within the operation of the federal employers' liability act. Coal, etc. R. Co. v. Deal, 231 Fed. 604, 145 C. C. A. 490, affirming 215 Fed. 285 (writ of error granted to Supreme Court, Coal, etc. R. Co. v. Deal, 232 Fed. 1020, 146 C. C. A. 665); Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 161 Pac. 1143; Collins v. Michigan Cent. R. Co. 193 Mich. 303, 159 N. W. 535.

However, a section hand engaged in helping to remove ties from the right of way and piling them for safekeeping and future use has been held not to have been engaged in interstate commerce, and the fact that the ties were afterwards used on a section of track over which interstate commerce was hauled did not alter the rule. Missouri, etc. R. Co. v. Watson (Tex.) 195 S. W. 1177. So a section hand engaged in peeling railroad ties along the right of way for future use on the track has been held not to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Karras v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 165 Wis. 578, 162 N. W. 923, wherein it was said: "It appears that the ties plaintiff was peeling had been purchased by defendant at Watersmeet, Mich., and shipped to this track section. They were dumped in piles of from thirty to fifty and more to be peeled and subsequently used where needed in the repair of the track. They were so used during the summer and up to some time in September. Ties with the bark on were not put into the track. Hence in order to be fully prepared for track repair they must be peeled. The peeling, therefore, was a part of the process of manufacture of the ties for the purpose intended. This process, in the case at bar, was carried on independent of, and separate from, a then immediate use of the ties in track repair. It was a preparation of them for future use. That it was done by the defendant upon its right of way, instead of by others elsewhere, or that the ties were destined for interstate commerce, cannot constitute the process of their manufacture interstate commerce work. To constitute that there must be an actual entering upon or engagement in such work. A mere manufacture or preparation of material which is destined at some time in the future at some place to be used in interstate commerce work is not enough."

Holding that a section hand employed ordinarily in replacing rails on an interstate track was not engaged in interstate commerce while merely loading old rails lying on the right of way, the court in Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Hansford, 173 Ky. 126, 190 S. W. 690, said: "The federal employers' liability act does not necessarily apply to the same person in all the details of his employment, since one man may have duties including both interstate and intrastate commerce and he would be subject to the act while engaged in the one, and not in the other. . . . It will be observed that it nowhere appears that Hansford was engaged, either in taking out old rails or putting in new rails; the most that can be said from the proof is that Hansford was engaged in loading old rails that had, at some time, been taken out of the track and were lying on the right of way. This proof brings the case squarely within the decision in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Kelly, 167 Ky. 745, 181 S. W. 375, where it was held that a section hand, engaged in loading on a flat car old rails from the right of way, precisely as in this case, was not engaged in interstate commerce."

A carpenter engaged in erecting a stove pipe to be used in a roundhouse where engines engaged in interstate commerce were kept was held in Dunn v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. (Mo.) 190 S. W. 966, not to be engaged in interstate commerce.

So a carpenter building forms into which concrete was to be poured to form a retaining wall for the tracks of a railroad engaged in both interstate and intrastate commerce has been held not to be within the act Dickinson v. Illinois Industrial Board (Ill.) 117 N. E. 438, wherein it was said: "His employment need not be directly in the transportation of goods from one state into another or in the operation or movement of trains. If he is engaged in the operation, maintenance, or repair of any of the instrumentalities used by the carrier in the transportation of goods from one state into another he is engaged in interstate commerce. Section men repairing a track, carpenters repairing a bridge, machinists and car repairers working on engines and cars, and hostlers caring for engines, are engaged in interstate commerce if the track, bridge, engines, and cars are used in interstate commerce. Their work has a direct and substantial connection with interstate transportation and is an essential part of it. This cannot be said of Olson's work. It had no connection, even remote, with transportation. It was preliminary to the erection of a structure which might eventually form a part of the roadbed used in interstate commerce. The forms were not instrumentalities of interstate commerce, and the retaining walls, which had not yet been built, could not be such instrumentalities until the filling which they were to retain and upon which the tracks were to rest had been deposited in place. Olson's work was a matter of indifference, so far as the interstate commerce in which the plaintiffs in error were engaged was concerned, though the structure to be erected might eventually become an instrument of such commerce."

In Killes v. Great Northern R. Co. 93 Wash. 416, 161 Pac. 69, it was held that a workman building a scaffold to be used in painting a freight shed used for interstate traffic was not engaged in interstate commerce. The court said: "The building of a scaffold in a freight shed upon which a workman is to stand while painting the roof has no direct or immediate connection with interstate commerce, nor is it a necessary incident in furthering the movement of interstate freight. It may be admitted that the freight shed is an instrumentality made use of in interstate commerce, but the respondent was not at work upon the freight shed. His act was at least one step removed from any con-section with interstate commerce or any of its instrumentalities either directly or indirectly."

Following the decision of the Supreme Court in Shanks v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 239 U. S. 556, 36 S. Ct. 188, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 436, L.R.A.1916C 797, affirming 214 N. Y. 413, Ann. Cas. 1916E 467, 108 N. E. 644, that a machinist engaged in moving to a new location an overhead countershaft in a shop devoted to the repair of locomotives used in both interstate and intrastate commerce, was not engaged in interstate commerce, the court in Castonguay v. Grand Trunk Ry. (Vt.) 100 Atl. 908, held that a workman engaged in the repair of a roundhouse wall was not employed in interstate commerce, saying: "If he was then at work upon a direct and permanent instrumentality of such transportation, such as the road bed or a bridge, or a locomotive or car temporarily withdrawn from that service for repairs, he was within the protection of the act; if, on the other hand, he was working upon an indirect, remote, or possible instrumentality of such transportation, he was not within the act. We feel constrained to hold that this case is ruled by the Shanks case and not by the Pedersen case, and that Castonguay's relation to interstate transportation was too remote to bring him within the act. It seems clear that if a workman changing a shaft in a machine shop is too far removed from the actual transportation to be within the act, he would be equally so if he was repairing or replacing the shaft; and he would be equally so if he was changing the location of a window in the shop, or repairing it, or replacing it. The machine shop and the roundhouse are both parts of the necessary equipment of interstate railroads; but they are not so directly related to actual transportation as 'to be practically a part of it.' If Shanks was not engaged in interstate commerce, Castonguay could not have been, for he was one step further removed from actual transportation."

An employee engaged in loading sand and gravel at a gravel bank for repair of an interstate railroad, and who was killed by the falling of a portion of the bank on which he was at work, has been held not to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Yazoo, etc. R. Co. v. Houston, 114 Miss. 888, 75 So. 690, wherein the court basing its ruling on the decision in Delaware, etc. R. Co. v. Yurkonis, 238 U. S. 439, 35 S. Ct. 902, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1397, and distinguishing that case from Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, Ann. Cas. 1914C 153, 33 S. Ct. 649, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1125, said: "It is insisted by appellee that all of the decisions of the supreme court since the decisions in the Pedersen and Yurkonis cases clearly indicate that the supreme court has intended to limit the influence of the Pedersen case rather than to extend it. Whether this be true or not is not for us to say, but since appellant stands squarely upon the Pedersen case, saying, 'If this case is sound, this case must be governed by the federal act,' we will examine the Pedersen case and its applicability to the present case. The gist of the Pedersen case, as interpreted by appellant's briefs, is that Pedersen was 'engaged in the repair of an interstate highway,' and for this reason he was 'employed in interstate commerce.' This analysis of the Pedersen case seems to be sound, but it seems to us that the Supreme Court of the United States in the Yurkonis case drew in the lines somewhat, by holding that Yurkonis did not bring himself within the federal act. He was mining coal intended to be used in interstate commerce, but the manner of receiving the injury was too remote to justify the conclusion that he was employed in interstate commerce. A consideration of the facts developed upon the trial of the instant case, taken most favorably for appellant, indicate that the deceased was employed in mining gravel for the ultimate repairing or building of the highway over which the interstate commerce of the railroad would be operated. Yurkonis was employed in mining coal to be used by the carrier to make steam power for the transportation of its commerce between the states, and yet the Supreme Court said: 'The manner of the receiving of the injury by plaintiff showed conclusively that it did not occur in interstate commerce.' May we not say the same about Mr. Houston? It seems to us that the character of the work and the manner in which the injury was received in the Yurkonis case and in the present case are strikingly similar. On the other hand, Pedersen was working directly upon the highway, and received his injury by a train operated on the highway. So, as we interpret the situation, this case is controlled by the principles of the Yurkonis case."

A laborer engaged in cutting a tunnel for an interstate railroad is not engaged in interstate commerce, where, the tunnel is not so far completed as to be used as an instrumentality of interstate commerce. Raymond v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 243 U. S. 43, 37 S. Ct. 268.

EMPLOYEE SUPPLYING FUEL OR WATER.

An employee engaged in providing coal and water for trains used in interstate commerce is within the federal employers' liability act. Guy v. Cincinnati Northern R. Co. (Mich.) 164 N. W. 454.

So, an employee engaged in operating a pumping station, which furnishes water to be used for both interstate and intrastate business has been held to be within the act. Roush v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 243 Fed. 712, wherein the test was said to be "whether the plaintiff, at the time of the accident, was engaged in interstate transportation, or in work so closely related thereto as to be practically a part thereof." "The pumping station," said the court, "was an instrumentality being used indiscriminately for interstate and intrastate commerce. The work being performed by the plaintiff was so closely related to interstate transportation as to be practically a part of it. He was not engaged in original or independent work too remotely connected with interstate transportation to be said not to be practically a part thereof. It is true, his work also was necessary in carrying on intrastate transportation, but when the efforts of the employee at the time he was injured may relate to either class of transportation, then he is within the act, and his right of action is controlled by it."

Similarly in Collins v. Erie R. Co. 245 Fed. 811, it was held that an employee engaged in pumping water for use by engines in interstate commerce was within the act provided it appeared that the water was for immediate use and its use was not dependent on remote possibilities.

In Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. De Bord (Tex.) 192 S. W. 767, it was held that a brakeman engaged in assisting in the placing of a coal car on an elevated track so that it could be unloaded into coal chutes from which engines used in interstate traffic were supplied was engaged in interstate commerce.

But in Grovio v. New York Cent. R. Co. 176 App. Div. 230, 162 N. Y. S. 1026, wherein it appeared that an employee was engaged in shoveling coal into engines at a coal chute or shoveling the coal from cars into the chute and that immediately before his injury he had been engaged in coaling a switch engine which was used for handling both interstate and intrastate business, it was held that he was not engaged in interstate commerce.

In Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Harrington, 241 U. S. 177, 36 S. Ct. 517, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 941, affirming (Mo.) 180 S. W. 443, it appeared that at the time an employee was killed he was engaged in causing the removal of coal from storage tracks to the coal shed or chutes by which the same would be delivered to locomotives used in interstate traffic. The Supreme Court held that the Act of Congress did not apply because there was no close or direct relation to interstate transportation in the taking of the coal to the coal chutes. Following Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Harrington, supra, the court in Kelly v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 238 Fed. 95, 151 C. C. A. 171, wherein it appeared that a carpenter was injured while causing the removal of lumber from storage tracks to certain coal chutes which he had been directed to repair, said: "What is there, then, in the case at bar from which it can be inferred that Kelly was, at the time he was killed, engaged in interstate transportation? His engagement in causing the transfer of the lumber from the storage tracks to the place where it was to be used does not connect him more closely with transportation than Harrington's engagement in taking coal from the storage tracks to the coal chutes. In neither case was there such close direct relation to interstate transportation as would require the application of the provisions of the law."

In Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Barlow, 244 U. S. 183, 87 S. Ct. 515, reversing 214 N. Y. 116, 107 N. E. 814, it was held that where it appeared that coal brought from without the state had remained on sidings for several days before being switched to the coal chutes, it had lost its interstate character and therefore a member of the switching crew injured while placing the cars on the chutes was not engaged in interstate commerce.

EMPLOYEE GUARDING OR INSPECTING PROPERTY.

A flagman stationed as a watchman at a street crossing of a railroad engaged in interstate commerce is so closely connected with such commerce that his employment partakes of its nature and he may maintain an action for personal injuries under the federal employers' liability act. Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 161 Pac. 1142; West v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (N. C.) 93 S. E. 479.

And it has been held that the fact that the particular train which a gateman was attempting to protect and by which he was injured was an intrastate train did not affect his status as an interstate employee. Southern Pac. Co. v. Industrial Acc. Commission (Cal.) 161 Pac. 1139, wherein the court said: "The substantial ground for petitioner's claim that deceased was then engaged in interstate transportation is that he was engaged in keeping one of its instrumentalities of interstate commerce in condition for the carrying on of that commerce; or, to put it in a more concrete way, that he was then engaged in keeping petitioner's tracks at the crossing clear and unimpeded for the passage according to schedule of interstate passengers and freight carried by petitioner. It is settled by the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, the ultimate authority on such a question as the one before us, that a railroad track used indiscriminately by a carrier in both its interstate and intrastate commerce is an instrumentality of interstate commerce, and that, notwithstanding its double use, those 'engaged in its repair or in keeping it in suitable condition for use' are, while so engaged, employed in interstate commerce. Such work, it is said, 'is so closely related to such commerce as to be in practice and in legal contemplation a part of it.' See Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, 33 S. Ct. 648; 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1125, Ann. Cas. 1914C 153. So there can be no question as to the character of the work where an employee is engaged in direct work upon an instrumentality in actual use for purposes of interstate commerce, such as actually repairing the railroad track or doing thereon any work designed to keep it in suitable condition for use. Thus it is clear that one employed in actually removing from the track any obstacles to the passage of trains caused by a derailment or other accident would be employed in interstate commerce, in view of the decisions of the United States Supreme Court. He would be directly engaged in the repair of and putting again into condition for use that instrumentality of interstate commerce. The question here is, in the light of the evidence, a very narrow one, and is simply whether the principle of these decisions is applicable to one whose duties are in part to keep the track free of such obstructions to the uninterrupted passage of trains according to schedule as may be caused by passing vehicles. So far as the relation of such employee to one attempting to cross the track is concerned, it may be conceded that there is no ingredient of interstate commerce, and that, if the only consequence to be avoided by the employment was that of injury to such a person, the act of Congress relied on would not be applicable. But in the light of the evidence it seems to us that the scope of the employment in which deceased was engaged at the time of the accident was broader, and extended to keeping the track itself in suitable condition for use as an instrumentality of interstate commerce. In view of the evidence, the work of such a crossing gateman or flagman, so far as the railroad is concerned, is similar, in principle, to that of the track walker, whose duty it is to see that the track is in safe condition for the passage of trains, to that of the employee in the signal tower, whose duty it is to supervise and give the signals for the passage of trains, and to that of the employee engaged in repairs on the automatic signal apparatus with which this petitioner's line is equipped. All such employees may fairly be said, it seems to us, to be directly engaged, in substantial part, at least, in keeping the track in suitable condition for use. There is, of course, no analogy between the case of one so engaged, and that of a trainman engaged in the operation of an exclusively intrastate train. The duties of the latter are solely with reference to the operation and safety of the particular train on which he is engaged, and he has no duty whatever to perform in regard to keeping any instrumentality of interstate commerce in condition for use. Such is the full scope of his employment, and it has no relation whatever to interstate commerce, close or otherwise. The duties of deceased, as we have seen, had to do directly with the keeping of an instrumentality of interstate commerce in suitable condition for the use of such commerce. And exactly as in the case of one engaged in repairing such an instrumentality after injury thereto has occurred, who concededly is engaged in interstate commerce, it is immaterial whether or not any interstate traffic was immediately to be had over the same. The deceased was actually engaged at the moment of the accident in protecting that instrumentality from injury. His situation in this regard was, in view of the evidence, the same as it would have been if he had been one of a number of guards stationed along the line of railroad to prevent third persons from removing the rails or unlawfully placing obstructions on the track. Certainly their work would not be held to be unrelated to the safety of the track as a highway of interstate commerce."

A car inspector who while riding on an interstate train discovered a fallen brake beam on one of the cars and was injured while aiding the conductor in repairing it, has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce. Lynch v. Central Vermont R. Co. 89 Vt. 363, 95 Atl. 683.

In Anest v. Columbia, etc. R. Co. 89 Wash. 609, 154 Pac. 1100, it was said of an inspector engaged in inspecting the main line track of an interstate railroad: "In the present case there could be no possible separation of decedent's inspection of appellant's track for the purpose of its intrastate commerce and of its interstate commerce. The two were obviously concomitant. His inspection was for the purpose of aiding and assisting the appellant in the operation of its trains, cars, and locomotives, and the carrying on of its business both of interstate and intrastate commerce."

But a night watchman charged with the duty of guarding tools and material for the construction of a new depot and track to be used in interstate commerce has been held not to be engaged in interstate commerce as tested by the rule that the employee at the time of the injury must be engaged in interstate transportation, or in work so closely related to it as to be practically a part of it. New York Cent. R. Co. v. White, 243 U. S. 188, Ann. Cas. 1917D 629, 37 S. Ct. 247, L.R.A.1917D 1.

A railroad detective riding on a train of cars which was being switched in the railroad yards has been held not to be engaged in interstate commerce where it did not appear that there were interstate cars in that vicinity. Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Illinois Industrial Board, 273 Ill. 528, 113 N. E. 80, L.R.A.1916F 540, wherein it was said: "It is true that it is conceded that there were one or more cars within the yards at the time of the injury which contained interstate freight. Where these cars were located is not shown. If they were a part of the transfer cut which Stockton was engaged in inspecting or upon which he was hanging at the time of his injury the burden was upon plaintiff in error to show that fact. It must be assumed for the purposes of this case that none of the cars in this transfer cut contained interstate freight. Had plaintiff in error shown that at the time of the accident Stockton was actually inspecting cars containing interstate freight, or that cars containing such freight were at the moment within the line of his vision, a different question would be presented. For all this record shows, the cars containing interstate freight may have been one, two or three miles distant from Stockton. If such were the case he could not reasonably be said to have been at that time engaged in a work which was a part of the interstate commerce in which the carrier was engaged, and under such circumstances the accident to Stockton could in no way affect the handling of such interstate freight. At such a distance Stockton was not able to exercise any authority or supervision over such freight, and it might be broken into, pilfered or injured as effectively whether Stockton was injured or uninjured."

A person employed by a railroad to assist in a search for train robbers who had robbed an interstate train has been held not to have been engaged in interstate commerce so as to come within the act. Alabama Great Southern R. Co. v. Bonner (Ala.) 75 So. 986, wherein it was said: "Such an employment is not commerce of any kind, nor is it so related to or connected with interstate commerce as to bring the business or relation within the protection of any of the interstate commerce statutes, such as the one here sought to be invoked, authorizing the recovery of damages for the wrongful death of a servant."

EMPLOYEE GOING TO OR RETURNING FROM WORK OR TEMPORARILY DIVERTED THEREFROM.

Holding that an employee leaving the yards of a railroad after his day's work which consisted of switching both interstate and intrastate commerce, was within the federal act, the court in Erie R. Co. v. Winfield, 244 U. S. 170, 37 S. Ct. 556, reversing 88 N. J. L.

619, 96 Atl. 394, said: "In leaving the carrier's yard at the close of his day's work the deceased was but discharging a duty of his employment. See North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 260 [Ann. Cas. 1914C 159, 34 S. Ct. 305, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 591]. Like his trip through the yard to his engine in the morning, it was a necessary incident of his day's work and partook of the character of that work as a whole, for it was no more an incident of one part than of another. His day's work was in both interstate and intrastate commerce, and so when he was leaving the yard at the time of the injury his employment was in both. That he was employed in interstate commerce is therefore plain, and that his employment also extended to intrastate commerce is for present purposes of no importance."

But compare Jacoby v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 165 Wis. 610, 161 N. W. 751, 164 N. W. 88, wherein it was held that a car record clerk, who after completing his duties was injured while leaving the yards, was not at the time engaged in interstate commerce. The court distinguished the case from that where a fireman was injured while going from his engine to his boarding house, preparatory to returning to his engine for an interstate trip, on the ground that the car clerk was leaving for the day after finishing his duties and with no intention to return.

An employee who was injured while on his way for orders from his superior has been held not to have been engaged in interstate commerce at the time of his injury since the nature of his work was undetermined until his orders had been given, and it was further held that the fact that but for his injury he would have been given orders requiring him to engage in interstate commerce did not alter the rule. Erie R. Co. v. Welsh, 242 U. S. 303, 37 S. Ct. 116, affirming 89 Ohio St. 81, 105 N. E. 189.

So a fireman on his way to work on a switch engine who was killed while crossing the tracks has been held not to be engaged at the time in interstate commerce, though the initial work of the switch engine was interstate commerce, the court basing its opinion on the ground that the employee had not actually begun his duties at the time of his injury. Knowles v. New York, etc. R. Co. 177 App. Div. 262, 164 N. Y. S. 1.

In McBain v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 52 Mont. 578, 160 Pac. 654, it was held that, under the rule that the employment at the precise time of the injury is the test of the nature of the work, a brakeman who after the completion of his trip and before assignment to another was injured while going through the yards for material for use on a future trip, the nature of which was undetermined, could not be said to have been engaged in interstate commerce. And it was further held that it was of no consequence that his work ordinarily had to do with interstate commerce to a much greater extent than with purely local shipments.

A car inspector while going through the yards in search of material for the repair of an interstate car has been held to have been engaged in interstate commerce. Norfolk, etc. R. Co. v. Short, 171 Ky. 647, 188 S. W. 786.

It has been held that a railroad carpenter who temporarily left his work and went across the tracks for the purpose of buying a newspaper and was injured while so doing was not at that time engaged in interstate commerce. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Archer, 113 Miss. 158, 74 So. 135.

A member of a train crew occupying a caboose while waiting to be called to duty is not engaged in interstate commerce before the call is actually made. Pryor v. Bishop, 234 Fed. 9, 148 C. C. A. 25, wherein it was said: "The deceased could as well have been at a city hotel; his only duty at the time was to be within call, either personal or telephonic. That he was on the company's property at the time of the injury was due, not to an obligation, but to a privilege, a license; in being there, he was acting, not as an employee, but as a licensee. If, however, he could be deemed to be in the employment of the company at the time of the injury, nevertheless he was not then actually employed in interstate commerce. His actual employment at the time was holding himself ready in the city of Chicago to respond to a call for service. That the call, when it came, would be for an interstate trip, does not make the waiting in Chicago an actual engagement in interstate commerce, within the terms of the federal act. Plaintiff's claim that, by the hitching on of the caboose in question to the transfer train, decedent's crew was called, and that his interstate service had thus actually begun, does not commend itself to our judgment. It was not, nor was it intended as such. Clearly the crew had not started with the caboose upon their home run. Neither does it appear from the evidence that the caboose and train were at the place of the injury for the benefit of defendant, or that they were wanted there at the time, or that there was any understanding that they should be at Landers at or near that time, or that they were at the place of the accident with other right than the mere sufferance of defendant, that being the most convenient way for them to get to Landers and secure sleep and other accommodations for the night, or that they were under any expectancy of a call, or that their acts in the premises had any bearing upon interstate commerce, or that the facts of the case brought the decedent within the provisions of the federal employers' liability act. We are unable to discover from the evidence or the law upon what ground plaintiff's decedent's presence at or near Landers at the time of the accident can be said to have been a step in the performance of any actual service to defendant in interstate commerce. He was there in no sense under the direction of defendant growing out of the relation of master and servant. He was his own master. As was said in Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens [233 U. S. 473], supra: "That he [the servant] was expected, upon the completion of that task [moving intrastate cars], to engage in another which would have been a part of interstate commerce, is immaterial under the statute, for by its terms the true test is the nature of the work being done at the time of the injury." To hold that decedent was, at the time of the injury—some four or five hours before he was wanted by defendant—employed in interstate commerce, would practically make the defendant liable to him as engaged in interstate commerce at all times. Such is not the purpose of the act. The statute was enacted only with reference to those railroad employees who, while in the actual discharge of their duties in interstate commerce, are injured."

In Bumstead v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 99 Kan. 589, 162 Pac. 347, the Kansas court extended the doctrine as announced in Pryor v. Bishop, supra, to include a freight conductor who, after actually being called about an hour and a half before the time for his train to leave and who was required to report thirty minutes before that time, was getting his breakfast in the caboose preparatory to reporting. The court, apparently ignoring the fact that the conductor had actually been called, which by inference at least from the case of Pryor v. Bishop was made a determining factor, said: "The plaintiff being required to report for duty thirty minutes before the time his train was to start and his time to begin, it is difficult to see how it can be accurately said that while dressing and getting breakfast and before the beginning of the thirty minutes-time which, according to his testimony, was to mark the beginning of his actual duties, he was performing any duty for the company or engaged in interstate commerce. The time preceding the beginning of his actual duties was his own and for his use in any way he chose. The collision occurred not while he was momentarily or temporarily diverted from the duties of his employment, but before the performance of such duties had begun. It must be held, therefore, that he was not within the terms of the act."

Where an employee engaged in interstate commerce left his engine for the purpose of rescuing a pedestrian who had fallen on the main line track on which an interstate train was approaching, it was held that the nature of his employment was not destroyed by such act. Hardy v. Atlanta, etc. R. Co. (Ga.) 93 S. E. 18. And see Southern R. Co. v. Puckett, reported in full post, this volume, at page 69, wherein it was held that an employee engaged in removing wreckage from a track over which interstate traffic regularly passed was engaged in interstate commerce, and the fact that his primary object at the time was to assist in jacking up a wrecked car so as to rescue a fellow workman caught beneath it, did not alter the character of his work.

EMPLOYEE WORKING ON WATERCRAFT.

The federal employers' liability act extends only to railroads and so an employee injured while unloading a vessel does not come within the act although the vessel is owned by an interstate railroad. Southern Pac. Co. v. Jensen, 244 U. S. 205, Ann. Cas. 1917E 900, 37 S. Ct. 524, reversing 215 N. Y. 514, Ann. Cas. 1916B 276, 109 N. E. 600, L.R.A.1916A 403, wherein it was said: "The first Federal Employers' Liability Act (June 11, 1906, c. 3073, 34 Stat. 232) extended in terms to all common carriers engaged in interstate or foreign commerce, and because it embraced subjects not within the constitutional authority of Congress was declared invalid. Employers' Liability Cases, 207 U. S. 463 [28 S. Ct. 141, 52 U. S. (L. ed.) 297], January 6, 1908. The later act is carefully limited and provides that 'every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several states or territories, or between any of the states and territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the states and territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the states and territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment.' Evidently the purpose was to prescribe a rule applicable where the parties are engaging in something having direct and substantial connection with railroad operations, and not with another kind of carriage recognized as separate and distinct from transportation on land and no mere adjunct thereto. It is unreasonable to suppose that Congress intended to change long-established rules applicable to maritime matters merely because the ocean-going ship concerned happened to be owned and operated by a company also a common carrier by railroad. The word 'boats' in the statute refers to vessels which may be properly regarded as in substance but part of a railroad's extension or equipment as understood and applied in common practice."

OTHER EMPLOYEES.

A station employee injured while going to an interstate train to get the mail for his station has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce so as to come within the federal employers' liability act. Lynch v. Boston, etc. R. Co. (Mass.) 116 N. E. 401, wherein it was said: "The undisputed evidence shows that Lynch, after having lowered the gates at the crossing, passed in front of the engine to reach the opposite or southerly side of the train where he was required to go to receive the mail from the mail car. It is the only reasonable inference that when he was struck by the engine he was going in the performance of his duty to get the mail from the train. The fact that he was killed before he reached the mail car is not decisive. If he was struck while going to the car to perform an interstate duty in the course of his employment under the circumstances he was as much engaged in interstate commerce as if he had received the mail and was killed while in the act of carrying it to the station."

A hostler engaged in fitting out engines for interstate traffic has been held to be engaged in interstate commerce. Hinson v. Atlanta, etc. Air Line R. Co. 172 N. C. 646, 90 S. E. 772.

A workman employed in unloading freight from a train engaged in interstate commerce is entitled to the benefits of the federal employers' liability act. Western Ry. of Alabama v. Mays (Ala.) 72 So. 641.

A clerk directed to call a crew who were to take out an interstate train has been held not to be within the act. Mitchell v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 194 Ill. App. 77, wherein it was said: "The courts have been liberal in the application of the law as to when employees are engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the act in question. The employee must be engaged in work on some of the instrumentalities of interstate commerce. If this is his employment, it makes no difference how important or how unimportant it may be or whether he is at the time actually driving the nail or handling that particular car. . . . However, on the other hand, in so far as we have examined the authorities, the employee must at the time have something to do in furthering interstate commerce either in the repair of the road, cars, engines or trains, or moving trains, engaged in interstate commerce. It has never been held that because some one gave orders or directions to those so engaged that he was himself engaged in interstate commerce because he gave such orders. The connection with interstate commerce must be direct and not indirect or remote.

Appellee had no direct connection with interstate commerce. His duties were local and in no way connected with the interstate commerce. Call the men that were to perform those duties. If this is a part of interstate commerce every employee of a railroad company, no matter who he is, who directs the men so engaged comes within the law. This construction carried into all of these positions would defeat the intention and purpose of such a statute. Appellee was not engaged at the time of the injury in interstate commerce and under his declaration could not recover." It was further held in that case that the mere fact that the injured employee was expected on the completion of that task to engage in another which would have been a part of interstate commerce did not alter the rule.

A janitor in a general office of a railroad who was injured while breaking up coal to put in the furnace has been held not to be engaged in interstate commerce; although the business of the railroad was almost entirely interstate in character. Great Northern R. Co. v. King, 165 Wis. 159, 161 N. W. 371.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY

v.

PUCKETT.

United States Supreme Court—June 11, 1917

244 U. S. 571; 37 S. Ct. 703.

Removal of Causes — Action under Federal Employers' Liability Act.

An action brought under the Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), as amended by the Act of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. L. 291, c. 143, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 335), cannot be removed from a state to a federal court upon the ground of diverse citizenship.

Master and Servant — Federal Employers' Liability Act — Employees within Act — Clearing Wreckage from Track.

An employee of an interstate railway carrier assisting in clearing up a wreck which was blocking the movement of cars in interstate commerce, who, while carrying blocks on his shoulder which were to be used in jacking up a wrecked car and replacing it upon the track, stumbled over some large clinkers which were on the roadway near the track, and in stumbling struck his foot on some old cross ties, overgrown with grass, as a result of which he was seriously injured, is employed in interstate commerce within the meaning of the Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), as amended by the Act of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. L. 291, c. 143, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 335), giving a right of recovery against the carrier for injury to an employee while so employed, although his primary object may have been the rescue of a fellow employee, pinned beneath the car.

Review by Federal Court of State Decision — Negligence — Clinkers on Right of Way.

The Federal Supreme Court will not disturb the concurrent conclusion of two state courts in an action brought under the Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. L. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), as amended by the Act of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. L. 291, c. 143, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 335), that there was sufficient ground for attributing negligence to the railway carrier because of the presence of large clinkers in the path along which an employee was called upon to pass in the course of his duty, and over which he stumbled while carrying some blocks to be used in jacking up a wrecked car.

Error to Georgia Court of Appeals.

Action by H. E. Puckett, plaintiff, against Southern Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff in City Court of Atlanta. Judgment affirmed by Court of Appeals of Georgia. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFIRMED.

Sanders McDaniel, E. R. Black and L. E. Jeffries for plaintiff in error.

Edgar Watkins, Spencer R. Atkinson, and E. W. Born for defendant in error.

[571] PITNEY, J.—Puckett recovered a verdict and judgment in the City Court of Atlanta against the Southern Railway Company [572] for damages arising from personal injuries sustained by him in August, 1911, while at work for the company in its yard at Atlanta, Georgia. As submitted to the jury, the action was founded upon the Federal Employers' Liability Act of April 22, 1908, as amended by the Act of April 5, 1910 (35 Stat. 65, c. 149, Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584; 36 Stat. 291, c. 143, Fed. St. Ann. 1912 Supp. p. 335). The judgment was affirmed by the Georgia Court of Appeals (16 Ga. App. 551), and a writ of error brings it under our review.

The record shows that a petition and bond for the removal of the cause to the appropriate federal court upon the ground of diversity of citizenship was filed in due time by the defendant and overruled by the trial court. An assignment of error based upon this ruling has been abandoned, and properly so, in view of our decision in Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Leslie, 238 U. S. 599, 602, 35 S. Ct. 844, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1478.

Whether, at the time he was injured, plaintiff was employed in interstate commerce, is the only substantial question; there being no dispute that defendant at that time was a common carrier by railroad engaged in commerce of that character.

As detailed in the opinion of the Court of Appeals, the circumstances of the occurrence were as follows: Plaintiff had been engaged in inspecting cars which had been put into an interstate train—No. 75—that ran between Atlanta, Georgia, and Birmingham, Alabama; he had inspected about 25 cars, and there remained to be inspected about 12 cars which were to be placed in the same train; while plaintiff was waiting for these, a collision between other cars of defendant occurred in the yard nearby, and several tracks were blocked by the wreckage; one of defendant's employees named O'Berry was caught in the collision and pinned beneath a car; in obedience to the printed rules of the company, plaintiff went immediately to the scene of the wreck to render what assistance he could, and was there instructed by a superior employee to go and get a "jack" to assist in raising the wrecked car [573] so as to extricate O'Berry and clear the tracks of the wreckage; some of the remaining cars not yet placed in train No. 75 were to have been hauled over the tracks that were obstructed by the wreck, and on account of the obstruction it became necessary to detour them, whereby train No. 75 was delayed for about an hour; while plaintiff, assisting in clearing up the wreck, was carrying some blocks on his shoulder to be used in jacking up the wrecked car and replacing it upon the track, he stumbled over certain large clinkers which were on the roadway near the track, and, in stumbling, struck his foot against some old cross ties overgrown with grass, and in consequence fell and was seriously injured.

The court held that although plaintiff's primary object may have been to rescue his fellow employee, his act nevertheless was the first step in clearing the obstruction from the tracks, to the end that the remaining cars for train No. 75 might be hauled over them; that his work facilitated interstate transportation on the railroad, and that consequently he was engaged in interstate commerce when injured.

We concur in this view. From the facts found, it is plain that the object of clearing the tracks entered inseparably into the purpose of jacking up the car, and gave to the operation the character of interstate commerce. The case is controlled by Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. 229 U. S. 146, 152, Ann. Cas. 1914C 153, 33 S. Ct. 648, 57 U. S. (L. ed.) 1125; New York Cent. R. Co. v. Carr, 238 U. S. 260, 283, 35 S. Ct. 780, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 1298; Pennsylvania Co. v. Donat, 239 U. S. 50, 36 S. Ct. 4, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 139; Louisville, R. Co. v. Parker, 242 U. S. 13, 37 S. Ct. 4; Pedersen v. Delaware, etc. R. Co. supra, holds that a workman employed in maintaining interstate tracks in proper condition while they are in use is employed in interstate commerce; the other cases are to the effect that preparatory movements in aid of interstate transportation are a part of such commerce within the meaning of the act.

[574] Of course, we attribute no significance to the fact that plaintiff had been engaged in inspecting interstate cars before he was called aside by the occurrence of the collision. Illinois Cent. R. Co. v. Behrens, 233 U. S. 473, 478, Ann. Cas. 1914C 163, 34 S. Ct. 646, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 1051; Erie R. Co. v. Welsh, 242 U. S. 303, 306, 37 S. Ct. 116.

It is contended that there was no sufficient ground for attributing negligence to defendant because of the presence of large clinkers in the path along which plaintiff, in the course of his duty, was called upon to pass. This is no more than a question of fact, without exceptional features, and we content ourselves with announcing the conclusion that we see no reason for disturbing the result reached by two state courts. Great Northern R. Co. v. Knapp, 240 U. S. 464, 466, 36 S. Ct. 399, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 745.

Judgment affirmed.

The Chief Justice dissents.

NOTE.

The holding of the reported case is to the effect that an employee engaged in removing wreckage from a track over which interstate traffic regularly passes is engaged in interstate commerce within the meaning of the federal employers' liability act (Fed. St. Ann. 1909 Supp. p. 584), although his primary object at the time is to assist in jacking up a wrecked car in order to rescue a fellow workman caught beneath it. For a general discussion of the employees entitled to the protection of the federal employers' liability act, see the note to Minneapolis, etc. R. Co. v. Winters, reported ante, this volume, at page 54.

MEEHAN ET AL.

v.

INGALLS.

Washington Supreme Court—May 6, 1916.

91 Wash. 86; 157 Pac. 217.

Sales — Seed — Warranty of Germinating Power — Evidence of Breach.

In an action for their price, evidence by defendant that seeds received in January would not grow when planted in good soil about April, with evidence that they were not properly kept after receipt, and that plaintiff had properly tested them before sending, is held not sufficient to support a verdict for counterclaim for breach of warranty of the seeds as capable of germinating.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Yakima county: PREBLE, Judge.

Action by Thomas B. Meehan et al., plaintiffs, against W. D. Ingalls, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Engelhart & Rigg for appellants.

Thomas H. Wilson and Guy O. Shumate for respondent.

[86] MOUNT, J.—This action was brought by the plaintiffs to recover $302.60 from the defendant, being the agreed price of crab apple and pear seed sold to the defendant.

The defendant, for answer to the complaint, admitted that he ordered the seeds at the price alleged, but denied all the other allegations of the complaint; and as an affirmative defense alleged, in substance, that the defendant purchased the seed for planting and growing a nursery; that the plaintiffs knew the purpose for which the defendant purchased the seed; that the defendant planted the seed properly and cultivated the same, but none of the seeds germinated or grew. For a cross-complaint, the defendant alleged that he had been damaged in the sum of $562 by reason of the fact that the seeds did not germinate and grow, and by reason of preparing and cultivating the land upon which the seeds were planted. The reply denied the allegations in the affirmative answer and in the cross-complaint. Upon these issues, the [87] case was tried to the court without a jury, and a judgment was entered in favor of the defendant for the sum of $127.53. The plaintiffs have appealed from that judgment.

The facts are as follows: On October 28, 1912, the appellants wrote a letter to the defendant stating that they had just received certain seeds, and quoting prices thereon. In this letter, it was stated as follows:

"This seed will be of the usual first class germinating quality that we have furnished in the past. There is none better. Prospects of a crop at the present writing are encouraging. Place your order early and have your quantity reserved. Seed will be ready for delivery latter part of January, 1913."

The respondent had dealt with the appellants for some time in seeds. Upon the letter heads of the appellants, was printed this statement:

"Guarantee: While we try to procure the very best seed on the market, we give no guarantee, either express or implied. Samples will always be furnished when applied for. If the seeds are not accepted on these terms, we must be notified at once. If they are kept it will be taken as proof that they are satisfactory."

On December 5, 1912, the defendant ordered the seeds in question from the appellants. The seeds were shipped by express, as directed, and were received by the respondent about the middle of January, 1913. The respondent, upon receiving the seeds, placed them in a creek to soak for about a week. He thereupon took them from the creek and put them in an ice-pack until the latter part of March, or the first of April, when they were planted.

After the appellants had shipped the seeds, which were sold on thirty days' time, they sent a statement of account to the respondent requesting payment. The respondent made no reply to this statement. Thereafter the appellants drew a draft upon the respondent, which the respondent refused to pay, but made no complaint concerning the quality of the seeds. Thereafter this action was brought. Then the appellants [88] were notified for the first time that the seeds did not germinate. Before the appellants sent the shipment of seeds to the respondent, the seeds were given the usual test to determine their character, and this test showed that the seeds were good and would germinate. The only evidence in the record that the seeds were not good and would not germinate is the fact that the seeds were planted in good soil in the usual method and did not grow. There is evidence in the record to the effect that the proper method of treating seeds of this character is to wet them for a short time, and then to keep them on ice until they are planted. The expert who testified to these facts stated that wetting them for two days was the longest time required; and that, if the seeds after being wet are placed upon ice, and the ice pack is permitted to melt, the seeds will heat, and the heat will destroy the germinating quality of the seeds. The defendant's testimony shows that he placed these seeds in a creek and left them there for about a week; that he then placed them in an ice-pack; that the ice melted; and that he was required to and did renew the ice. We think it is apparent from these facts that there were at least two causes for the destruction of the germinating quality of the seeds after they were received by the respondent. If the seeds were left too long in water, they would germinate, and ice would then destroy the germination. And second, if they were properly placed upon the ice, and the ice was permitted to melt, the seeds would heat, and the heat would destroy the germinating quality. Both of these conditions are present in this case.

Assuming, without deciding, that there was an express warranty of the quality of the seeds, the testimony is not disputed that the usual test was applied to the seeds by the appellants to determine the germinating quality of the seeds, and this test showed the seeds to be good. There is no evidence to dispute the good quality of the seeds except that the seeds when planted did not grow. But as we have seen above, the method of handling the seeds by the respondent [89] after he received them is sufficient to show that it was through his own neglect and failure to properly treat the seeds that their germinating power was killed. We are satisfied, therefore, that the mere fact that the seeds did not grow after they received the treatment which it is conceded they received after they were in possession of the respondent, is not sufficient to show that the seeds were not good and capable of germinating at the time the respondent received them. We are satisfied, therefore, that the appellant was entitled to recover the agreed price of the seeds, and that a judgment should have been entered in favor of the appellants.

The judgment of the trial court is reversed, and the cause remanded with direction to enter a judgment in favor of the appellants for the amount claimed.

Introductory.

In a broad sense a sale of seed does not differ from any other sale with respect to the application thereto of the law of warranty. But in the application there arise certain incidents peculiar to a sale of property of that character. Thus the purpose of the purchase is necessarily known to the seller, and the defects likely to exist are of a peculiar character and are ordinarily latent and incapable of discovery by inspection. Also, the fact, known to the seller, that the purpose of the buyer is to raise a crop from the seed, is deemed by most courts to create an exception to the general rule that prospective profits cannot be recovered for a breach of warranty. The closely related question of implied warranty on a sale of nursery stock is discussed in the note to Grisinger v. Hubbard, Ann. Cas. 1913E 87.

Existence and Scope of Warranty.

IN GENERAL.

The courts ordinarily apply to a sale of seeds the rule that where property is purchased for a specific purpose known to the seller there is an implied warranty of fitness for that purpose. Shatto v. Abernethy, 35 Minn. 538, 29 N. W. 325; Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis. 392. And see Gloster Oil Works v. Buckage Cotton Oil Co. 87 Miss. 618, 40 So. 225. There is an implied warranty that seed is of "salable" or "merchantable" quality. Gachet v. Warren, 72 Ala. 292; Frith v. Hollan, 133 Ala. 583, 32 So. 494, 91 Am. St. Rep. 38, 57 L.R.A. 720. As was said in Totten v. Stevenson, 29 S. D. 71, 135 N. W. 715: "While it nowhere appears in the allegations of the counterclaim, or in plaintiff's reply thereto, the purpose for which said corn was bought, still defendant, without objection, testified that plaintiff informed him and that he knew plaintiff purchased the same for seed. Under such evidence, in the absence of an express contract to the contrary, the law implies a warranty of the fitness of the merchandise sold for the purpose for which it was bought." In the leading case of White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, it was said that there is an implied warranty that seed is free from any latent defect arising from the manner of its cultivation, harvesting or storing which renders it unfit for use. See also Prentice v. Fargo, 53 App. Div. 608, 65 N. Y. S. 1114. In Landreth v. Wyck-off, 67 App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. S. 388, the foregoing rule was applied to seed which had degenerated by accidental cross fertilization.

In respect to a warranty of hop roots the court said in Brooks v. McDonnell, 41 Wis. 139: "It seems to us there was no error in leaving it to the jury to find, from all the facts and circumstances, what the parties intended by the words, the roots are 'all right and will grow;' whether this language amounts to a warranty of the quality of the roots, their power or ability to produce hops, or whether the warranty only related to the vitality of the roots and that they would grow. The words are sufficiently broad in their meaning to include quality; and it was for the jury to say, under the circumstances, in what sense they were understood and used by the parties. It is said that the growing quality was all the parties talked about or had in mind, and that whatever was said should be construed as referring to the one thing. But it seems to us the question whether or not the statement or representation made by Donahoe amounted to a warranty, and, if so, what was included in it, was a proper matter for the determination of the jury."

In Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 78 S. W. 143, 63 L.R.A. 647, it was held that where seed of a particular variety is ordered there is no implied warranty of its suitability. So in Gachet v. Warren, 72 Ala. 288, it was said: "The kind of oats suitable for his use, the purchaser selects—he does not rely on the judgment or skill of the seller to select for him. The judgment or skill of the seller is trusted only to providing oats of a designated species. When oats of that species were furnished, not unsalable, unmerchantable, the contract was performed by the sellers. And if there was a warranty, or representation by them, that the oats were of that species, the warranty or representation was not broken. The oats may not have produced as the buyer expected; his expectations were capable of disappointment, though the sellers kept the contract, made no false representations, and no warranty which was broken."

In Ordway v. Olson, 4 Sask. L. Rep. 343, it was held under a statute that no warranty of fitness was implied, the court saying: "Sec. 16 of the Sale of Goods Act provides that there is no implied warranty or condition as to the quality or fitness for any particular purpose of goods supplied under a contract of sale except as follows: '(1) Where the buyer expressly or by implication makes known to the seller the particular purpose for which the goods are required so as to show that the buyer relies on the seller's skill or judgment and the goods are of a description which it is in the course of the seller's business to supply (whether he be the manufacturer or not), there is an implied condition that the goods shall be reasonably fit for such purpose. In the present case the plaintiff Harry Ordway did make known to the defendant the particular purpose for which the flax was required, but there was not a single word said either by himself or by See intimating to the defendant that they relied upon his skill and judgment to provide for them seed suitable for seed. At the time the contract was entered into the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiffs all the flax he could spare out of the quantity then in his granary. As far as the flax on which he had a mortgage, which was the Christianson flax, they could take it if it suited them, after they had seen it. It was delivered to the defendant, and the plaintiffs examined it and said it suited them and that they would take it. There was nothing in the transaction which could be held as indicating that they were relying in the slightest degree upon the skill or judgment of the defendant. I, therefore, hold that the plaintiffs purchased the Christianson flax on their own judgment, and, that being so, the knowledge of the defendant that they were purchasing it to sow on their land does not raise an implied warranty on his part that it was reasonably fit for that purpose."

In Coleman v. Simpson, 162 App. Div. 335, 147 N. Y. S. 865, it was held that an affirmation that certain oats were "seed oats" amounted to an express warranty that they were free from such defects as would prevent them from being regarded in the trade as seed oats.

In Ferry v. Ballinger, 8 Kan. App. 756, 60 Pac. 824, it was held that a warranty that seed is "clean and satisfactory," the contract providing for an examination by the buyer to ascertain that it is "vital and fit for seed purposes," is not a general warranty of satisfaction.

With respect to a statement that seed potatoes were "a new variety" and "enormous bearers," it was said in Fanning v. International Seed Co. 89 Hun 146, 35 N. Y. S. 10: "The allegation in the complaint might be true, but plaintiff would not have been deceived. It is true that proof, upon a trial, that a vendor represented goods to be of a particular kind or quality, may oftentimes enable a jury to see that the transaction was understood by the parties to be a warranty or a contract to deliver goods of a specific kind or quality, and render a verdict accordingly. But a representation is not necessarily, perhaps not usually, a warranty. Caveat emptor is the general rule."

GERMINATING POWER.

By the weight of authority a warranty of germinating power is implied in a sale of seed. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513; Butler v. Moore, 68 Ga. 780, 45 Am. Rep. 508; Shaw v. Smith, 45 Kan. 334, 25 Pac. 886, 11 L.R.A. 681; Johnson v. Sproull, 50 Mo. App. 121; Moore v. Koger, 113 Mo. App. 423, 87 S. W. 602; Prentice v. Fargo, 53 App. Div. 608, 65 N. Y. S. 1114; Reiger v. Worth, 127 N. C. 230, 37 S. E. 217, 80 Am. St. Rep. 798, 50 L.R.A. 362. See the reported case as to the sufficiency of evidence to show a breach of an express warranty of germinating power. As was said in Shaw v. Smith, supra: "The maxim of the common law, caveat emptor, is the general rule applicable to purchases and sales of personal property so far as the quality of the property is concerned; and under such maxim, the buyer, in the absence of fraud, purchases at his own risk, unless the seller gives him an express warranty, or unless, from the circumstances of the sale, a warranty may be implied. In the present case no express warranty was given, and the question then arises, Was there any implied warranty? At the time when the contract for the purchase and sale of the flax seed was entered into, such seed was not present so that it could be inspected by the purchaser, and when it arrived and was delivered to him the defect in the seed was not apparent, and was probably not discoverable by any ordinary means of inspection, and it was not discovered until after it was sowed and when it failed to germinate. When the original contract for the purchase and sale of the flax seed was made, the flax seed was purchased and sold for the particular purpose, known to both the buyer and the seller, of sowing it in a field and of raising a crop from it, and therefore this purpose was a part of the contract and demanded that the seed should be sufficient for such purpose. It in effect constituted a warranty on the part of the seller that the seed should be the kind of seed had in contemplation by both the parties when the contract was made. The purchaser had to rely upon the seller's furnishing to him the kind of seed agreed upon, and the seller in effect agreed that the seed furnished should be the kind of seed agreed upon. The entire contract when made was executory, and it was to be executed and performed afterward, and to be performed in parts and at different times. The seller was first to furnish the seed, and he did so in about ten days after the contract was made, and of course the seed was to be a kind of seed that would grow. The purchaser was afterwards to sow it and to raise a crop. And afterward the purchaser was to sell, and the seller was to buy the crop upon certain terms and conditions expressed in the contract. We think there was an implied warranty on the part of the seller that the seed should be sufficient for the purpose for which it was bought and sold."

But in Moore v. McKinlay, 5 Cal. 471, the court said: "The plaintiff maintains, that the word 'seeds' thus used amounts to an express warranty; that it has an express signification, importing an article which will germinate or grow, and that it would be error to apply this term to any seeds not possessing these properties. And second, that if not an express warranty, the law will imply a warranty; or, in other words, raise the presumption that the article sold is merchantable and fit for the use for which it was sold. At common law, the rule caveat emptor applied to all sales of personal property, except where the vendor gave an express warranty, which is said to be such recommendations or affirmations, at the time of the sale, as are supposed to have induced the purchase. To constitute a warranty, no precise words are necessary; it will be sufficient if the intention clearly appear. During the time of Lord Holt, the doctrine was established, that to warrant, no formal words were necessary, and therefore a warranty might be implied, from the nature and circumstances of the case, and the maxim was thus introduced, that a sound price imports a sound bargain or warranty. This doctrine was afterward exploded by Lord Mansfield, since which time it has undergone some modifications in the English and American courts, tending in the former somewhat, and in some of the states of the Union, to the rule of civil law which implies that the goods sold are merchantable and fit for the purpose for which they were bought. The better opinion, however, I think, as deduced from English and American decisions, is that a warranty will not be implied, except in cases where goods are sold at sea, where the party has no opportunity to examine them, or in case of a sale by sample, or of provisions for domestic use."

In Coleman v. Simpson, 158 App. Div. 461, 143 N. Y. S. 587, a middleman ignorant of the character of the seed which he was selling was held not to warrant its germinating power.

In a case where there was no warranty of germinating quality, failure to germinate has been held to be evidence of a breach of a warranty that seed was fresh. Jacot v. Grossmann Seed, etc. Co. 115 Va. 90, 78 S. E. 646, wherein the court said: "It is plain, however, that the affirmation of the fact that the seed were of the crop of 1910 was made by the plaintiff in error, and it was intended to influence the defendant in error as an affirmation of quality, and was so relied upon. There was no warranty of the germinating properties of the seed sold, but there was evidence that seed of good quality of the crop of 1910 were good, merchantable seed; that it was the well recognized course of business to buy of the crop of 1910 to be seeded in the season of 1911; and that the lapse of a year would not materially affect the quality of the seed. If this be true, then the fact established beyond doubt that the seeds had practically no germinating qualities strongly tended to prove that they were not grown in the season of 1910, and tended to prove a breach of the affirmation or warranty that they were seed of that years growth."

CORRESPONDENCE TO NAME OR VARIETY.

The courts are not altogether agreed as to whether the warranty which results from the furnishing of seed in response to a request for a particular variety is express or implied. In one case it has been said that it is immaterial which it is. Gubner v. Vick, 42 Hun 657, 6 N. Y. St. Rep. 4. The weight of authority is however that in any sale of seed specifically designated by name or variety the seller warrants that it is in fact of the kind or variety indicated. Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560, 83 E. C. L. 560; Lovegrove v. Fisher, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 128; Gachet v. Warren, 72 Ala. 288; Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 88 Pac. 380; Americus Grocery Co. v. Brackett, 110 Ga. 480, 46 S. E. 657; Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410; Phillips v. Vermillion, 91 Ill. App. 133; Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 78 S. W. 143, 63 L.R.A. 647; Shatto v. Abernethy, 35 Minn. 538, 29 N. W. 325; Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710; Grafton-Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 296, 62 So. 273; Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425, 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438; Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753; White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13; Van Wyck v. Allen, 6 Daly 376, affirmed 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; American Warehouse Co. v. Ray (Tex.) 150 S. W. 763; Hoffman v. Dixon, 105 Wis. 315, 81 N. W. 491, 76 Am. St. Rep. 916; Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124.

In White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, it was said: "It is claimed by the defendants that there was no breach of any warranty shown, assuming that a warranty was proved, for the reason that the seed sold were large Bristol cabbage seed. That the seed were Bristol cabbage seed is, as the defendants insist, established by the fact that they grew upon stocks of Bristol cabbage. The referee finds that the seed was raised upon Bristol cabbage stocks, but he further finds that these stocks were planted in the vicinity of stocks of other varieties of cabbage, and were fertilized by the pollen therefrom, and that, in consequence of the crossing of the varieties, the seed grown upon Bristol cabbage stocks became impure, and were not genuine Bristol cabbage seed, but lost that character and quality, and that the plants raised by the plaintiffs from the seed purchased from the defendants, with a very few exceptions, in consequence of such crossing, were of no known variety of cabbage, and were of no value except as food for cattle. The evidence on the part of the plaintiffs shows that they set out 105,000 plants raised from this seed, of which 100,000 lived and grew vigorously, but about 200 only produced Bristol cabbages. That the defendants intended to sell and the plaintiffs to buy seed, which under the proper cultivation, if it grew at all, would produce Bristol cabbages, is evident. The defendants knew that the plaintiffs were market gardeners, and desired this particular variety of seed. Bristol cabbages were regarded as a valuable variety for marketing. The defendants raised the seed, and it was not Bristol cabbage seed, within the meaning of the warranty, whatever its botanical or scientific designation might be, unless it would produce Bristol cabbages. Whether the seed was Bristol cabbage seed within the warranty, depends not upon the origin of the seed, or the stocks upon which it grew, but upon the fact whether Bristol cabbages as known in the market could be raised therefrom. The contention of the defendants that the warranty was not broken, if technically, or in the language of botanists, the seed was Bristol cabbage seed, cannot therefore be sustained."

In Allan v. Lake, 18 Q. B. 560, 83 E. C. L. 560, Lord Coleridge said: "As regards the first parcel, there is no doubt that the statement in the sold note, that the seed was Skirving's Swedes, was made by the defendant part of the contract. Then, is that statement a warranty or a mere representation? I think it is a warranty. If it had been limited to an assertion that the seed was turnip seed, that would without doubt be a warranty of the seed being turnip seed. And, in like manner, when the defendant described the seed as Skirving's, he undertook that it should answer that description."

In Americus Grocery Co. v. Brackett, 119 Ga. 489, 46 S. E. 657, with respect to a contract for the sale of "Texas red rust-proof seed oats" the court said: "Bargain and sale of a chattel of a particular description imports a warranty that the article sold is of that description. Miller v. Moore, 83 Ga. 684, 10 S. E. 360, 20 Am. St. Rep. 329, 6 L.R.A. 374; Civil Code, § 3558. It was for the jury to decide whether 'Texas red rust-proof seed oats' described a specific variety, regardless of where they were raised, as 'Irish' potatoes include those raised outside of Ireland; or whether the trade meaning included those grown in the state of Texas, deriving their special value from the character of the soil and climate."

In Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. S. 390, wherein it appeared that a person ordering alfalfa seed received seed largely mixed with trefoil seed, the court said: "The seed itself was pure, what there was of it; but the trefoil was the predominating crop in the field where the sowing was made. The yellow blossoms extended all over the ten acres, and the several witnesses testified to the greater proportion of the trefoil over the alfalfa. For aught that appears, the alfalfa seed was of the best sort. The trouble is that the plaintiff purchased alfalfa seed and obtained trefoil and dodder in major quantities. The cases cited by the appellant to the effect that there is no implied warranty of quality, only in exceptional cases, do not apply to the facts presented in this record. The plaintiff paid for and supposed he was purchasing a valuable seed of a certain kind, and after the crop partially matured he discovered that he had obtained a worthless kind of seed and a valueless crop had resulted. He did not get what he bought. If the alfalfa seed had been defective, not up to the standard in quality, there would have been no implied warranty. A purchaser innocently buying seed, the kind of which he cannot ascertain by reasonable inspection, may assume in ordinary circumstances that he is getting what he purchased. The plaintiff knew nothing of alfalfa seed. He was not capable of making a discriminating inspection of it. Whatever inspection he made was fruitless. The evidence shows that the trefoil closely resembles the alfalfa seed. They are 'very similar in shape, color and size, . . . remarkably alike . . . in general appearance.' Only an expert can distinguish them, is the effect of the testimony of Mr. Stewart, the botanist of the state agricultural experiment station at Geneva. The authorities sustain the finding of the jury that there was an implied warranty by the defendant, surviving acceptance, that the seed sold the plaintiff was alfalfa seed."

In Molcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496. 20 Am. Rep. 425, wherein it appeared that on an order for "early strap leaf red top turnip seed" seed producing turnips of another and inferior variety was furnished, the court said: "The seller in this case asserted, at the time of the sale, that the seed was of the species which the vendee was in search of. When he made this express assertion, he was aware that the vendee could have no opinion for himself on the subject, for the case states that the seed could not be distinguished by sight or touch. The vendee also knew that the vendor could not be stating the result of his own observation. The facts do not admit of the imperative inference that the assertion of the vendor was mere commendation of his goods, or even that it was the utterance of his view as an expert. If the seller had stated the exact truth, he would have said that he had bought the seed as seed of the specified kind, but that he did not know whether it was so or not. Instead of doing this, he made the positive assertion in question. From such an assertion under the circumstances in evidence, I think the court, although it was not bound so to do, had the right to infer that there was a warranty."

In Hoffman v. Dixon, 105 Wis. 315, 81 N. W. 491, 76 Am. St. Rep. 916, the facts were stated as follows: "Mr. Hoffman asked the clerk if they had rape seed for sale. He replied in the affirmative, whereupon Mr. Hoffman said he would take twenty-five pounds. The clerk thereupon produced a sack of seed and weighed out the desired amount in Hoffman's presence. Neither Hoffman, the clerk, the defendant, nor plaintiff knew rape seed from wild mustard seed, and each was wholly unaware of the ignorance of the others. Hoffman purchased the seed relying upon the fact that it was produced by the clerk, and sold to him as what he called for. The seed was delivered at plaintiff's farm and was there, either by him or by his authority, sowed upon his land. He did not examine the seed, and would not have been wiser if he had, as he was entirely unacquainted with the appearance of rape seed, as before indicated. He used the seed relying upon the fact that it was sold as rape seed. The seed was in fact wild mustard seed. It befouled plaintiff's land to his injury." The court said: "Applying the principle stated to the facts of this case, What was the contract between the parties? Upon what did their minds meet? The answer must be, that the defendant would sell to the plaintiff rape seed and that the seed delivered was of that kind. Opportunity on the part of the plaintiff to inspect does not militate against his right to insist upon the condition of the contract as to the identity of the article delivered being made good, since he relied wholly on his contract, not knowing whether the article he received answered such condition or not, and not being chargeable with negligence because he did not know. In such a case the doctrine of implied warranty does not apply, but the doctrine of express warranty does. No particular form of expression or words is necessary to make an express contract of warranty. The word 'warranty' is not necessary to it. An affirmation of the fact as to the kind or quality of an article offered for sale, of which the vendee is ignorant but upon which he relies in purchasing such article, is as much a binding contract of warranty as a formal agreement using the plainest and most unequivocal language on the subject."

Where the seller of seed disavows any knowledge of its kind or variety, merely repeating what he has been told by his vendor, there is no implied warranty. Kircher v. Conrad, 9 Mont. 191, 23 Pac. 74, 18 Am. St. Rep. 731, 7 L.R.A. 471; Yandell v. Anderson, 163 Ky. 702, 174 S. W. 481. Compare Keeler v. Green, 51 Mont. 42, 149 Pac. 286, wherein it was said that it is the duty of a seller of wheat in filling an order for "spring wheat" to "know that the goods delivered were of that character and quality." In Calhoon v. Brinker, 17 Ohio Dec. 705, it was said: "Does a seedsman who gives a package marked with the name of a variety asked for warrant that from these seeds there will grow, if they grow at all, that variety? It seems to me that the law may be different in the case of a seedsman in a large city selling and delivering seeds from what it is where the seeds are bought from a farmer or a gardener who sells what he has grown. Without evidence on the subject, a court must not be blind to the ordinary facts of life, and the facts about the business of a seedsman in a large city are, that he handles chiefly goods which he gets from others, some of them from foreign countries. The evidence in this case is explicit that defendant did not himself produce these seeds. He said to plaintiff, 'They were raised for me.' In other words, 'I did not produce them, I got them from the producer;' and while it is not of much or any importance in this case, it might in some cases be important to determine whether the seeds were sold by a person in commercial business of selling seeds or by a gardener or a farmer selling that which he himself produced. The rule manifestly must be different. If one go to a farmer and ask him for certain seeds, the natural inference, the one which the producer has a right to draw, is, that the seeds furnished are those which the farmer himself has taken from the squash, and the case would be very different from that of a man who gets his material, perhaps in car load lots, from foreign states and foreign countries. Passing from the character of defendant's business and the manner in which he handles seeds, we come to the subject of the seeds themselves. This is the determining thing in this case. And here we must recognize the facts of vegetable life, even without any evidence. We all know that no human being can take those seeds that were sold and tell what variety of the species they belong to until the fruit is ripened. We know that no one can tell by simple inspection whether the seed is alive or dead, whether or not it will germinate. We know that farmers in the spring time, in order to know whether or not seed will grow, put some of it in water to see whether or not it will germinate or sprout, as they call it. That is the sort of subject-matter that is being dealt with here. It is something of which the life and character is hidden and in mystery. No amount of diligence on the part of any of us would enable us to take these seeds as they were brought into this courtroom yesterday and tell what they would produce. In this case a special variety of squash seed was asked for. We all know that varieties are not permanently fixed qualities; that under different conditions of soil and climate they quickly change if not carefully protected against that. We know, for instance, that if a seed be planted in one lot and in a near-by lot there be a different variety of the same species the insects will fly from one to the other and carry the pollen from one to the other; and while one variety is planted a different variety is produced. Take the ordinary sweet corn that is used for the table and plant it near a field of common yellow corn and the first season the sweet corn will deteriorate by the transmission of the pollen, by insects or by the wind, from the other field. Considering the nature of this man's business, considering the nature of the subject-matter with which he was dealing, it seems clear that if all that had been done were what I have thus far enumerated, this court is of opinion there would be no warranty that the produce would be mammoth golden yellow bush squash."

But in Grafton Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 206, 62 So. 273, the court said: "That the person from whom the seller had himself purchased the seed declined to warrant to him that it was true to name is immaterial, although this fact was known to the last purchaser; his warranty not being in any wise dependent upon the existence vel non of a warranty to the person from whom he himself purchased. At most, such a fact is only a circumstance, to be considered along with other evidence, if such there be, indicating that the last sale was made upon an express or implied agreement that no such warranty should result therefrom."

In Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co. 158 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839, it was said: "To make this rule applicable, the circumstances must be such as to amount to a representation of fact on the part of the vendor that the article is of the particular kind or description. If the buyer in terms asks for the particular kind and the seller purports to comply with his request, he would probably be held to warrant the article as being of that kind, although he may not have made any declaration in words to that effect. In other words, the circumstances may be such as to make the acts of the vendor constitute such a representation. But in this case, as we have seen, there was no demand, in terms, for bearded barley. The demand of the buyers was simply for seed barley and they were given good seed barley of a kind not shown to be in any way different in quality from the common bearded variety theretofore grown in that locality. There is nothing in the evidence heretofore referred to upon which to found the conclusion of a representation or warranty that the barley was of the bearded kind, unless we can hold that the jury was warranted in concluding that there was a custom or usage in Orange county known to defendant or so notorious that one engaged in the grain business must be presumed to know it (2 Page on Contracts, sec. 604), to the effect that where the word 'barley' was used without qualification it meant only bearded barley and did not include beardless barley. An attempt was made to show such a custom or usage, but in addition to the fact that the evidence was directed to the existence of such a custom only at the time of the trial, which was nearly two years after the transactions, such evidence, in our judgment, fell far short of the degree of clearness and certainty essential to show a custom or usage so notorious that defendant must be presumed to have known it, for actual knowledge was not shown, to the effect that the term 'barley' did not include barley exactly like the common bearded variety ordinarily grown in Orange county except that it grew without the long bristles found on such barley."

In a few cases it has been held that on a sale of seed with equal opportunity for inspection by both parties there is no implied warranty of kind or variety. Kingsbury v. Taylor, 29 Me. 508, 50 Am. Dec. 607; Lord v. Grow, 39 Pa. St. 88; Shisler v. Baxter, 109 Pa. St. 443, 58 Am. Rep. 738. In Lord v. Grow, supra, it was said: "To the purchaser of goods on inspection, the language of the law is 'caveat emptor.' There may be a few exceptions, such as we have referred to, but a sale of such an article as wheat is not one of them. When the purchaser has seen it, and gets what he saw, no warranty is implied that it is properly described by the name which the vendor gives to it."

To create an implied warranty that seed is true to name it is not necessary that the vendor should state in so many words that the seed is of that particular name. Thus a representation that seed barley is well threshed and the beards broken off amounts to an implied warranty that the seed is of the bearded kind. Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co. 158 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839. It has been held that a sale of "Arlington White spine cucumber seed" is a guaranty that the seed will grow that particular kind of cucumber. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410.

Where a vendor represented seed to be "Wycklin's early flat Dutch cabbage seed" and the seed so resembled that kind, but proved to be totally unproductive, it was held that the representation by the seller amounted to a warranty that the seed was true to name. Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136.

It has been held that a sale of onion sets by description raises an implied warranty that the onion sets will not only answer the description, but that they are salable or merchantable. Frith v. Hollan, 133 Ala. 583, 32 So. 494, 91 Am. St. Rep. 54.

Where a vendor agrees to sell and deliver "rust proof oats" he impliedly warrants the oats to be of that kind and variety and it is immaterial that a sample of the oats is exhibited to the buyer for inspection if the oats delivered are of inferior quality. Godden Seed Co. v. Smith, 185 Ala. 296, 64 So. 100.

A representation made by the seller through a catalogue that a certain seed is "Comstock Spanish tobacco seed" is a warranty that the seed is true to name. Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124.

The fact that the buyer inspects the seed before purchasing is immaterial, when its character cannot be ascertained by any reasonable inspection. Grafton-Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 296, 62 So. 273.

A contract to sell half a ton of yellow mangel wurzel seed at a fixed price per pound, the same to be grown by the seller and to be of good growing stock, has been held to contain no implied warranty that the seed produced should be itself good, but merely that seed of a good growing stock should be sown and that everything should be done that was reasonably required in the growing of seed. Pinder v. Button, 7 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 269, 11 W. R. 25.

In Natchez Drug Co. v. Ratekin Seed House, 165 Ia. 641, 146 N. W. 865, it was held that to recover under an implied warranty that seed was fit for the purpose for which it was sold there should be substantive evidence that it was not, in fact, fit for the purpose for which it was sold; that a mere complaint that it was unfit did not establish its unfitness.

In order to create an implied warranty from the description of seed the circumstances must be such as to amount to a representation of fact on the part of the seller that the seed is of that particular variety as described. Thus, in Rauth v. Southwest Warehouse Co. 158 Cal. 54, 109 Pac. 839, it appeared that the defendant showed the plaintiff a sample of barley and represented it to be clean seed barley such as was usually sown and raised in Orange county. The facts were held to be insufficient to show that the defendant represented the barley to be of the variety known as bearded barley.

An action for a breach of warranty has been held to be maintainable by seed merchants against seed brokers for warranting turnip seed to be rape seed, although it was sold by sample, where the two kinds of seed were so much alike that persons even in the business of seed selling might easily be deceived. Lovegrove v. Fisher, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 128.

In Wallis v. Pratt [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 394, it appeared that the plaintiff bought seed of the defendant which was described as "common English sainfoin" with a condition however that "the seller gave no warranty express or implied as to growth, description or any other matters." The seed delivered to the plaintiff was not "common English sainfoin, but "giant sainfoin," a different and inferior seed. The plaintiff accepted the seed in the belief that it was as represented and resold it to other persons to whom he was obliged to pay damages for the mistake. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to damages for a breach of warranty the condition in the contract notwithstanding.

In Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 78 S. W. 143, 63 L.R.A. 647, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1472, an action for breach of warranty, it was held that where the plaintiff relied on his own judgment and experience in ordering of the defendants who were dealers in seed a specific article known as "western German millet seed," the question whether the seed sold to him was of that variety was for the jury.

It has been held that whether a representation descriptive of a particular kind of seed sold by a name which is known in the market, is an expression of judgment or opinion only, or is intended as a warranty, is a question of fact to be determined by all the circumstances of the case. Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262, 20 Am. Rep. 438.

In an action for a breach of warranty that lily bulbs sold to the plaintiff by the defendant were not true to the name, it has been held to be a question for the jury whether the seller warranted that the bulbs were of a certain kind. Edgar v. Joseph Breck, etc. Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083.

In Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710, it appeared that the plaintiff bought of the defendant "orange cane seed." The crop that grew therefrom consisted of broom and other kinds of cane. The plaintiff testified that he could not tell from an inspection of the seed, what kind they were, whether "orange cane seed" or a mixture of various kinds of cane seed with seed of broom corn. It was held that an instruction to the jury that if the buyer disclosed to the seller his intention to purchase an article for special use the seller impliedly warranted the article to be suitable for the purpose of its intended use, was proper.

In Gubner v. Vick, 42 Hun 657, 6 N. Y. St. Rep. 4, it appeared that the plaintiffs ordered seed from the defendant's catalogue which described it as "excelsior large flat Dutch" with an assurance to purchasers that they would get good seed. The seed turned out to be mixed and a large portion of it failed to head and a portion of it failed to head properly. It was held that the law would assume on a contract for a particular quality of seed that it would produce the vegetable named.

FREEDOM FROM NOXIOUS SEED.

There is an implied warranty that seed is free from noxious admixture. Moore v. Koger, 113 Mo. App. 423, 87 S. W. 602; Bell v. Mills, 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. S. 34.

In Shatto v. Abernethy, 35 Minn. 538, 29 N. W. 325, it was said: "The jury might conclude that the warranty or undertaking of the defendants did not extend beyond the fact that the grain was 'genuine Saskatchewan fife wheat;' but, in view of the admission in the answer, it may be assumed further that it was furnished for the express purpose of being used for the production of a crop for seed, and hence, that, by implication, if not expressly, the defendants warranted it reasonably fit for that purpose. Considering the undertaking of the defendants to be such as is thus indicated, the conclusion implied from the verdict, that there was no breach of the warranty, is fairly sustained by the evidence. Except for the presence of other seeds, it was what was known as Saskatchewan fife wheat. The evidence of the plaintiff went to show that a large part of the bulk, estimated as high as 40 per cent, was composed of other kinds of wheat, and of other seeds, with some smut. The evidence on the part of the defendants, from several witnesses, shown to have been apparently capable of testifying to the fact, tended to prove that it was without smut, and with very little admixture of other seeds or of other wheat. As to the amount of impurities in this seed, and whether for that reason it was unfit for the purpose contemplated, or failed to fulfil the requirements of the contract, the case was properly submitted to the jury."

As to the duty of the buyer to examine it was said in Fox v. Everson, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 355: "Whilst the representations made by a vendor respecting the property sold may relieve the purchaser from the use of that care, caution and observation that he would ordinarily be bound to exercise in the purchase of property, still it will not do to permit the vendee, having the property before him and defects plainly visible, to shut his eyes and rely solely upon the representations. In the case under consideration at the time of making the purchase the plaintiff did not have an opportunity to see and examine the seed. His eyesight was defective: his glasses were left at home and without their aid he was unable to see. He was, therefore, at the time excused from making the examination and had a right to rely upon the representations of the vendor. This excuse, however, did not exist after he had taken the seed home where he had the opportunity of inspecting it before spreading it over his farm. It is possible that on making such an inspection he would not have discovered the presence of plantain seed. If, however, it was plainly visible and easily distinguished from the clover seed, it is probable he would have discovered it."

Disclaimer of Warranty.

It is of course legitimate for the parties to a sale of seeds to agree that there shall be no warranty and a disclaimer of warranty by the seller assented to by the buyer prevents the implication of any warranty. Coates v. Harvey, 2 N. Y. S. 5, 17 N. Y. St. Rep. 389; Jacot v. Grossman Seed, etc. Co. 115 Va. 90, 78 S. E. 646; Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co. 147 Wis. 166, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1077, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 79. So a purchase of seeds is presumed to be made by the buyer with a knowledge of a general custom of the trade that no warranty is given by seedsmen. Blizzard v. Growers' Canning Co. 152 Ia. 257, 132 N. W. 66.

In Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co. 147 Wis. 166, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1077, 132 N. W. 902, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 79, it was said: "The contract for the sale of the peas contained the following provisions: 'It is also understood and agreed that the party of the first part [plaintiff] does not give, and its agents and employees are forbidden to give, any warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds delivered or to be delivered by it, and that it is not and will not be in any way responsible for the crops.' Counsel for the appellant admit 'that plaintiff is freed by the terms of this contract from all liability as to the seed in question being good or bad, large or small, wrinkled or smooth, black or white, wormy or sound, vital or dead.'

But counsel argue that the peas furnished under the contract must be the 'advancer' variety, and that plaintiff was not relieved by its contract from liability for damage resulting from furnishing peas other than 'advancer' peas. It was practically conceded on the argument that the clause quoted was intended to exempt the plaintiff from such liability as was sought to be enforced against it under the counterclaim in this action. The concession was advisedly made. The peas to be delivered under the contract were described therein as 'advancer' peas. But the contract provided that no warranty, express or implied, was given that the peas furnished should be of the description named therein. If a dealer in seed peas can exempt itself from liability for selling bad, wormy, or dead peas to a grower, no good reason is apparent why it cannot go further and say that it will not be responsible in the event of an intermixture of other peas with the variety agreed to be furnished. Neither of the parties here is under guardianship or incompetent to contract. There is no claim that the contract signed was not the one agreed upon or that both parties did not fully understand what they were agreeing to. Plaintiff plainly undertook to relieve itself from liability in case of intermixture, and defendant agreed that it should be relieved. It is not claimed that the contract is void because contrary to public law or to public policy, and, if not, effect should be given to it. The vendee might reject and refuse to receive the peas if they were not 'advancer' peas, or it might well be that, in the event of the shipment being made in bad faith and with the purpose and intention of committing fraud upon the vendee, an action for damages for the fraud would lie, but we have no such case before us. If it be conceded that the contract is one-sided, it must also be conceded that the parties had a right to make a one-sided contract if they saw fit."

But in Wallis v. Pratt [1911] A. C. (Eng.) 394, Lord Loreburn said: "It is agreed that this was a sale, both parties to which intended that common English sainfoin was to be delivered. It is agreed that it was a condition of the contract that that stuff should be delivered, but it is said that the defendants were absolved from the liability arising from the fact that something different from common English sainfoin was delivered, by virtue of a particular clause in the contract. The clause, so far as relevant, is to this effect: 'Sellers give no warranty expressed or implied as to growth, description or any other matters.' Now this sainfoin which was delivered turned out to be a different kind of goods; and when that was found out an action was brought against the defendants as sellers, to which they pleaded the clause I have read."

A general disclaimer of warranty does not have the effect of abrogating an express warranty. Edgar v. Joseph Breck, etc. Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083, wherein it was said: "The general printed warning on the bill-head that the defendant did not warrant seeds could have no effect unless it led to the inference that the old contract had been rescinded and a new one substituted by mutual agreement. Even if the bill had been receipted it would not have excluded proof of the warranty." In Godden Seed Co. v. Smith, 185 Ala. 296, 64 So. 100, it was said: "This printed matter, which concerned the terms on which defendant sold its seeds, was circumstantial and evidential only. It was a matter of inference whether the plaintiff had in mind the matter of these billheads when he entered into the agreement for the purchase of the oats. On the whole, the jury might have inferred that he did not." So in Coates v. Harvey, 2 N. Y. S. 5, 17 N. Y. St. Rep. 389, it was held that a general custom is of no effect as against an express warranty.

To render a disclaimer of warranty of any effect it must be brought to the notice of the buyer. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410. Thus in Landreth v. Wyckoff, 67 App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. S. 388, it was said: "To rebut any implication of warranty, the plaintiffs rely largely upon a notice printed in small type at the upper left-hand corner of the bill which they rendered to the defendant, which notice is in these words: 'D. Landreth & Sons give no warranty, express or implied, as to the description, quality, and productiveness, or any other matter, of any seeds they send out, and they will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned.' The defendant testified that, although he received the bill before planting the seeds, he did not then observe this disclaimer, and, indeed, had never seen it until it was brought to his attention upon the trial. Whatever might have been its legal effect if he had become cognizant of its existence and purport before using the seeds, it cannot be deemed to have entered into or altered the contract between him and the seed growers under the circumstances."

So in Bell v. Mills, 78 App. Div. 42, 80 N. Y. S. 34, it appeared that in a sack of seed oats there was inclosed a card containing a disclaimer of a warranty. The buyer testified that he did not see or read it until after the seed was sowed. The court said: "It is said, however, as to the fine print upon the cards found in the oats, that it was there, and the plaintiff was bound to read it and to know what it was. The claim made by the plaintiff is that he did not know or understand that this fine print upon the bottom of the card was designed to be a contract, binding upon the parties, containing the terms and conditions upon which the oats were to be accepted by him and sowed. If the fine print matter was to be regarded as such a contract, it must have been assented to by the plaintiff; otherwise, the minds of the parties did not meet, and under all the circumstances it could hardly be held as a matter of law that he was bound to know or understand that it was intended as such a contract, and to read or know its contents. It was very likely a question for the jury whether, coming to him as it did, he was bound to read it and know its contents, and that receiving it and accepting the oats without objection amounted to an assent to the terms thereof as a contract under which the oats were accepted and sowed."

In American Warehouse Co. v. Ray (Tex.) 150 S. W. 783, it was said: "The testimony of Gerlach and Robinson as to the custom and usage in regard to implied warranty of seed sold was properly excluded. The law implied a warranty from the representation of appellant that the seed were of a certain kind, and that implication could not be set aside by testimony of a custom and usage of trade, which was not known to buyers. It would present a singular proposition of law if a dealer in seeds should contract to deliver cabbage seed and should actually deliver radish or turnip seed, and then escape liability on his implied warranty by proof that dealers in seed had adopted a rule or custom not to be bound by any implied warranty. Such a custom would be in contravention of law and justice, and would be null and void. Dwyer v. Gulf, etc. R. Co. 69 Tex. 710, 7 S. W. 504. No effort was made to show that appellee had any knowledge of such custom, or contracted with it in view."

In Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124, the court said: "There is no doubt that the vendor may sell without warranty. Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co. 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902. Were the goods so sold to Morton? He had the defendant's catalogue before him when he placed the order and ordered from it. He so testifies. The defendant knew that he ordered from the catalogue, because one of the two items called for was ordered by the catalogue number. Between the cover and the first page of the catalogue was a blank order sheet for customers to detach and use in ordering seeds. Immediately above the blank spaces in which the order was to be written was a printed statement to the effect that defendant gave 'no warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter of any seeds . . . they send out, and will not be in any way responsible for the crop.' On the first page of the catalogue proper there was printed in large type the words 'General suggestions to customers.' There were a dozen such suggestions made, the first word or words in each instance, indicating the nature of the suggestion, being printed in large, heavy type. One of these headings consisted of the word 'Disclaimer' so printed, and immediately following it was a statement substantially like the one quoted above. The two packages ordered from the defendant were wrapped in one bundle and shipped by express. One side of the shipping tag contained the name and address of the consignee. On the reverse side there was printed in red ink and in conspicuous type the following words, which were underscored as indicated: 'Northrup, King & Co. do not give, and their agents are forbidden to give, any warranty, express or implied, as to description, quality, productiveness, or any other matter of any seeds, bulbs or plants they send out, and will not be in any way responsible for the crop. If the purchaser does not accept the goods on these terms, they are at once to be returned and money paid for same will be promptly refunded.' The goods were shipped on April 8th and were followed by an invoice two days later. There was printed near the head of the invoice a statement like that contained in the catalogue to the effect that the goods were sold without warranty. In reference to this invoice the respondent claims that it was not received until after the seed had actually been delivered to the plaintiff. There is some testimony given by Morton to the effect that the invoice was not received until the day after the seed was delivered and some testimony which would indicate that the seed had not been delivered when the invoice came. We accept the statement that there had been an actual delivery before receipt of the invoice. But what of it? It is not claimed that any use had been made of the seed in the meantime. The relation of principal and agent existed between the plaintiff and Morton. The latter could communicate with the former by telephone; at least he testified that he telephoned plaintiff when the seed arrived. The invoice was retained without objection; so was the seed, and the seed was thereafter paid for in the usual course of business. Morton testified that he did not read or pay any attention to any of these nonwarranty provisions. If Morton had observed the conditions printed on the invoice it would certainly have been his duty to inform his principal of them. The defendant having the right to sell without warranty, it seems clear that it did all that could in reason be required of it to advise the purchaser of the condition upon which the seed was sold. Of course it is easy to imagine other things which it might have done which would be better calculated to give notice, but if those things had been done and had proved inefficacious, still other things might be suggested which would surely acquaint Morton with the conditions of sale. The business was transacted by mail. Where the book from which the order was given, the shipping tag, and the invoice, all stated these conditions, it would seem to be unreasonable to hold that any blame attached to the defendant if Morton failed to observe all of these things. The evidence is quite convincing to show that there was a disclaimer of warranty printed on the bag containing the tobacco seed also but there was a sufficient conflict in the evidence on this point to make the question one for the jury, and it found that there was none."

But in Seattle Seed Co. v. Fujimori, 79 Wash. 123, 139 Pac. 866, it was said: "There is, also, in this record, evidence that a general custom prevails in the seed trade of making all sales subject to the conditions named on the printed slips. This coupled with the evidence that the printed slips were placed in each bag of seed, is sufficient to support the finding that the sale was made without warranty or condition, and warranty or condition that the seed was true to name could not be inferred. Blizzard v. Growers' Canning Co. 152 Ia. 257, 132 N. W. 66; Leonard Seed Co. v. Crary Canning Co. 147 Wis. 166, 132 N. W. 902, Ann. Cas. 1912D 1077, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 79. In each of these cases, as in the one before us, there was no evidence that the purchaser read the printed matter denying any express or implied warranty similar to the language on the printed slips in this case, but the court in each instance held the purchaser was bound."

Remedies of Buyer on Breach.

In an action for the balance of the purchase price of onion sets it has been held that the buyer on discovering the bad condition of the sets had the right to rescind the sale within a reasonable time, or to return them and avail himself of the damages he had suffered, either by bringing his cross action for the breach of warranty or by proving their real value in abatement of a recovery of the price. Frith v. Hollan, 133 Ala. 583, 32 So. 494, 91 Am. St. Rep. 54.

A statement in a contract for the sale of seed, if intended to be part of the contract, is a condition, on the failure of which the purchaser may repudiate the contract; or if a rescission has become impossible it may be treated as a warranty, for a breach of which an action for damages will lie. Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438. Where a buyer agrees to pay for seed immediately on the receipt thereof and on ascertaining that it is vital and fit for seed purposes, he cannot arbitrarily reject the seed, if it is clean and vital, merely because the contract provides that the seed shall be satisfactory to the buyer. Ferry v. Ballinger, 8 Kan. App. 756, 60 Pac. 824.

If the quality of the seed purchased is not as required by the contract of sale the buyer may refuse to receive the seed. Gloster Oil Works v. Buckeye Cotton Oil Co. 87 Miss. 618, 40 So. 225.

Where a purchaser of seed corn who has paid for the seed in advance seeks to rescind the contract because of the breach of an express warranty as to the quality of the seed, he must, before he can recover back the purchase price, prove a breach of the warranty. Totten v. Stevenson, 29 S. D. 71, 135 N. W. 715.

Damages for Breach.

FAILURE OF CROP.

It is held generally that where there is a breach of warranty in the sale of seed the measure of damages is the difference between the value of the crop raised and the value of the crop which would have been raised on the same land if the seed had been of the kind represented. Wagstaff v. Shorthorn Dairy Co. 1 Cab. & El. (Eng.) 324; Page v. Pavey, 8 C. & P. 769, 34 E. C. L. 628; Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84, 96 E. C. L. 84; McMullen v. Free, 13 Ont. 57; Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 592; Grafton-Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 296, 62 So. 273; Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439; Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Farmers' Exch.* 136 Tenn. 287, 189 S. W. 368, L.R.A.1917B 1106; Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. 64 Wash. 159, 116 Pac. 666, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 89. See also Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 592; Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136; Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. 64 Wash. 159, 116 Pac. 666, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 89; Stewart v. Sculthorp, 25 Ont. 544. Compare Hurley v. Buchi, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 346; Buckbee v. P. Hohenadel Jr. Co. reported in full post, this volume, at page 88; Van Wyck v. Allen, 6 Daly (N. Y.) 376.

The court in Wolcott v. Mount, 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438, stated the reason for the rule as follows: "The cardinal principle in relation to the damages to be compensated for on the breach of a contract that the plaintiff must establish the quantum of his loss, by evidence from which the jury will be able to estimate the extent of his injury, will exclude all such elements of injury as are incapable of being ascertained by the usual rules of evidence to a reasonable degree of certainty. For instance, profits expected to be made from a whaling voyage, the gains from which depend in a great measure upon chance, are too purely conjectural to be capable of entering into compensation for the nonperformance of a contract, by reason of which the venture was defeated. For a similar reason, the loss of the value of a crop for which the seed had not been sown, the yield from which if planted would depend upon the contingencies of weather and season, would be excluded as incapable of estimation, with that degree of certainty which the law exacts in the proof of damages. But if the vessel is under charter, or engaged in a trade, the earnings of which can be ascertained by reference to the usual schedule of freights in the market, or if a crop has been sowed on the ground prepared for cultivation, and the plaintiff's complaint is, that because of the inferior quality of the seed, a crop of less value is produced, by these circumstances the means would be furnished to enable the jury to make a proper estimation of the injury resulting from the loss of profits of this character. In this case the defendants had express notice of the intended use of the seed. Indeed, the fact of the sale of seeds by a dealer, keeping them for sale for gardening purposes, to a purchaser engaged in that business, would of itself imply knowledge of the use which was intended, sufficient to amount to notice. The ground was prepared and sowed, and a crop produced. The uncertainty of the quantity of the crop, dependent upon the condition of weather and season, was removed by the yield of the ground under the precise circumstances to which the seed ordered would have been exposed. The difference between the market value of the crop raised, and the same crop from the seed ordered, would be the correct criterion of the extent of the loss. Compensation on that basis may be recovered in damages for the injury sustained as the natural consequence of the breach of the contract. Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84 [96 E. C. L. 84]; Lovegrove v. Fisher, 2 F. & F. (Eng.) 128."

In Schutt v. Baker, 9 Hun (N. Y.) 556, it appeared that the defendant sold to the plaintiff a quantity of hop roots with the knowledge that the plaintiff was purchasing them for cultivation, warranting them to be female or production roots. A large number of them proved to be male or unproductive roots. On the question of the measure of damages the court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover all the damages sustained by him including the difference between the value of the crop actually raised and that of the crop that would have been raised had all the roots been female or productive ones.

The general rule has been held to apply to a case where the seed was to be furnished by the lessor of farming land who agreed that if the seed should prove defective he would assume the whole risk of a failure of the crop. Flick v. Wetherbee, 20 Wis. 392.

Speculative damages in an action for a breach of a warranty in a sale of seed have been held not to be recoverable where the plaintiff purchased potatoes from the defendant which were represented as "early rose" when in fact they were a later and different kind. Hurley v. Buchi, 10 Lea (Tenn.) 346.

In Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753, the measure of damages was held to be the value of a crop of the seed as represented such as would ordinarily have grown that year, minus the expense of raising the crop as well as the value of the crop actually raised therefrom. See to the same effect Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 88 N. W. 693, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474.

But it has been held in an action to recover damages for a breach of warranty in a sale of seed, that in measuring the damages the cost of producing the crop would not be deducted from the value of the crop raised. Van Wyck v. Allen, 69 N. Y. 61, 25 Am. Rep. 136, distinguishing Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753.

If the purchaser of the seed discovers that it is of a quality inferior to that warranted he may recover as damages the difference between the purchase price of the seed as warranted and the market price of the seed which he actually receives. Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 88 N. W. 693, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474.

In a case wherein it appeared that seed received by the purchaser produced a crop of cucumbers of inferior quality, and of less value than would have been produced had the warranty been complied with, it was held that the measure of damages was the difference between the market value of the crop raised and the crop that would have been raised had the seed been as ordered; and hence that a claim by the purchaser for the value of the seed, the expense of planting, and the rental value of the land was practically less than he was entitled to recover. Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410.

In a few jurisdictions however the courts refuse to allow the value of the expected crop to be taken into consideration and hold that the damages recoverable include only the cost of the seed, the expense of planting and cultivation, and the rental value of the land.

Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513; Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410; Shaw v. Smith, 45 Kan. 334, 25 Pac. 886, 11 L.R.A. 681; Reiger v. Worth, 127 N. C. 230, 37 S. E. 217, 80 Am. St. Rep. 798, 52 L.R.A. 362; Totten v. Stevenson, 29 S. D. 71, 135 N. W. 715; American Warehouse Co. v. Ray (Tex.) 150 S. W. 763.

The court in Vaughan's Seed Store v. Stringfellow, 56 Fla. 708, 48 So. 410, stated the rule thus: "Where the seeds bought prove to be worthless, however, that is where they wholly fail to germinate or grow after having been planted, and no crop results from the wrong seeds, the evidence of the probable produce of the right seeds in the land and the year in question would be lacking; and the rule that the plaintiff must establish the quantum of his loss, by evidence from which the jury will be able to estimate the extent of his injury, will exclude all such elements of injury as are incapable of being ascertained by the usual rules of evidence to a reasonable degree of certainty. In such a case, therefore, the only damages recoverable are the price paid for the seed, the expenses in preparing the soil for the seed and for planting the same, together with the loss sustained from having his land lie idle for the year, or for such time as the use of it was lost."

In Butler v. Moore, 68 Ga. 780, 45 Am. Rep. 508, it appeared that the plaintiff purchased of the defendant a certain German millet seed. The defendant warranted that the seed was good and that it would germinate and grow, but the seed wholly failed to do so. In an action for the damage sustained by the breach of warranty, the court held that the loss of prospective profits on the land planted with the seed could not form a part of the damages; but that the plaintiff might recover for the purchase money of the seed with interest and expenses, such as the cost of hauling of the seed and other necessary expenses incurred after the contract was entered into. The court said: "We are well aware that a different rule, as to the measure of recovery, prevails in many of the other states of the Union, as was so ably and earnestly pressed upon this court by the counsel for plaintiff in error. It was insisted that the great public policy that should control an agricultural state should not lag behind her sister states, who have recognized a more liberal rule in favor of those engaged in cultivating the soil; and that such is the policy of many of the states is made manifest in the authorities produced and relied upon by counsel for plaintiff in error. 71 N. Y. 118 (27 Am. Dec. 19); 36 N. J. 262; 34 N. Y. 634; 13 How. 344; 19 Johns. 331; 35 Barb. 17; 8 Taunt. 535; 34 E. C. L. 628. It is insisted the states announcing the rule contended for are each commercial states, with the national bias of the courts in favor of the salesman as against the farmer, and so much stronger the necessity and reason for the same to be recognized by an agricultural state like our own. This is an argument that might be well addressed to the lawmaking power, and not to this court, in view of the unbroken line of decisions made on this question."

In an action for breach of warranty on the sale of seed, an allowance by a referee of interest on the damages from the time the crop would have been harvested and sold has been held to be erroneous since the demand was unliquidated, and the amount could not be determined by computation simply or by a reference to the market values. White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13.

It has been held, however, that in an action for a breach of warranty on a sale of onion seed which failed to germinate, the plaintiff was entitled to recover as damages the amount paid for the seed, the value of his labor in preparing the ground for the seed, and interest on the several amounts. Ferris v. Comstock, 33 Conn. 513.

Commenting on the rule governing the measure of damages in an action for a breach of warranty of the fitness of seed for planting, the court in Butler v. Moore, 68 Ga. 780, 45 Am. Rep. 508, said: "It is merely a suit on the warranty of the merchantable quality of the goods, which the law imposes, or on the express warranty of the fitness of the seed for planting, as alleged by the plaintiff, and in such a suit we are constrained to hold, in conformity with the repeated rulings of this court, as referred to, that if the seed were worthless, the measure of damages would be the purchase money with interest and any expenses incurred in complying with the contract after the same was entered into, such as the hauling of the seed, preparing the lands for planting, sowing and rolling said seed, and such other necessary expense incurred after the entering into said contract."

SEED NOT TRUE TO NAME.

Where seed is not of the kind or variety which the seller warranted it to be the buyer is entitled to recover the difference between the crop actually raised and that which would have been produced by seed of the variety ordered. Moody v. Peirano (Cal.) 84 Pac. 783; Americus Grocery Co. v. Brackett, 119 Ga. 489, 46 S. E. 657; Edgar v. Joseph Breck, etc. Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083; Grafton-Stamps Drug Co. v. Williams, 105 Miss. 296, 62 So. 273; Cline v. Mock, 150 Mo. App. 431, 131 S. W. 710; Dunn v. Bushnell, 63 Neb. 568, 88 N. W. 693, 93 Am. St. Rep. 474; Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425, affirming 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438; White v. Miller, 78 N. Y. 393, 34 Am. Rep. 544; Landreth v. Wyckoff, 67 App. Div. 145, 73 N. Y. S. 388; Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. S. 390; Ford v. Farmers' Exchange, 136 Tenn. 287, 189 S. W. 368, L.R.A.1917B 1106; American Warehouse Co. v. Ray (Tex.) 150 S. W. 763; Fuhrman v. Interior Warehouse Co. 64 Wash. 159, 116 Pac. 666, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 89; Buckbee v. P. Hohenadel, Jr. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 88.

In Randall v. Raper, El. Bl. & El. 84, 96 E. C. L. 84, Earl, J., said: "The question is, what amount of damages is to be given for the breach of this warranty. The warranty is, that the barley sold should be chevalier barley. The natural consequence of the breach of such a warranty is that, the barley which has been delivered having been sown and not being chevalier barley, an inferior crop has been produced. This damage naturally results from the breach of the warranty: and the ordinary measure of it would be the difference in value between the inferior crop produced and that which would have been produced from chevalier barley: that is not inconsistent with Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 341."

In Wolcott v. Mount, 38 N. J. L. 496, 20 Am. Rep. 425, affirming 36 N. J. L. 262, 13 Am. Rep. 438, in answer to the contention that the measure of damages as stated included an allowance for speculative or conjectural profits, the court said: "The seller in this case asserted, at the time of the sale, that the seed was of the species which the vendee was in search of. When he made this express assertion, he was aware that the vendee could have no opinion for himself on the subject, for the case states that the seed could not be distinguished by sight or touch. The vendee also knew that the vendor could not be stating the result of his own observation. The facts do not admit of the imperative inference that the assertion of the vendor was mere commendation of his goods, or even that it was the utterance of his view as an expert. If the seller had stated the exact truth, he would have said that he had bought the seed as seed of the specified kind, but that he did not know whether it was so or not. Instead of doing this, he made the positive assertion in question. From such an assertion, under the circumstances in evidence, I think the court, although it was not bound so to do, had the right to infer that there was a warranty."

In Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 90 Am. Dec. 753, the court said: "In the present case it cannot be doubted, that the damages which this plaintiff has sustained are such as arise naturally from the breach of the defendant's warranty. His engagement was, that the seed he sold was Bristol cabbage seed, and would produce Bristol cabbages. It may, therefore, have been reasonably supposed to have been in the contemplation of the parties, that if the seed was not Bristol cabbage seed, and would not consequently produce Bristol cabbages, that damage would necessarily accrue to the plaintiff, and would be a natural consequence of such breach."

In White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, it was said: "The character of the season, whether favorable or unfavorable for production; the manner in which the plants set were cultivated; the condition of the ground; the results observed in the same vicinity where cabbages were planted, under similar circumstances; the market value of Bristol cabbages when the crop matured; the value of the crop raised from the defective seed; these, and other circumstances, may be shown to aid the jury, and from which they can ascertain approximately the extent of the damages resulting from the loss of a crop of a particular kind."

NOXIOUS SEED.

Where by the admixture of noxious seed injury results to the soil the buyer is entitled to recover therefor in addition to the loss of his crop. Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. S. 390; McMullen v. Free, 13 Ont. 57; Carlstadt Development Co. v. Alberta Pac. Elevator Co. 4 Alberta L. Rep. 366. In McMullen v. Free, supra, it was said: "In the present case it is competent for the plaintiff to prove that the natural and normal result of sowing the unclean seed bought from the defendant as good and proper seed, was to introduce upon his land such an injurious and irradicable root as to affect the land more or less permanently, and for that he is entitled to such substantial damages as the jury may find. This element of damages is not speculative, or too remote to be disregarded, but would flow in the ordinary course of things from the act of the defendant, dealing as he is said to have done with the plaintiff. There should be a new trial, reserving the costs as usual." But in Oliver v. Hawley, 5 Neb. 439, it was held that if the buyer knows before sewing seed that there is an admixture of noxious seed he cannot recover for consequential damages.

Concerning the duty of the buyer to minimize the damage it was said in Fox v. Everson, 27 Hun (N. Y.) 355: "If, after the plaintiff had discovered that plantain was growing upon his farm, he could, by reasonable means, have rooted it out, and prevented its further growth, it was his duty to have done so. He would not be justified in lying idle and permitting the noxious weed to seed and spread over his entire farm, and thus enhance his damages. He is only entitled to recover such damages as he has actually sustained, and that necessarily would be expected to follow from the sale of the impure seed."

A tenant cannot claim for permanent damage to the soil by noxious seeds. Vannoy v. Givens, 23 N. J. L. 201.

Pleading.

Allegations in a complaint that the defendant sold to the plaintiff wheat for spring seeding and warranted it to be spring wheat, that the plaintiff sowed it and tended it properly, but no crop was produced because it was fall wheat and therefore worthless to the plaintiff, that the plaintiff could not ascertain that it was not spring wheat as warranted, and that the defendant knew or could with reasonable diligence have ascertained that it was not spring wheat, have been held to be sufficient to charge a breach of warranty of the kind and quality of seed sold. Keeler v. Green, 51 Mont. 42, 149 Pac. 286.

In an action for damages for a breach of warranty of seed an allegation by the plaintiff that the defendant warranted the wheat to be "white Australian" wheat and that it produced a crop of hay inferior to that which would have been grown had said seed wheat been of the variety mentioned, has been held to be sufficient on demurrer. Moody v. Peirano (Cal.) 84 Pac. 783.

In an action for a breach of warranty in a sale of western German millet seed, two paragraphs in a complaint, one counting on a breach of express warranty as to the variety and the other on a breach of implied warranty as to the quality of the variety, have been held not to be inconsistent. Gardner v. Winter, 117 Ky. 382, 78 S. W. 143, 63 L.R.A. 647, 25 Ky. L. Rep. 1472.

In Fanning v. International Seed Co. 89 Hun 146, 35 N. Y. S. 10, it was held that a complaint for a breach of contract of sale alleging that the defendant sold potatoes representing that they were a new variety, enormous bearers, etc., was insufficient to show that the potatoes were warranted to be a new variety. The court said: "The allegation in the complaint might be true, but plaintiff would not have been deceived. It is true that proof upon a trial that a vendor represented goods to be of a particular kind or quality, may often times enable a jury to see that the transaction was understood by the parties to be a warranty or a contract to deliver goods of a specified kind or quality, and render a verdict accordingly. But a representation is not necessarily, perhaps not usually, a warranty. Caveat emptor is the general rule."

Evidence.

It has been held that where a purchaser claims that seed corn sold to him by the defendant was unfit in germinating quality, evidence as to the poor grade of corn raised that year was properly excluded as immaterial. Totten v. Stevenson, 29 S. D. 71, 135 N. W. 715, wherein the court said: "We are also of the opinion that there could be no prejudicial error, based on the rejection of this testimony, because it was wholly immaterial for any purpose. That corn raised during the year 1909 was generally poor and of a low grade was wholly immaterial to the issues. The subject of the sale was the particular corn of defendant; and what other corn, raised by some other person, or in some other year, was generally, as to soundness and grade, could have no possible bearing upon the quality of defendant's corn, agreed to be sold to plaintiff. It is a matter of common knowledge that corn may generally be very poor and of low grade any year, and still some persons may have and raise corn of the very best quality."

In an action for a breach of warranty on the sale of seed, declarations of the defendant's agent made eight months after the sale, and not connected with any business then being transacted, to the effect that the seed was defective and not genuine, due to improper cultivation, was held to be inadmissible. White v. Miller, 71 N. Y. 118, 27 Am. Rep. 13, wherein the court said: "The general rule is, that what one person says, out of court, is not admissible to charge or bind another. The exception is in cases of agency; and in case of agency, the declarations of the agent are not competent to charge the principle, upon proof merely that the relation of principle and agent existed when the declarations were made. It must further appear that the agent, at the time the declarations were made, was engaged in executing the authority conferred upon him, and that the declarations related to, and were connected with, the business then depending, so that they constituted a part of res gestae."

In an action for the breach of an alleged warranty that certain broom corn seed was of the quality known as "Tennessee evergreen," evidence of statements or representations made by the defendant to a third person concerning the seed was held to be admissible. Phillips v. Vermillion, 91 Ill. App. 133. In that case the court said: "Over the objection of the appellants the court admitted evidence of the statements or representations made by defendants to Shea concerning broom corn seed being Tennessee evergreen. This, we think, was misleading and prejudicial error. It was not pertinent to the issue, nor was it claimed that the seed was sold to Shea for the particular kind of seed in question, for he purchased seed elsewhere; and even if the statement were true, it would prove nothing material affecting the alleged contract of warranty with appellee. The only inference that could be drawn from such evidence by the jury would be, that having made the statement to Shea, it was probable it was also made to appellee, and herein was the misleading quality of the evidence."

Where the plaintiff in an action for breach of warranty on the sale of seed seeks to recover as damages only the cost of preparing the ground and sowing the seed and the rental value of the land, the evidence should be restricted to those amounts, although the plaintiff had he so claimed would have been entitled to the value of the crop which would have been raised if the seed had been of the kind represented. Crutcher v. Elliott, 13 Ky. L. Rep. (Abstract) 592.

Where a florist sues a seed dealer for a breach of warranty that lily bulbs sold by the defendant to the plaintiff would grow a certain kind of lily, evidence of the price paid for a quantity of lilies at a retail store was held to be inadmissible on the question of market value as uninstrusive with regard to growers' prices. Edgar v. Joseph Breck, etc. Corp. 172 Mass. 581, 52 N. E. 1083.

In a suit for damages for breach of warranty on the sale of seed, where the question was whether the defendant sold the plaintiff "white Australian wheat," the defendant having testified that he had sold a third person the same kind of wheat that he sold to the plaintiff, evidence by the third person that he bought wheat of the defendant at about the time when the plaintiff bought his wheat, and that the crop when grown proved to be different from "white Australian wheat," was held to be relevant to show that the wheat sold to the plaintiff was not of that variety. Moody v. Peirano (Cal.) 84 Pac. 783. But in that case it was also held that the testimony of a third person that the defendant sold wheat to him in the same season that the wheat was sold to the plaintiff was inadmissible, the court saying: "The evidence as to representations and warranties made to third parties was clearly res inter alios acta. Such evidence did not tend to prove that defendant warranted the wheat he sold to plaintiff. The fact that defendant, in answer to questions put by plaintiff in cross-examination (also over defendant's objections), had testified that he had not warranted the wheat sold to Main to be white Australian, did not make such evidence admissible. When a witness is cross-examined as to collateral matters not testified to in chief, the party conducting the cross-examination is bound by the answers of the witness as to such matters, and cannot contradict such answers by other evidence for the purpose of impeaching the witness."

Evidence that the seller produced cucumbers from the seed contracted for, as samples, and sent them to the purchaser before the delivery of the seed, has been held to be admissible to show notice of the actual nature of the seed to be delivered. Buckbee v. P. Hohenadel Jr. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 88.

In Depew v. Peck Hardware Co. 121 App. Div. 28, 105 N. Y. S. 390, affirmed 197 N. Y. 528, 90 N. E. 1158, an action for breach of warranty on the sale of seed, it was held that where the defendant was allowed to give proof that the plaintiff's damage was due to trefoil growing on the roadside abutting the plaintiff's field and not because trefoil was mixed in the alfalfa seed sold by the defendant, expert testimony as to the amount of trefoil in the seed was competent in rebuttal.

v.

P. HOHENADEL, JR., COMPANY.

United States Circuit Court of Appeals,
Seventh Circuit—January 5, 1915.

224 Fed. 14.

Verdicts — Direction of Verdict — Effect of Motion — Court Authorized to Find Facts.

In an action for breach of contract in failing to furnish the variety of cucumber seed ordered, a request by both parties for a directed verdict at the conclusion of all the evidence operates as a request that the court find the facts, and the facts as found are conclusive upon the parties; the reviewing court being limited to the correctness of the conclusions of law thereon.

[6 Ann. Cas. 545; 13 Ann. Cas. 372; Ann. Cas. 1913C 1342.]

Same.

That a motion for a directed verdict operates as a request that the court find the facts, and is conclusive upon the parties upon appeal, does not prevent consideration of the inadmissibility of rejected evidence, nor waive exceptions to the rulings of law thereon.

Sales — Seeds — Warranty of Correspondence to Name or Variety — Evidence of Breach.

In an action for breach of contract in failing to furnish the variety of cucumber seed purchased, testimony by some of plaintiff's witnesses that they had not known the name of the brand ordered to be used to designate a certain variety of seed does not make plain-tiff's evidence so uncertain as to render the direction of a verdict in his favor erroneous, where numerous witnesses sustained plaintiff's contention as to the designation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where seed is sold to a dealer under a warranty that it is of a special variety, and the dealer in turn sends it to a grower, the warranty is carried forward to the ultimate purchaser, if it appears that such understanding was part of the first sale, and the measure of damages for breach of warranty is the difference in market value between the crop produced and such crop as the specified variety of seed would have produced under like conditions.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The purchaser of seed warranted to be of a specified variety, and which he resells to a grower, may recover from the dealer the actual loss due to misrepresentation as to the variety although he has not liquidated his liability to the subvendee for breach of warranty.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for damages for failing to deliver cucumber seed bought under a written contract as being "Improved Chicago Pickling," evidence that the purchaser was informed as to the kind of seed actually furnished, that it had been developed from seed purchased from a certain company, and that he agreed that it should be labeled, "Improved Chicago Pickling," is improperly excluded; it being in explanation, and not in variation, of the terms of the written contract.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In an action for damages for failing to deliver "Improved Chicago Pickling" cucumber seed under a written contract, evidence that the seller produced cucumbers from the seed contracted for as samples and sent them to the purchaser previous to the delivery is admissible to show notice of the actual nature of the seed to be delivered.

Error to United States District Court, Western Division of Northern District of Illinois: CARPENTER, Judge.

Action by P. Hohenadel, Jr., Company, plaintiff, against H. W. Buckbee, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. REVERSED.

[15] The plaintiff in error, Buckbee, was defendant below in the suit of P. Hohenadel, Jr., Company, a Wisconsin corporation, as plaintiff, for recovery of damages upon contract. On trial of the issues to a jury verdict was directed by the trial court and so rendered against [16] the defendant for $12,921.40 damages assessed in favor of the plaintiff, and this writ of error is brought for reversal of the judgment awarded thereupon. The material questions raised by the assignments of error are stated in the ensuing opinion, and the issues under the pleadings are well summarized in the brief of defendant in error, as follows:

"The declaration set out in haec verba in the second count two contracts, the first of October 17, 1903 and the second of October 23, 1903. The first contract was in the form of an order and acceptance for 300 pounds of 'Chicago Pickle' cucumber seed at the price of 70 cents per pound for future delivery, f. o. b. Rockford, net cash, 30 days, 1½ per cent discount for cash in 10 days. The second contract was for $3,500 pounds of cucumber seed, 'Improved Chicago Pickling,' upon the same terms. The declaration then alleged that the plaintiff, at the time of making such contracts, was acting as the agent for P. Hohenadel, Jr., but that the fact of such agency was not disclosed to defendant at the time of making either of said contracts, and further alleged that the cucumber seed mentioned in the contracts as 'Chicago Pickle' and 'Improved Chicago Pickling' were known as and were one and the same, and that the second contract was an extension and further order under the first contract, and said two contracts were treated by the plaintiff and defendant as one order, and the deliveries thereunder were made as if under one and the same contract.

"The declaration then alleged that 2,500 pounds of cucumber seed were delivered under the said contracts on March 4, 1904, and 1,300 pounds on March 9, 1904, and the plaintiff thereupon paid the defendant the purchase price of the said cucumber seed, and that neither at the time of the purchase nor at the time of delivery could the plaintiff, by an examination or inspection of said cucumber seed, tell or ascertain whether said cucumber seed were of the variety or kind known as 'Chicago Pickle' or 'Improved Chicago Pickling,' and that such variety of seed was specially adapted for producing a high grade of cucumbers for pickling, and that the kind of cucumber seed could not be ascertained until the seed were planted and cucumbers grown therefrom; that the defendant did not keep and perform its said contracts and warranties as to the quality of said seed, and the seed delivered were not 'Chicago Pickle' or 'Improved Chicago Pickling' cucumber seed, but said seed were then and there of an inferior variety of cucumber seed, that would not produce, when planted, cucumbers specially adapted to the production of a high grade of cucumbers for pickles; that both P. Hohenadel, Jr., and the plaintiff were engaged in the business of selling cucumber seed, and in the business of planting and growing cucumbers for pickling, and in pickling the same, as defendant then and there well knew, and it was then and there a custom and usage well known to the defendant for the purchasers of seed, in order to sell said seed and obtain a crop therefrom, to contract to take all of the cucumbers produced from such seed, and that, relying upon the warranties aforesaid, P. Hohenadel, Jr., sold said cucumber seed to P. A. Marsh under a like warranty; that Marsh sold said cucumber seed to others, including numerous producers of cucumbers, and at the time of such sale contracted with some of the producers to purchase from them the whole product of said seed; and that, in consequence of the plaintiff's breach of warranty, the said Marsh was compelled to take the product of said cucumber seed, and, in consequence, suffered great damage, and said P. Hohenadel, Jr., incurred large liability and suffered damage in the sum of $30,000. To this declaration the defendant pleaded the general issue, non assumpsit, 'that he did not promise in the manner and form as the plaintiff has . . . in its additional counts . . . complained.'"

James G. Elsdon for plaintiff in error.

John M. Zane for defendant in error.

Sitting: BAKER, SEAMAN, and KOHLSTAAT, Circuit Judges.

[17] SEAMAN, J. (after stating the facts).

—The judgment against the defendant below, plaintiff in error Buckbee, arose under his contracts for sale and delivery to the plaintiff corporation, P. Hohenadel, Jr., Company, of cucumber seed of specified variety, and the verdict in favor of the plaintiff (directed by the trial court) awards recovery pursuant to two propositions, in substance: (1) That the evidence establishes delivery of a different variety of seed, not adapted to the purpose contemplated by the contract; and (2) that damages are proven and recoverable for the difference in market value between the crops produced from the seed so delivered and such crops as the variety of seed specified in the contracts would have produced under like conditions. Thus, in one or another form of presentation, the tenability of both of these propositions requires determination under the assignments of error. Other material questions arise upon rulings against the reception of testimony offered on behalf of the defendant. For consideration, however, of both propositions above stated, involving substantially the merits of the issues under the pleadings, this question arises for settlement at the threshold of inquiries under the assignments, namely: To what extent and for what tests, is the evidence reviewable thereupon?

1. The verdict against the defendant was directed by the court, and the general rule in such case, both of reviewability of the entire evidence and of the tests to be applied thereto, is unquestionable. But in the present record both the bill of exceptions and assignments of error disclose motions on behalf of the defendant, described in assignments 1, 2, 3, and 4 as denied by the court, as follows:

(1) "To direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, at the conclusion of the plaintiff's case;" (2) "to strike plaintiff's evidence and to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant at the conclusion of all the evidence;" (3) "to direct a verdict for the sum of $300 against the defendant at the conclusion of plaintiff's case;" (4) "to direct a verdict for the sum of $300 against the defendant at the conclusion of all the evidence."

It is manifest, therefore, that the defendant expressly submitted and "affirmed that there was no disputed question of fact which could operate to deflect or control the question of law," and that the rule stated and upheld in Beuttell v. Magone, 157 U. S. 154, 157, 15 S. Ct. 566, 567, 39 U. S. (L. ed.) 654, is applicable and controlling for answer to the foregoing inquiry, namely:

"This was necessarily a request that the court find the facts, and the parties are therefore concluded by the finding made by the court, upon which the resulting instruction of law was given. The facts having been thus submitted to the court, we are limited in reviewing its action to the consideration of the correctness of the finding on the law, and must affirm if there be any evidence in support thereof."

We are not advised of any decision of the Supreme Court which tends to disturb this ruling, and it appears to have been uniformly adopted and enforced by the Circuit Courts of Appeals in the various circuits whenever the effect of such motions has arisen. The following precedents with their citations are deemed sufficient for mention: Chrystie v. Foster, 61 Fed. 551, 26 U. S. App. 67, 9 C. C. A. 606; Magone v. Origet, 70 Fed. 778, 35 U. S. App. 744, 17 C. C. A. 363; U. S. v. Bishop, 125 Fed. 181, [18] 60 C. C. A. 123; Phenix Ins. Co. v. Kerr, 129 Fed. 723, 64 C. C. A. 251, 66 L.R.A. 569; Love v. Scatterd, 146 Fed. 1, 77 C. C. A. 1; Bradley Timber Co. v. White, 121 Fed. 779, 58 C. C. A. 55; Century Throwing Co. v. Miller, 197 Fed. 252, 257, 116 C. C. A. 614. Both of the above-mentioned requests for direction of verdict "at the conclusion of all the evidence" were necessarily predicated on the defendant's submission and assurance that the evidence raised no issue of fact for determination within the exclusive province of the jury, that conclusions of law were alone involved therein, and that the ruling of the court accordingly was directly invoked on behalf of the defendant below. On such state of the record, not only administration of justice, but the entire line of authorities referred to, concur in denial of his right, as plaintiff in error, to have that submission reopened for review of the testimony, except to ascertain whether evidence appears in support of the ultimate conclusions of law thereupon in favor of plaintiff below.

We do not understand, however, that these motions affect in any manner the assignments of error for rejection of testimony offered on behalf of the defendant in the course of the trial, and the contentions in support of the judgment, that errors of law therein (if committed) were either waived or otherwise cured by such motions, must be overruled. The submission above described involved alone the effect of the testimony which was received and entered into denial of the motions, so that it can neither embrace the offers of rejected testimony, nor waive exceptions duly preserved to the rulings of law thereupon.

2. Whatever of conflict appears in the testimony, therefore, in reference to the first proposition above mentioned as one of fact which was upheld by the trial court for direction of verdict in favor of the plaintiff, the contention of reversible error in such ruling is untenable, as we believe, for the reason that the record exhibits considerable testimony (to say the least) in support of the ruling therein. When the testimony introduced by plaintiff upon that issue is read and analyzed for its bearing within the above-stated rule, we believe sufficient evidence is presented for the required proof of every element embraced in such issue, namely, that the contract specified a distinct variety of seed, well known for production of the quality of cucumbers for pickling purposes thereby contemplated; that instead thereof the defendant delivered a different variety, not ascertainable from inspection of the seed; and that the product thereof was inferior and not adapted to the known purpose of the contract. It is unquestionable that the plaintiff's case (both under its declaration and testimony) rests on these averments of meaning of the terms "Chicago Pickle," as used in one contract, and "Improved Chicago Pickling" as used in the second contract: That both "are one and the same variety, which produces a character of cucumber" as described, and that both were the identical variety of seed which had long theretofore been well known in the trade as "Westfield's Chicago Pickle." While the testimony of numerous witnesses supports each of these contentions, it further appears that four of the witnesses introduced for the plaintiff on that issue [19] testified in substance that they had not known the term "Improved Chicago Pickling" to be so used; and referring to these instances of failure to sustain the averments, together with testimony adduced by the defendants, the contention is pressed for reversal that uncertainty is thus established in the contract terms, whereby the direction of verdict was erroneous. We are of opinion, however, that neither the instances of failure referred to nor the defendant's testimony can affect the inquiry above defined of support for the direction; and it may well be remarked in this connection that other evidence appears in support thereof, including catalogues published by the defendant which may bear interpretation in favor of the alleged identity of the contract terms. The various contentions of error, therefore, in finding the above-stated premise of fact, must be overruled.

3. The remaining premise upon which verdict was directed, as above mentioned, involves both findings of ultimate fact and the conclusions of law on which the award of damages rests. Upon the questions of fact raised the rule heretofore stated is equally applicable and renders their solution free from difficulty. But the conceded and undisputed state of facts presents a question or questions of law upon the character and measure of damages recoverable thereupon, which may not be clearly settled by the authorities. We proceed, therefore, to their consideration under the finding of fact that the seed delivered were neither of the variety contracted for nor adapted to produce the pickling cucumbers for which the purchase was made within the contemplation of both parties.

The general rule to be applied for recovery of damages in the event thus stated, when the seed is sold to the purchaser as grower of the product, is settled by the authorities (both English and American) as the loss suffered in the production of a crop therefrom; and the great preponderance of authority upholds the measure of damages in such cases, as adopted by the trial court, to be the difference in market value between the crop actually produced and that which would have been produced had the seed been of the variety specified in the contract. We do not understand that this view of the general current of authority is controverted, although precedents are cited as tending to introduce other elements; but we believe the measure above stated to be both well founded and the established rule, so that citation or review of the authorities is not needful thereupon. It proceeds on the reasonable view that the crop actually raised may rightly furnish the prima facie test of the amount of crop which would have been raised from the stipulated variety, and thus becomes neither speculative nor remote for estimation of damages. This rule, however, as above formulated, imposes the element of direct contract between the seller and the grower of the seed, not present in the case at bar, and applicability of like measure of damages to various conditions which are presented raises important questions not entirely involved in any of the authorities called to our attention. Authorities are cited for extension of the rule to sales made to a dealer for resale to growers of the seed, under like representations, for like measure of damages against the primary vendor, when actually incurred through the resale. But the damages [20] awarded herein are predicated on extension of such measure beyond their direct scope.

The undisputed evidence establishes this state of facts: The seed delivered under the contract was neither planted by the plaintiff, as purchaser, nor were the crops therefrom raised under its direction, nor for its benefit; but the purchase was made by it, without notice thereof to the defendant, for the individual use and benefit of P. Hohenadel, Jr., for purposes of resale to other dealers. It was so sold and delivered by Hohenadel to one Marsh, as "Chicago Pickling seed"—Marsh being engaged in the pickling business and in contracting with producers for cucumber crops and seed furnished by himself. Marsh delivered this seed to numerous growers for such production of crops for his use; and of such deliveries the proof is limited to identification of growers and crops as to 565 pounds of seed planted, together with one lot of seed hereinafter mentioned for which damages were liquidated at $300. The remaining portions of seed delivered under the contract, not thus identified, do not enter into the award of damages. While it is contended on behalf of the defendant that these identifications were not complete, we believe sufficient identification appears to that end. The only proof, however, that damages were actually paid, either by plaintiff or by Hohenadel, to indemnify Marsh for his loss, was a single payment of $300 for loss on the lot of seed above referred to, which constitutes the item for which award of damages in favor of the plaintiff was requested on behalf of the defendant, as hereinbefore stated, so that the proof in that respect is not open to controversy herein. For the remaining amount of damages awarded, the following further facts appear: When the suit was commenced, the corporation was joined with Hohenadel (its undisclosed principal in the contract) as co-plaintiffs, and such damages had neither been paid to Marsh, nor had liquidation or adjustment thereof with him occurred in any form. The issues were brought to trial during the lifetime of Hohenadel, without liquidation or adjustment thereof with Marsh, but resulted in a mistrial. Prior to the present trial Hohenadel died, having made no adjustment in any form with Marsh, nor does any specific claim appear to have been made by Marsh for damages (other than the $300 paid as above mentioned) while Hohenadel was living; and the only evidence of specific claim therefor appears as a claim filed by Marsh against the estate of the deceased, pending hearing in the proper county court in probate. The declaration, however, expressly avers, not only grounds for, but fact of, his liability to Marsh.

For application of the measure of damages awarded by the verdict to the above state of facts, the authority mainly relied upon is an English decision (1858) of unquestionable importance—Randall v. Raper, 4 Jur. N. S. 662, El. Bl. & El. 84, 96 E. C. L. 84, 120 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 438—which does not appear to be qualified or disaffirmed in any decision, English or American, called to our notice. The issues presented are thus stated in the head note:

"Defendant sold to plaintiff barley warranted to be 'Chevalier's seed barley.' Plaintiff sold it to other persons with the same warranty. The seed [21] turned out to be not according to warranty. The subpurchasers, who had sown the seed, made claims on plaintiff for the damages which they had sustained, but such claims had not been paid by plaintiff."

The opinion by Lord Campbell, C. J., clearly states the rulings thereupon, as follows:

"It has been contended that if the plaintiff had paid to the subpurchasers the full amount of the damages which they have sustained from the breach of the warranty, still he would not have been entitled to recover them. The true rule on the authorities is, that the plaintiff must show that the damage which he seeks to recover naturally arose from the breach of contract complained of. In this the damage sustained by the subpurchasers was the natural—yea, the necessary—consequences from the breach of contract by the defendant. The defendant sold the barley with a warranty that it was 'Chevalier's seed barley;' if it was not, it would not, when sown, produce grain of that quality, quite independently of soil or climate. The difference in value between the inferior crop grown and that which would have been produced if the seed had been as warranted is the natural and necessary loss from the breach of the warranty. Therefore, the defendant having warranted the barley as 'Chevalier's seed barley,' if the plaintiff had been sued by the subpurchasers, he would have been obliged to pay damages to that extent, and these he would have been entitled to recover from the defendant.

"But the main point brought before us is whether the plaintiff can recover as damages an amount which he has not paid to the subpurchasers, and for which they have only made claim not enforced by legal proceedings. We cannot lay down a rule that a mere liability, which has not been enforced, will not give a right to recover damages. Cases of extreme hardship might occur if such were the rule, and no authority has been cited to show that a liability to pay damages is not enough to sustain a right to damages. The cases which were cited are not in point. If liability to pay damages may be a ground of recovering special damage, why should not the liability be estimated by the jury? And that is all that has been done in this case. They have estimated the probable loss which the subpurchasers may recover from the plaintiff. The demand having been made, there is an easy mode of ascertaining the amount; and it is almost an inevitable consequence that the demand would be enforced. Therefore I am of opinion that the verdict ought to stand."

Concurring opinions are strongly expressed by Justices Erle and Crompton; and Justice Wrightman concurs, as having "no doubt on the principle enunciated and that if the claims of the subpurchasers had been paid by the plaintiff, he might have recovered them from the defendant," but expresses doubt whether recovery is authorized for a claim of damages neither paid nor liquidated, with this remark: "I do not press this doubt further than to mention it."

In 3 Sutherland on Damages (3d ed.) § 675, the eminent author thus states the rule as applicable to a purchase for resale:

"Where seeds are sold with a warranty that they are of a kind identified by a particular name, with notice that the purchaser intends to sell them again to persons who will purchase for the purpose of sowing them, if the warranty is untrue there seems to be no difference in principle as to the subject of damages between such a sale and one with such warranty where the purchaser is known to buy for the purpose of sowing them himself. The warranty to one buying seed to sell again justifies him in warranting it accordingly to his customers; and as they have recourse to him for damages estimated by the standard mentioned in the first paragraphs of the preceding section, that is also the measure of his loss as against his vendor."

In Passinger v. Thorburn, 34 N. Y. 634, 639, 90 Am. Dec. 753, the opinion by Davies, C. J., reviews the rulings in Randall v. Raper, supra, and states:

[22] "This is the well-settled law in this country, it having been held that, where an article is sold with a warranty, and the vendee resells with a like warranty, the sum paid by him in an action by his subvendee for a breach of that warranty is prima facie evidence of the amount which he will be entitled to recover from his vendor in an action in his own behalf. Reggio v. Braggiotti, 7 Cush. (Mass.) 166; Armstrong v. Percy, 5 Wend. (N. Y.) 535; Blasdale v. Babcock, 1 Johns. (N. Y.) 518. And this court, in Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 597, held that a purchaser may recover for a breach of a warranty, although he has sold the goods and no claim has been made on him, and that it was not necessary for him to show the price on the resale. That price may be evidence of the damages, but does not furnish the rule in respect to them."

We are impressed with no doubt that the doctrine on which damages are awarded for misrepresentation in the sale of seed is equally applicable to both classes of sale, as upheld in Randall v. Raper; that no substantial distinction exists to authorize one rule of just recovery when sale is made directly to the grower, and a different and plainly inadequate measure when sold to a dealer for resale to growers of the seed. The seller who gathers and packs the seed for sale is necessarily required to know its variety for the intended use by growers, and his warranty thereof, whether directly made to the grower or to the intermediate dealer for resale to growers, may justly render him chargeable for the damages suffered by the growers, when the circumstances of his sale authorize the inference that the warranty was to be thus carried forward to the growers. Indemnity for misrepresentations so carried forward is within the contemplation of his contract of sale to the dealer, and allowance thereof is not open to the objection of remote or speculative damages.

Under the facts above stated, the vendee Marsh undoubtedly stands in the relation of producer of the crop, which he obtained through placing out the seed with the actual growers; and the distinction from the facts involved in Randall v. Raper arises out of the intervention of Hohenadel as the actual vendee. Although the purchase was made for his use and benefit, such purpose was not disclosed to the defendant in making the contract. Nevertheless the negotiations were entirely with Hohenadel, who drafted and executed the contract on the part of the corporation, and the question whether the defendant understood that the seed as warranted by him was to be resold to a grower, as averred in the declaration, does not impress us to be materially affected by such personal relation of Hohenadel in the transaction. The crucial inquiry was of defendant's understanding of such purpose of direct resale to the grower, and thereupon we believe the finding, under circumstances in evidence, is not reviewable on the present inquiry.

On the other hand, however, we are of opinion that the principle of the rule for this extraordinary allowance of growers' damages, requires its limitation as defined in the above quotation from Sutherland on Damages. The warranty direct to the growers imposes such liability per se. Not so in the case of sale to a dealer, wherein various interpositions may arise before ultimate sale to growers, all beyond oversight on the part of the original seller; and without his concurrence, either express or implied, for carrying forward the warranty [23] to a grower, we believe the ordinary liability for breach of contract must arise, which does not extend to loss suffered by the grower. So, in making such sale, he may either decline or accept the extraordinary liability involved in a sale to the grower. But if he warrants to the dealer, with the understanding that resale is to be made directly to growers of the seed, he may rightly become bound for the loss thus brought directly within the contemplation of his sale and warranty. The issue raised herein as to such understanding on the part of the defendant in making the contracts, must be determined from the evidence, circumstantial or direct, with the burden resting on the plaintiff to establish such understanding as an issue of fact. In the event, therefore, of submission to a jury, on retrial of all issues (as hereinafter directed), instructions will become needful, in conformity with the foregoing opinion, upon such issue of fact as may be presented by the evidence for assessment of damages under one or the other rule.

We are of opinion, therefore, that the foregoing considerations authorized the rule of damages adopted herein, unless the above-stated facts, that the plaintiffs had neither paid nor adjusted the damages suffered by the grower of the crops, bar recovery of indemnity on their behalf of the alleged liability incurred through the sale to the grower; and the question of right to recover thereupon, beyond the above-mentioned $300 item of damages which was paid, remains for determination. That such recovery is authorized without prepayment of the plaintiff's liability to the subvendee is expressly decided (as above shown) in Randall v. Raper, supra, but the contentions of error in like ruling herein are in substance: (a) That it is unsupported by any other authority; and (b) that its doctrine is unreasonable and open to serious abuse. We believe neither of these propositions is tenable. Like rule is uniformly recognized and applied for recovery of the amount of medical or other professional services incurred by the injured party, under circumstances which create liability against the defendant therefor, whether actually paid or adjusted or merely an outstanding liability. It is likewise applied for recovery of damages upon breach of warranty in sale of chattels, within the general rule, in Muller v. Eno, 14 N. Y. 597, and cases there cited—referred to in Passinger v. Thorburn, supra, as equally applicable to the present inquiry. For analogous application, see Smith v. McNair, 19 Kan. 333, 27 Am. Rep. 117; Denton v. Fisher, 102 Md. 386, 62 Atl. 627, 3 L.R.A. (N.S.) 465; Western Twine Co. v. Wright, 11 S. D. 521, 78 N. W. 942, 44 L.R.A. 438; also citation in 19 Cyc. 641, for like rule under reinsurance contracts between insurance companies. Nor are we advised of any just reason to require payment or adjustment of damages suffered by the subvendee (as grower) in loss of crops prior to the suit against the original seller. The recovery therein must be measured by the actual loss due to the misrepresentation, to be established by proof through the grower and other witnesses. We are of opinion, therefore, that the ruling thereupon was not erroneous.

4. Assignments of error, however, for rejection of testimony offered on behalf of the defendant, raise questions of vital importance [24] for submission of the issues, if error, is well assigned. The main assignment sets forth the offer as made, as follows:

"45. The court erred in refusing the offer of the defendant (the plaintiff, by his counsel, stating in open court that he made no objection because such proposed testimony was presented in the form of an offer, and such offered testimony having been reduced to writing and filed in the cause and then and there brought to the court's attention before the jury retired) to prove by the witness John T. Buckbee, that at the time of the negotiations for and the making of the contract of October 23, 1903, covering the 3,500 pounds of cucumber seeds and other seeds, made at Janesville, Wis., that the samples of Westerfield Chicago Pickle cucumber seed were presented by him to Mr. Hohenadel; that a sample of the seed which Buckbee was then advertising in his catalogue of 1903 as Improved Chicago Pickling was presented; that this latter seed was the seed developed by Buckbee, defendant, from the seed earlier purchased by him from the Haskell Seed Company of Rockford, Ill., which was going out of business; that the price quoted to Mr. Hohenadel on the Westerfield Chicago Pickle cucumber seed was 85 cents per pound; that the price quoted on the other seed was 70 cents per pound; that the witness told to Mr. Hohenadel the history of the seed secured from Haskell and advertised by Buckbee as Improved Chicago Pickling; that his information was that it had been developed from the same original stock from which the Westerfield had been developed; that the witness described to Mr. Hohenadel the kind of cucumber that it would raise in the pickling stage, and described it as somewhat thicker and lighter shade than the Westerfield Chicago Pickle cucumber; that Mr. Hohenadel asked the witness what they called it; that the witness told him that they were advertising it as Improved Chicago Pickling cucumber seed; that the witness told him that they had grown this seed themselves, Buckbee growing the seed, and the quantity they had; that there was further conversation in regard to other seeds not involved in this suit but covered by the contract; that thereupon Mr. Hohenadel dictated and had written by his stenographer and typewriter the contract of October 23, 1903, in evidence; that, previous to dictating that, Mr. Hohenadel had stated that he would take 3,500 pounds of that seed; that they would label it in the contract 'Improved Chicago Pickling;' that that name was inserted in the contract by Mr. Hohenadel, and it was agreed between the witness and Mr. Hohenadel that the seed was developed from the seed purchased from the Haskell Seed Company, and should be delivered under the contract; that Mr. Hohenadel requested in the same conversation that 300 pounds covered by the contract of October 17, 1903, should be filled with the same kind of seed; that the 3,800 pounds of his kind of seed was afterwards, in the latter part of February or early part of March, shipped to the Hohenadel people under Hohenadel's direction, and invoiced to them as per invoices in evidence; that afterwards, and during the winter of the season following, for the purpose of testing this seed that was delivered in February or March to Hohenadel, the witness planted it in his greenhouse and tested it for germination and for quality; that, as shown by letter in evidence, Mr. Hohenadel was notified of this; that the seed that was germinated was of the variety delivered to Hohenadel; that after the plant grew, and the fruit was set and fully developed, samples of it were sent to Mr. Hohenadel previous to the delivery of the seed; that at that time, in 1903 and 1904, the witness knew of no other strain or variety or kind of cucumber seed that was advertised or being sold under the name of Improved Chicago Pickling. As a part of such offer, and identified by the same witness, page 27 of the Buckbee catalogue of 1903 was offered as defendant's Exhibit 2, and also page 27 of the Buckbee catalogue of 1904 was offered as Defendant's Exhibit 3, copies of which exhibits are set forth and included in the bill of exceptions in the action."

matters of record. The one contract in suit named the subject-matter thereof as "300 pounds cucumber Chicago Pickle," while the second contract named 3,500 pounds "cucumber [25] seed, Improved Chicago Pickling." On the part of the plaintiff, the contentions were (as stated in its brief), that one Westerfield had developed, long prior to the contracts, "a certain variety of cucumbers, which are especially desirable for pickling purposes," as described; that eventually "production of this type of cucumber resulted in the sale of cucumber seed, called indifferently, 'Westerfield Chicago Pickle,' or 'Chicago Pickle,' or 'Improved Chicago Pickling;'" and that both contracts intended such "Westerfield" variety as their subject-matter. Many seedmen, introduced as witnesses in support of such contention, so testified, although other witnesses upon the same side testified, in substance, either otherwise or that such other designations of the Westerfield variety were unknown to them in the trade. Numerous witnesses (seedmen) testified on the part of the defendant, in substance, that the contract terms were not understood in the trade as designations of the Westerfield variety. By way of foundation for the above offer, the witness Buckbee had been interrogated as to the negotiations and transactions between the parties on October 23d, when the second contract was made, and the record shows extended discussion, both on the part of court and counsel, upon the admissibility of testimony embraced in the subsequent offer. Thereupon the ruling of the court excluded the testimony, stating, "Whatever transpired prior to the execution of the written contract is absolutely immaterial," and, in substance, that it must be excluded as violative of the cardinal rule against varying the terms of the contract as written. For preservation of all questions raised by such rulings, the trial judge suggested the making of the offer and stated, "Let the record show that there is no objection made to the evidence because it is in the form of an offer," and counsel for plaintiff assented to such entry.

The foregoing immediate circumstances of the offer are material for two purposes: (a) As evidence that all substantial questions involved therein were duly presented and entered into consideration for the ruling to exclude the testimony; and (b) that it clearly meets the objection urged by counsel for plaintiff (elaborately discussed in the oral argument and supplemental briefs), in substance, that it raises no question of error in the exclusion, for the alleged reason that the offer embraces matter which was inadmissible in any view of the rejection of other matters contained therein, and is thus brought within the rule that rejection by the trial court as an entirety was authorized in the absence of segregation of matters so embraced therein. We believe the record is sufficient to present the important question upon the merits, whether the defendant was deprived of substantial rights by such exclusion.

In the enforcement of contracts which have been reduced to writing, either in formal instruments or in letters or memoranda adopted between the parties, one of the most frequent questions of difficulty arises out of tenders of proof of the nature described in the above offer. Issues are numerous in such cases, which both require and authorize proof of negotiations and attending circumstances out of which the contract grew, either for identification of subject-matter not sufficiently described in the writing, or for interpretation of contract [26] terms which are ambiguous or uncertain without explanation of the sense in which they are employed in the contract. Thus, where the writing is "expressed in short and incomplete terms, parol evidence is admissible to explain that which is per se unintelligible, such explanation not being inconsistent with the written terms." 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 282. For instances of the above-defined character the principle is well recognized, both in law and in equity, that the meaning the parties "intended to convey by the words they employed in the written instrument" may thus be ascertained and enforced. Id. This doctrine is entirely apart from and beyond the range of operation of the other elementary rule, which cannot be departed from in the enforcement of written contracts, that such contract between the parties cannot be varied or set aside by parol testimony, and that all prior negotiations and understanding of the parties (in the absence of fraud or mistake) are presumptively merged in the writing. It neither involves nor permits violation thereof when rightly understood and applied, each being consistent with the other in object and enforcement. In other words the rule invoked for the above-mentioned offer of testimony is exclusively applicable when ambiguity or uncertainty appears in the contract terms, and in such event parol proof is admissible for the sole purpose of ascertaining the meaning of terms so employed on which the minds of the parties presumptively met in making the contract. It thus serves the needful object of placing the court, "in regard to the surrounding circumstances, as nearly as possible in the situation of the party whose written language is to be interpreted." Id. § 295a.

So understood, application of this principle is free from difficulty whenever the controversy over the contract terms is strictly limited as above defined; but confusion is not infrequent, either in presentation of issues upon such terms or in the contentions of counsel in respect thereof, which tends to create difficulty in the way of placing offers of parol proof within one or the other of these cardinal rules, and we believe such confusion appears in the extended argument of counsel (and citations as well) in support of the ruling under consideration. We come, therefore, to the inquiry whether the issues upon the contract in suit render the rejected proof admissible.

Both pleadings and evidence concur in establishing the fact, if otherwise questionable on reading the contracts or orders in suit, that the subject-matter of each—named “Chicago Pickle” in the one contract and “Improved Chicago Pickling” in the other—requires extrinsic evidence for identification as a known variety of cucumber seed, and the entire controversy between the parties hinges primarily on the meaning of these terms as employed in the respective orders. The plaintiff for support of its contention that both were used alike to designate “Westerfield Chicago Pickle”—an old and well-known variety “especially desirable for pickling purposes”—introduced (as heretofore mentioned) various seedmen who testified that the names were so used and known in the trade. This testimony was controverted, but, irrespective of such disagreement, we understand the alleged usage to constitute circumstantial evidence only of the meaning [27] of the uncertain terms employed in the writing; that, although uniform usage may have strong probative force in the issue of fact thus raised, other circumstances attending the making are equally admissible to ascertain the mutual intention of the parties therein. The foregoing offer of proof by the witness John T. Buckbee (who made the contract on behalf of the defendant for “Improved Chicago Pickling”) clearly embraces full explanation to Hohenadel that the variety tendered for purchase was “Haskell” seed described with certainty; that he then quoted the “Westerfield” variety at 85 cents per pound, and the “Haskell” at 70 cents per pound, as optional for purchase; that Hohenadel selected the “Haskell” tender accordingly for purchase; that they then adopted, as designation for the seed so purchased, the arbitrary name “Improved Chicago Pickling,” as theretofore applied by the defendant; that “the witness knew of no other strain or variety or kind of cucumber seed that was being sold under” such name; and that the name was so “inserted in the contract by Mr. Hohenadel.”

We are of opinion that the testimony thus offered was admissible for submission upon the above-defined issue, and that error is well assigned for its rejection. In reference to objections urged to other matters embraced in the offer, we are not impressed with the alleged defects therein as substantive or requiring specific mention.

Another ground of error in rejection of the offer of proof is discussed in the argument and requires consideration in reference to the issue of damages. The contention in substance is this: That not only in the above-recited features of the offer, but in the further offer to prove that the defendant subsequently produced cucumbers from the variety of seed contracted for, which were sent to Hohenadel “previous to the delivery of the seed” under the contract, such evidence was admissible to prove notice to the plaintiff of the actual nature of the seed to be delivered, that the party “damned by the other party’s breach” of the contract “is bound to use all reasonable means not to enhance his damages,” and that proof of such notice would bar recovery of the special damages sought and awarded by the verdict. We believe these propositions (which were raised as well before the trial court) must be upheld for admissibility of the testimony so offered on that issue, irrespective of applicability of the offer for interpretation of the contract, and that the ruling was erroneous for that cause.

Other errors are assigned for rulings in rejection or reception of testimony, but none of these rulings impresses us to require specific mention. Those rejecting testimony in line with the above-mentioned offer are covered by the foregoing ruling of admissibility for interpretation of the contract, and the remaining objections are believed to be without substantial merit.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed accordingly, and the cause remanded, with direction to grant a new trial.

Rehearing denied May 25, 1915.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that where a dealer of seeds agrees to furnish a distinct variety of seed and the purchaser resells the seed to a grower, the purchaser may recover from the dealer the actual loss due to the misrepresentation as to the variety, although the purchaser’s liability to the subvendee is still unliquidated; and that the measure of damages for the breach is the difference between the market value of the crop actually raised and the crop that the specified seed would have produced under the same conditions. For a comprehensive discussion of the subject of express or implied warranty on the sale of seed, see the note to Meehan v. Ingalls, reported ante, this volume, at page 71.

v.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Missouri Supreme Court—December 2, 1915.

266 Mo. 151; 181 S. W. 7.

Witnesses — Competency — Transaction with Person Since Deceased — Action for Tort.

In a suit against a railroad for an assault committed by the road's alleged agent, deceased prior to the action, plaintiff is incompetent as a witness to the assault made upon him, under Rev. St. 1909, § 6354, providing that, in actions where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action is dead, the other shall not be admitted to testify either in his own favor or in favor of any party to the action claiming under him.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court:
WITHBROW, Judge.

Action by William Leavea, plaintiff, against Southern Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Samuel B. McPheeters for appellant.

Frank A. Thompson and Guy A. Thompson for respondent.

[152] RAILEY, C.—Plaintiff brought suit in the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, to recover damages on account of injuries, claimed to have been inflicted upon him, in the form of an assault, by an alleged agent of defendant, while acting within the scope of his employment. Since said assault, and before the trial in the circuit court, the alleged agent, Teague, departed this life.

Notwithstanding the prior death of Teague, who is charged with having made the assault and thus created the cause of action, plaintiff was permitted, over the objection and exception of defendant, to detail in evidence, at the trial, his version of the controversy and the assault made upon him. To the offer of this evidence concerning all that was said and done by Teague, defendant's alleged agent and watchman at the time, an objection and exception was interposed, on the ground that Teague, the other party to the transaction in issue and on trial, was dead. The trial court overruled said objection and permitted plaintiff to testify as to what was said and done between himself and Teague.

Upon the trial in the circuit court, the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $999, as compensatory damages, and $1000 as exemplary damages, and judgment was entered. Ann. Cas. 1918B.—7.

tered accordingly. Defendant filed a motion for new trial and in arrest of judgment in due time. The trial court ordered a remittitur so as to reduce the compensatory damages to $500 and the exemplary damages to same amount. Thereupon the court, after a remittitur was entered, rendered judgment for $1000, and overruled defendant's motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The case was duly appealed to the St. Louis Court of [153] Appeals, and the latter reversed and remanded the cause, on the ground that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify, over defendant's objection, to the transactions and conversations which occurred between himself and Teague, after the latter had died.

The opinion of the Court of Appeals was written by Judge Nortoni, and concurred in by each of the other judges of said court. The latter, deeming the conclusion reached, to be in conflict with the opinion of Judge Broadus, in Drew v. Wabash R. R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 459, on identically the same question, certified the case to this court, as provided by law under such circumstances. Counsel for appellant, at the oral argument of said cause here, announced with commendable fairness, that the only question before us was whether the testimony of plaintiff in regard to the transactions and conversations between himself and Teague, was competent under our statute.

The controversy is thus narrowed down to a construction of section 6354, Revised Statutes 1900, which reads as follows:

"No person shall be disqualified as a witness in any civil suit . . . ; Provided, that in actions where one of the original parties to the contract or cause of action in issue and on trial is dead, or is shown to the court to be insane, the other party to such contract or cause of action shall not be admitted to testify either in his own favor or in favor of any party to the action claiming under him."

We have carefully examined the opinion of Judge Broadus in the Drew case supra, in connection with many other authorities in respect to the same subject, and have been unable to reach the conclusion, that the disqualification called for in the above section of our statute does not apply in actions ex delicto. We can conceive of no good reason for applying the provisions of said section to actions upon contract, which [154] would not apply with equal force to circumstances like those in the case at bar. We are therefore of the opinion, that the Drew case does not properly declare the law in respect to the foregoing matter and should not be followed.

The opinion of the St. Louis Court of Appeals herein, is reported in 171 Mo. App. 24 et seq. It contains a full statement of the case and presents an able review of the principles of law in regard to the matter under consideration. The conclusion reached by the above court, in its treatment and disposition of this cause, is accordingly affirmed.

In the recent case of Eaton v. Cates (Mo.) 175 S. W. 1. c. 953, we construed section 6354, supra, in accordance with the views of the St. Louis Court of Appeals supra. Cogent reasons for observing the above construction of said section of our statute will be found discussed in Chandler v. Hedrick, 187 Mo. App. 1. c. 670, 173 S. W. 93; Diggs v. Henson, 181 Mo. App. 34, 163 S. W. 565; Bone v. Friday, 180 Mo. App. 577, 581, 167 S. W. 599; Taylor v. George, 176 Mo. App. 1. c. 222, 223, 161 S. W. 1187; Leavea v. Southern R. Co. 171 Mo. App. 1. c. 27, 153 S. W. 500; Lieber v. Lieber, 239 Mo. 1, 143 S. W. 458; Williams v. Edwards, 94 Mo. 447, 7 S. W. 429, as well as other cases in this State.

The judgment of the St. Louis Court of Appeals is therefore affirmed, and the cause reversed and remanded with directions to the circuit court to proceed with the case in accordance with the views here expressed.

PER CURIAM.—The foregoing opinion of Railey, C., is hereby adopted as the opinion of the court. All of the judges concur.

NOTE.

Rule Excluding Testimony Relating to Transaction with Decedent as Applicable to Action Ex Delicto.

General Rule.

A statute excluding the testimony of the surviving party, where one of the original parties to a contract or cause of action is dead, applies to an action in tort as well as to an action on contract. Fischer v. Morse, 9 Gray (Mass.) 440; Darks v. Scudder-Gale Grocer Co. 146 Mo. App. 246, 130 S. W. 430; Burns v. Polar Wave Ice, etc. Co. (Mo.) 187 S. W. 145; Irwin v. Nolde, 164 Pa. St. 205, 30 Atl. 246. And see the reported case. See also Anderson v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 134 Ky. 343, 20 Ann. Cas. 920, 120 S. W. 298. Compare Baxter v. Knowles, 12 Allen (Mass.) 114; Entwhistle v. Feighner, 60 Mo. 214; Drew v. Wabash R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 459, 107 S. W. 478.

In Irwin v. Nolde, supra, an action for trespass, the court said: "The first and second assignments of error relate to the admission of the testimony of plaintiff, who was objected to as a witness, to matters occurring during the life of the defendants and to conversations had with them. He was allowed to testify, the reason stated by the learned judge in support of his ruling being that in actions of trespass and tort either party may be a witness notwithstanding the death of the other, and that 'it is only in cases of contract where one party to the contract is dead, by the policy of the law the other party is not allowed to testify.' We see no valid ground for the distinction made. The plaintiff would not have been a competent witness before the Act of 1869, and he came within the letter of the proviso of sec. 1 of that act as to 'actions by or against executors, administrators, or guardians,' and he was excluded by sec. 5, clause E, of the Act of 1887. The act makes no distinction between different classes of civil actions. Nolde, as a de facto trustee, was a party to the thing or contract in action, a right connected with the property; and the plaintiff was a surviving party as well as a person whose interest was adverse to the right of the deceased party. He was within the letter and spirit of the excluding clause of the act, and was clearly incompetent to testify."

Application of Rule.

In Burns v. Polar Wave Ice, etc. Co. (Mo.) 187 S. W. 145, it appeared that the plaintiff while driving a team collided with the defendant's wagon. In an action for the damages sustained by the plaintiff the trial court permitted the plaintiff to testify although the driver who drove the defendant's vehicle at the time of the accident had since died. On appeal the court followed the ruling of the reported case, holding that the plaintiff should not have been permitted to testify to the acts of the driver which it was claimed caused the accident rendering the defendant liable.

In Darks v. Scudder-Gale Grocer Co. 146 Mo. App. 246, 130 S. W. 430, it appeared that the defendant through its salesman sold to the plaintiff's husband and his partner some ginger extract. The extract contained wood alcohol from the use of which the plaintiff's husband died. In an action for death by wrongful act brought by the widow of the deceased, the partner of the husband was permitted to testify that the salesman of the defendant represented that the extract was used for medicinal purposes and was harmless, though the salesman was then dead. While the testimony was held to be admissible for the reason that the statute does not disqualify a witness to testify in a matter in which he is not interested, the court said: "In Drew v. Wabash R. Co. 129 Mo. App. 466, 107 S. W. 478, the Kansas City court of appeals declares that the statute does not apply in an action ex delicto, but is limited to actions on contracts. We fail to see the difference in principle, whether the action be on the contract, or in tort. If in either case, the terms of the contract are a material issue to be determined, then it seems to us the same rule should apply. It is not necessary, however, to determine this question, as we put our holding on another theory." See also the reported case wherein the Drew case is overruled.

The rule has been applied in an action for fraud in inducing the plaintiff to sell shares of corporate stock for less than their value. Wagner v. Binder (Mo.) 187 S. W. 1128.

In Baxter v. Knowles, 12 Allen (Mass.) 114, it appeared that the plaintiff was the owner of certain articles of furniture which she bought with her own money, with her husband's approval. On the husband's death the defendant as his executor converted the property to his own use. The plaintiff brought an action in trover and offered herself as a witness to prove her case. Holding that her testimony was improperly excluded, the court said: "The defendant contends that the plaintiff's husband was an original party to the contract from which her cause of action arises. But how does her cause of action arise from a contract? The action is tort. The cause of action is a wrong which she alleges was done by the defendant personally. She does not sue him in a representative capacity. She charges him with having unlawfully disposed of her property. The only connection which her cause of action has with a contract is found in the fact that she acquired the property by a contract, as she offered to prove. But it was not a contract with the defendant or his testator under which she claimed title, but with Adams & North. She offered to prove that she bought the articles of furniture, except the tea-set, from Adams & North, before her marriage; that she paid for them with her own money, drawn from the savings bank; that they never were her husband's property, his only concern with the matter being that he aided her in selecting them, and took the money for her to pay for them. . . . It was a mere begging of the question for the defendant to argue that the plaintiff could not be a witness, because the furniture had been the property of the husband, and the wife must have acquired it by a contract with him. She denied that it ever was his property. She claimed that she bought it before marriage of Adams & North, when his assent to her purchase, and aid in it, would add nothing to her title, and formed no part of any contract. It was mere approval and acquiescence, not making him in any sense a party. If the defendant had shown that the title to the furniture was ever in Mr. Baxter, and that the plaintiff acquired it by a contract with him, it would have constituted a valid defense. But this must have been the result of the whole case, after all the evidence was heard, to be found by the jury, and was not to be assumed upon the mere suggestion of the defendant for the purpose of excluding evidence. We are of opinion that under the statute which regulates the competency of witnesses, the plaintiff's testimony was admissible as to the furniture, the part of her cause of action which was separable and distinct from the rest, and which was not derived from a contract another party to which was dead." Compare Fischer v. Morse, 9 Gray (Mass.) 440.

In an action for damages for wrongfully ejecting a passenger, the testimony of the plaintiff concerning the statement of the conductor who put him off the train and who was dead at the time of the trial has been held to be inadmissible under a statute which provided that no person should testify for himself concerning any verbal statement or transaction with a person since deceased. Anderson v. Louisville, etc. R. Co. 134 Ky. 343, 20 Ann. Cas. 920, 120 S. W. 298, 301.

A statute providing that "in all suits by or against heirs or devisees, founded upon a contract with or demand against the ancestor, to obtain title to or possession of property, real or personal, of, or in right of, such ancestor, or to affect the same in any manner, neither party to such suit shall be a competent witness as to any matter which occurred prior to the death of the ancestor," has been held not to apply to actions sounding in tort. It has accordingly been held that testimony of a widow concerning matters which occurred prior to her husband's death are admissible in a suit for damages for an injury which caused the husband's death, since the action is not founded on a contract or brought in the right of a decedent. Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Thompson, 107 Ind. 442, 8 N. E. 18, 9 N. E. 357, 57 Am. Rep. 120; Cincinnati, etc. R. Co. v. Cregor, 150 Ind. 625, 50 N. E. 760. The court in Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Thompson, supra, considering the statute said: "We said in our former opinion, that even if it were conceded that the widow of Andrew Eichler was not a competent witness, no material error was committed in permitting her to testify, and we still adhere to that view; but we are prepared to go further, and hold that she was a competent witness, for the statute does not apply to cases of tort resulting in the death of the husband. Neither section 498 nor section 499 of the code applies to a case like this, for the widow is not a party to the record, nor is her interest adverse to the estate, and the case is not one between heirs. The case is not 'founded on a contract with or demand against the ancestor,' or 'to obtain title to or possession of property, real or personal,' but is an action to recover damages for a tort causing the ancestor's death."

It has been held that in an action for damages for killing the plaintiff's husband the defendant might testify since there was no contract or cause of action to which the husband was a party. Entwhistle v. Feighner, 60 Mo. 214, wherein the court said: "In the present case there was no contract or cause of action to which the deceased husband was a party. The proviso in the statute was enacted for the purpose of putting parties on an equal footing, and not allowing a living party to give his version of a contract when he could not be confronted by the other party in consequence of death. When the husband was killed, then it was for the first time that the cause of action accrued to the plaintiff as his widow. Had the husband survived, this action never could have been brought. It is an action in which plaintiff and defendant only could be parties, for it did not arise till after the husband's death."

v.

CITY OF SOUTH HAVEN.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 23, 1915.

187 Mich. 294; 153 N. W. 827.

Municipal Corporations — Operation of Electric Lighting Plant — Competition with Citizen — Sale of Fixtures.

Under Const. art. 8, § 23, authorizing municipalities to own and operate public utilities for supplying water, heat, etc., and Comp. Laws 1897, §§ 3258, 3269, and 3270, authorizing municipalities to acquire and operate gas and electric light plants, a city which operates its own electric light plant is entitled to do all those things naturally connected with and belonging to the running of such a business, and so may sell, if necessary, light fixtures.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

A taxpayer is not entitled to have a city enjoined from engaging in selling electrical appliances as a part of its business of furnishing electric light, where it did not appear that any increase in taxation resulted or that money was misappropriated.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Van Buren county: DES VOIGNES, Judge.

Action by Albert E. Andrews, plaintiff, against City of South Haven, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Thomas J. Cavanaugh for appellant.
Fred C. Cogshall for appellee.

[295] STEELE, J.—This is an appeal to review a decree sustaining defendant's demurrer to complainant's bill, filed to restrain alleged ultra vires municipal trading, and dismissing the same.

In outline, the material facts disclosed by said bill are as follows: Complainant, who is a resident property owner and taxpayer of the city of South Haven, where he maintains a regular place of business, and is engaged in selling and installing electrical fixtures, bulbs, supplies, wiring, etc., and equips buildings to [296] use electrical current for lighting and other purposes, charges that defendant is engaged in like business in excess of its corporate authority, in competition with him, unlawfully using public funds for that purpose. Defendant is a city of the fourth class, organized, existing, and "doing business supposedly" under the Constitution of this State and Act No. 215, Pub. Acts 1895. There is in said city a private gas plant which supplies the community with gas for lighting purposes. The city owns and, through its board of public works, operates, a municipal lighting plant from which it supplies itself and inhabitants with electric lights. It keeps on hand, purchased with public money raised by taxation and transferred to a fund for that purpose, a stock of electrical fixtures and accessories similar to those dealt in by complainant, which it sells to its inhabitants, also furnishing to them, for hire, its regularly employed electricians to install wiring and electrical equipment in their private residences and places of business, advertising that it will perform such work, furnish and install fixtures, supply attachments, light bulbs, and all electrical accessories, for private individuals on their premises, in their private residences or places of business, substantially at cost. The bill further alleges that, as a result of the city thus engaging in competition with complainant, he is suffering, and will continue to suffer, irreparable loss and damage; charges that it is not essential or necessary for the city to engage in such business in order to supply its inhabitants with light, and that under the charter it has no authority to do so; therefore prays for an injunction restraining said municipality from "engaging in and carrying on the business aforesaid in the manner aforesaid, and from using the funds of the city raised by taxation for other purposes to buy supplies and keep them for sale and to pay the electricians for the purpose of disposing of their time to [297] private individuals for hire in the manner aforesaid, and from keeping and selling to private individuals wire, fixtures, bulbs, electrical supplies, or accessories in any amount or of any kind whatsoever."

The direct and only question raised by this bill and the demurrer to it is the right of the city, while operating its electric plant and supplying its inhabitants with current, to also in that connection do electrical wiring on their private premises and furnish fixtures and other accessories essential and convenient in using electricity.

The corporate power of a city to own and operate a municipal electric plant and supply its inhabitants at prescribed rates light, heat, and power is conferred by statute and the Constitution. In the act under which defendant was incorporated, authority to supply light is conferred, and by the Constitution, adopted later, heat and power are included as follows (section 23, art. 8):

"Subject to the provisions of this Constitution, any city or village may acquire, own and operate, either within or without its corporate limits, public utilities for supplying water, light, heat, power and transportation to the municipality and the inhabitants thereof."

The general act providing for incorporation of cities of the fourth class (chapter 88, 1 Comp. Laws), under which defendant was organized, contains various provisions upon the subject of municipal lighting. Section 3258 (2 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 5784) confers the power as follows:

"It shall be lawful for any city incorporated or reincorporated under the provisions of this act to acquire by purchase or to construct, operate and maintain, either independently or in connection with the water works of such city, either within or without the city, works for the purpose of supplying such city and the inhabitants thereof, or either, with gas, electric or [298] other lights at such times and on such terms and conditions as hereinafter provided."

By section 3266 (2 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 5792) authority is given the common council to enact such ordinances and adopt such resolutions as may be necessary to carry that object into effect, and to protect and control the property owned and used for that purpose. The act also provides for a board of public works with authority to fix rates, subject to direction of the council, charged, amongst other things, with the following "duty, power and responsibility" (section 3269 [2 How. Stat. (2d ed.) § 5795]):

"Second. The construction, management, supervision and control of such electric or other lighting plants as are or shall be owned by the city."

Section 3270 (2 How. Stat. [2d ed.] § 5796) provides:

"The said board shall have power to make and adopt all such by-laws, rules and regulations as they may deem necessary and expedient for the transaction of their business, not inconsistent with the ordinances of the city or the provisions of this act."

In this inquiry the governmental powers of a city, by which it regulates and controls its citizens in a sovereign capacity, are not involved. The question raised here relates only to the proprietary or business powers of the city, by means of which it may act and contract for its own private advantage and that of its inhabitants combined. In the exercise of the latter powers, the municipality, acting through its officers, is governed by the same rules which control a private individual or business corporation under like circumstances. Omaha Water Co. v. Omaha, 147 Fed. 1, 77 C. C. A. 267, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 736, 8 Ann. Cas. 614. In such case the fact that a city engaging in a certain line of activity, commercial in its nature, competes with and thereby damages [299] one of its inhabitants in his business, does not entitle him to relief, for the city owes him no immunity from competition.

The electric light plant which defendant owned and operated, although a municipal public utility, was a business concern or enterprise. In its operation and business management the city had the right and power to do those things naturally connected with and belonging to the running of such a business which a private corporation would have in the same connection. Pond on Public Utilities, § 8. The power to engage in this municipal business activity for the public welfare is necessarily conferred in general terms. To go into details of administration and specify each particular thing which could or could not be done would be unwise and practically impossible. As to details and methods of conducting such authorized business, involving exercise of special knowledge and business judgment, there must be many implied powers. A strict, illiberal, or narrow construction which might hamper the exercise of a reasonable discretion by the municipal authorities in such matters, because the power is given in few words, is not, with perhaps a few exceptions, the tendency of decisions in most jurisdictions. The courts as a rule are not disposed to interfere with the management of an authorized business, conducted by the municipal authorities presumably in the interest and for the benefit of the city and its inhabitants, unless dishonesty or fraud is manifest, or the vested power which its implied discretion has been clearly exceeded or grossly abused. In Torrent v. Muskegon, 47 Mich. 115, 10 N. W. 132, 41 Am. Rep. 715, Justice Campbell, in writing the opinion, foreshadowed the rule which, by the great weight of authority, is applied in construing general powers to a municipality to engage in certain modern business activities for the public welfare, saying in part:

[300] "If cities were new inventions, it might with some plausibility be claimed that the terms of their charters, as expressed, must be the literal and precise limits of their powers. . . . There are many flourishing cities whose charters are very short and simple documents. Our verbose charters, except in the limitations they impose upon municipal action, are not as judiciously framed as they might be, and create mischief by their prolixity. But if we should assume that there is nothing left to implication, we should find the longest of them too imperfect to make city action possible."

In Henderson v. Young, 119 Ky. 224, 83 S. W. 583, where the issue was the right of the city to furnish electricity for light and other purposes to customers beyond the city limits, it is said:

"In the management and operation of its electric plant, a city is not exercising its governmental or legislative powers, but its business powers, and may conduct it in the manner which promises the greatest benefit to the city and its inhabitants in the judgment of the city council; and it is not within the province of the court to interfere with the reasonable discretion of the council in such matters."

Little direct authority is to be found upon the exact question raised by the facts disclosed in complainant's bill. The two cases cited by counsel for complainant most favorable to his contention are Atty.-Gen. v. Leicester Corp. 74 J. P. (Eng.) 385, and Keen v. Waycross, 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42. The first-named involved the right of the "undertakers," representing the municipal corporation which was authorized to supply electrical current only at the consumer's terminals, to deal in and furnish wiring, electrical fittings, lamps, and other accessories. The court held they could not, basing its decision upon limitations found in the legislation and provisional order in connection therewith having the force of law, saying in part:

"I also think that there is nothing in the sections of [301] the act of 1847 inconsistent with the construction of 'supply' in the act of 1882 contended for by the plaintiff—namely, that it means the supply of energy to the consumer at his terminals. . . . When we turn to the provisional order, the interpretation, in my opinion, becomes still plainer, 'consumer's terminals' is there stated to mean 'the ends of the electric lines situate upon any consumer's premises and belonging to him at which the supply of energy is delivered from the service lines.' The undertakers have power to charge for supply of energy and for meters and fittings, but for furnishing and laying lines they have no power to charge except in special cases. By clause 21 of the provisional order, however, they are bound to give a supply of energy on demand, and, if the wiring of the house and provision of fittings is part of the supply, they would be compellable to do it without remuneration, and I think there is force in the plaintiff's argument that this cannot have been intended by the legislature. In my opinion, 'supply,' within the meaning of the act and order, is completed at the consumer's terminals."

While that opinion is upon the same subject as the instant case, the controlling reason for the decision has little application here. In that case distinct restrictions were placed upon the authority given the undertakers, or borough officials, by the wording of the act and provisional order, which defined and limited the scope of their action in express terms, the exact meaning of which was declared, to exclusion, as the court found, of the implied power claimed.

In Keen v. Waycross, supra, it was held that the city of Waycross did not have implied authority under its charter, which authorized the erection and maintenance of a system of waterworks and connecting the city's mains with pipes of water consumers, to engage in a general plumbing business, sell plumbing supplies and material to private citizens, and do contract work in placing the same upon their premises. By analogy, it can be said that certain of the reasons [302] stated in that opinion tend to support the construction contended for by complainant in this case. That opinion followed the rule of strict construction; it being said, in part:

"Unless the city of Waycross can show express legislative authority to engage in the business in which it has embarked, the acts of its officials of which the plaintiff complains are clearly ultra vires. We have no doubt that, under the act of 1889, upon which the city rests its defense, its board of commissioners have ample power to take such steps as are needful in order to render the waterworks system of the city efficient and beneficial to the public. (See Acts of 1889, p. 829.) But the position of the city that, to bring this result, it was necessary to engage in the plumbing business, is utterly untenable, because obviously not well founded in fact. It might as reasonably be urged that, in order to satisfy its patrons, it was necessary for the city to embark in the ice business, as an incident to its right to supply good drinking water to its citizens."

Subsequently, however, that court recognized embarking in the ice business as an incident to the right of a city to supply good drinking water to its citizens, in Holton v.

Camilla, 134 Ga. 560, 68 S. E. 472, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 116, 20 Ann. Cas. 199, where it was contended that the city had "no right to embark in a purely private and commercial business of manufacturing or dealing in a common commodity of commerce, such as ice; and therefore the use of public funds raised by taxation for that purpose will be illegal." While other questions not material here were involved in that case and discussed, the court in disposing of the above objections said, amongst other things:

"The object in bringing, by means of a waterworks system, water in pipes from a distance for use in supplying the needs of a city, is not alone to obtain a sufficient quantity, but also to secure that which is freer from impurities than it is possible to obtain in the city itself. . . . Upon what principle could the doctrine [303] rest that liquid water may be delivered by the city to its inhabitants by flowage through pipes, but that water in frozen blocks cannot be delivered by wagons or otherwise? If the city has the right to furnish its inhabitants with water in liquid form, we fail to see any reason why it cannot furnish it to them in a frozen condition. . . . Nor do we see any rational objection on the idea that the city will be engaging in a manufacturing enterprise. The city might perhaps equally as well be said to be manufacturing when by the use of a filtering process it changes impure water into that which is pure. When, in connection with its waterworks system, it produces ice, it merely, by certain processes, changes the form and temperature of a part of the water supplied by that system. We do not think the operation by the city of Camilla of an ice plant in connection with its waterworks system, for the purpose of furnishing ice to its inhabitants, is in violation of the sections of the Constitution referred to in the plaintiff's petition, or that it is illegal for any reason."

Water sent through pipes to a customer's residence or place of business is water delivered to him ready for use in its then condition. He may heat or cool it, drink or bathe in it, and make whatever use of it he desires. But electric current delivered to him at his residence or place of business as it is transmitted over the wires, in its then condition, neither affords him heat, power, or light without further mediums and appliances. The statute and Constitution do not in terms limit the service to supplying the energy, but authorize the city to supply its inhabitants with water, light, heat, power, and transportation. It may well be contended that furnishing to customers taking electricity the necessary devices or equipment to produce heat, power, or light from the current is naturally incidental to and an implied power connected with the business of operating an electric light plant. It does not appear that the municipality in so doing is conducting the business by different methods or under other rules [304] than those which are observed by and control private business corporations or private individuals in the operation of an electric plant.

The old law of municipal trading, involving the propriety and expediency of authorizing a municipality to engage in general business in competition with its citizens conducting a private business of like kind, has little bearing here; but the rule remains that taxation can only be for public purposes and municipalities have no express or implied power to engage generally in private business. We are past the general question of the validity of legislation authorizing municipal ownership and operation of plants and their necessary equipment to furnish the concentrated population of cities with certain general needs and conveniences, like water, light, heat, transportation, telephone service, etc.; and it is held that the court will not interfere with any reasonable exercise of the implied powers to operate such plants in a business way, and as any private corporation could or would.

The bill does not show that complainant has sustained or will suffer any loss or damage as a taxpayer by reason of what is charged. No increase of taxation for that purpose is shown. He does allege an improper use, in that connection, of money raised by taxation for that purpose, to buy the electrical appliances furnished customers at, approximately, cost. Whether this was as a whole profitable in operating the plant by reason of increased sale of electricity, or otherwise, is not shown. To entitle him to equitable relief as a taxpayer, present or prospective damages must be shown. Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208.

We conclude that the learned chancellor who first passed upon this demurrer correctly determined complainant's bill did not show that the defendant exceeded its implied discretionary power in the operation of this [305] plant, nor state a case which entitled him to equitable relief by injunction.

The decree sustaining said demurrer and dismissing complainant's bill is affirmed, but without costs.

Brooke, C. J., and Kuhn, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, and Moore, JJ., concurred.

The late Justice McAlvay took no part in this decision.

NOTE.Right of Municipality to Enter Into Business Competition with Citizen.

Business Other than Public Utility, 104.
Public Utility:

In Absence of Exclusive Private Franchise, 106.

After Grant of Exclusive Private Franchise, 112.

Right of Citizen to Injunctive Relief, 118.

Business Other than Public Utility.

The primary design of the creation of a municipal corporation is that it may perform certain public functions as a subordinate branch of government; and, while it is invested with full power to do everything incident to a proper discharge thereof, no right to do more can ever be implied. Accordingly, in the absence of express legislative sanction, such a corporation has no authority to engage in any independent business enterprise or occupation such as is usually pursued by private individuals. In other words, its legitimate duty is to deal with public affairs, and not those which are purely private and entirely unconnected with a proper administration of its governmental duties. Keen v. Waycross, 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42.

Thus in holding that a municipality may not engage in competition with private ice companies by entering into the business of manufacturing and selling ice, the court in Union Ice, etc. Co. v. Ruston, 135 La. 898, Ann. Cas. 1916C 1274, 66 So. 262, L.R.A. 1915B 859, said that the operation of the municipal ice scheme would be to make the street and other railroads, banks and other large taxpayers who were at the same time small consumers of ice pay in part for the ice to be furnished to the small taxpayers, as soda water stands, who were at the same time large consumers of ice, with the result that the pockets of the large taxpayers would be gone into by the town or city to enable it to drive out of business and destroy the existing ice companies. Compare Holton v. Camilla, 134 Ga. 560, 20 Ann. Cas. 199.

So a municipality may not engage in the plumbing business and sell supplies and materials to private citizens, and do contract work in placing the same on their premises, under a power conferred on the municipal authorities to do everything essential to the establishment and maintenance of the city's waterworks system, to provide for proper sanitation, and to promote the general success of the enterprise. Keen v. Waycross, 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42.

In the reported case, however, it is held that a municipality has the right, while operating an electric plant and supplying itself and its inhabitants with current, to do electrical wiring on private premises and to furnish fixtures and other accessories essential and convenient in using electricity, though its acts in so doing are in competition with a citizen and taxpayer engaged in selling and installing electrical fixtures, bulbs, supplies, wiring, etc., and in equipping buildings to use electrical current for lighting and other purposes.

In Atty.-Gen. v. Leicester [1910] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 359, 80 L. J. Ch. 21, 103 L. T. N. S. 214, [1910] W. N. 169, 74 J. P. 385, 26 Times L. Rep. 568, cited in the reported case, it was held that the installation of electricity and the providing of lamps and fittings was a separate business incidental to the use, but not to the supply, of electricity, and hence was not within the meaning of the word "supply" as used in the Electric Lighting Act, 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56, s. 10), and the provisional order of the board of trade thereunder, giving a municipal corporation, "the undertakers," for the supply of electricity within the area of their borough, general powers to do all such acts and things as might be necessary and incidental to such supply. The court held that "supply" meant the supply of electricity to the consumer at his terminals, i. e., the meter on his premises, at which point the powers of the municipality ceased. The question of competition, however, between the municipality and a citizen was not discussed. That decision was followed in Atty.-Gen. v. Sheffield, 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 367, 76 J. P. 185, 10 L. G. R. 301, [1912] W. N. 68, 56 Sol. J. 326, 28 Times L. Rep. 266. And to the same effect see Atty.-Gen. v. Ilford Urban Council, 84 L. J. Ch. (Eng.) 860, 13 L. G. R. 44.

With respect to the right of a municipality to buy coal and wood as fuel and to sell them to its citizens the decisions are somewhat in conflict. The conclusions reached in the cases discussing that power may be summarized as follows:

First. It is beyond the power of a municipal corporation to engage in the sale of commodities which are and can be easily conducted by private business concerns in competition with one another, and which can be sufficiently regulated thereby. Laughlin v. Portland, 111 Me. 486, Ann. Cas. 1916C 734, 90 Atl. 318, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1143; Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809; Opinion of Justices, 182 Mass. 605, 66 N. E. 25, 60 L.R.A. 592; Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208. See also In re Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 98 N. E. 611, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221.

Second. The sale of fuel falls within the class of commodities mentioned, and there is no necessity why cities and towns should undertake this form of business any more than many others which have always been conducted by private enterprises. Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809; Opinion of Justices, 182 Mass. 605, 66 N. E. 25, 60 L.R.A. 592; Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208. See also In re Opinion of Justices, 211 Mass. 624, 98 N. E. 611, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 221. Compare Laughlin v. Portland, 111 Me. 486, Ann. Cas. 1916C 734, 90 Atl. 318, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1143.

Third. In regard to "a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small and the difficulty of obtaining it so great, that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprises, it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not." Under such circumstances, the municipality may constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community. Laughlin v. Portland, 111 Me. 486, Ann. Cas. 1916C 734, 90 Atl. 318, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1143. Separate opinion of Barker, J., in Opinion of Justices, 155 Mass. 598, 30 N. E. 1142, 15 L.R.A. 809; Opinion of Justices, 182 Mass. 605, 66 N. E. 25, 60 L.R.A. 592.

In the case last cited it was said: "The fourth question presents greater difficulties. Evidently it is suggested by the painful experiences in attempting to procure fuel, from which we have lately been suffering. The questions are accompanied by copies of bills and resolves pending before the general court, one of which is entitled, 'An act to authorize cities and towns to buy and sell fuel in certain emergencies.' This question must be interpreted in reference to the conditions to which it refers, and in reference to the remedy which it suggests. The only proposed remedy to which it relates is the establishment by a city or town of fuel or coal yards, or the purchase of coal, wood or other fuel, for the purpose of selling it to the inhabitants of the city or town, or to others. The only condition referred to in the question is 'an extraordinary emergency,' and the conditions referred to in the accompanying bill are 'a scarcity of fuel and a pressing need thereof,' and 'a reasonable ground of belief that such a condition will occur in the near future.' It hardly can be contended that the remedy suggested by the question can have any effect upon the primary cause of all our troubles in this particular. That cause relates to sources of supply beyond the boundaries of this state. There is no reason to expect that any similar cause will arise within this state to affect such small sources of supply as exist here. If it is possible to conceive of the existence of such a cause arising hereafter in this commonwealth, it can be dealt with effectually, not by the establishment of municipal yards for the sale of fuel at retail, but by some different kind of legislation which will make it impossible for either of two parties to a controversy like that which lately existed in a neighboring state, to refuse all proposals for an equitable determination of the rights of the parties, and thus to bring both to the verge of ruin, and to imperil the industries, and to some extent the lives and health of communities far away from the neighborhood of the conflict. Looking to the possible consequences of the emergency for which a remedy is desired, they can be divided into four classes: First, an increase of the number of those who fall into distress and are in need of relief from the public authorities, because they have no means to buy fuel at a greatly increased price. Secondly, increased expenditure, to their serious detriment, by those who have the means to buy. Thirdly, a possibility of a famine in fuel, such as to make it impossible reasonably to supply the needs of the community for comfortable living. Fourthly, a scarcity falling short of a famine but so great as to create wide-spread and general distress in the community which cannot be met by private enterprise. The first of these possible consequences does not call for legislation. Cities and towns now have ample power to provide in any reasonable way for paupers, whether it be by furnishing out-door relief or by support in almshouses, and whether their need of relief is permanent or caused by a temporary condition. It is equally true that the second of these consequences does not justify taxation of those who do not have occasion to buy coal, for the benefit of those who do. The use of the money of taxpayers for such a purpose would not be a public use, but a use for the special pecuniary benefit of those who happen to be affected by the state of the coal market. The third possibility, that of an absolute famine in fuel because of the lack of a supply and the impossibility of obtaining a sufficient quantity reasonably to satisfy the needs of the community, would be a condition which would warrant the expenditure of the public money under appropriate legislation, if the legislature could discover a way through public agencies to supply the people. But it is difficult to see how the method referred to in the question could produce this result. If at any time there was an impossibility of obtaining supplies because the supplies were not here and could not be bought elsewhere, the opening of a city coal yard would furnish no relief. Such an establishment could not work a miracle of creation. In reference to an anticipated possible famine, the procurement and storage of a supply in time of plenty might be a remedy or an alleviation if the dread anticipation should become a reality, but the maintenance of a city fuel yard to conduct the business of buying and selling in a time of plenty, would have no tendency to avert a famine, or to relieve from its consequences if one should come. We are not called upon to consider whether the legislature would deem it advisable, if it has the power, to authorize cities and towns to build storehouses in which to keep large quantities of fuel in anticipation of a possible famine. In regard to the fourth of the possible consequences, a condition in which the supply of fuel would be so small, and the difficulty of obtaining it so great, that persons desiring to purchase it would be unable to supply themselves through private enterprise, it is conceivable that agencies of government might be able to obtain fuel when citizens generally could not. Under such circumstances we are of opinion that the government might constitute itself an agent for the relief of the community, and that money expended for the purpose would be expended for a public use. We do not think that we are expected to determine whether there might be any other conceivable emergency which would call for an affirmative answer to this question. Considering the question only in reference to the accompanying bills and the conditions to which we suppose it relates, our answer is in the negative, except in reference to the fourth of the above-mentioned possible consequences. As to that, we are of opinion that if the supposed conditions exist in any city or town, it may be authorized, under proper legislation, to sell fuel with the limitations above stated, so long as these conditions continue."

In England it has been held that the invasion by a municipal corporation engaged in supplying gas or water and restricted to certain limits, into another township supplied with the same commodities by a private company, and the entering into competition with it, inflicts no private wrong by the transgression of those limits which entitles the private company to an injunction. Stockport Dist. Waterworks Co. v. Manchester, 9 Jur. N. S. 266, 7 L. T. N. S. 545, 11 W. R. 156; Pudsey Coal Gas Co. v. Bradford, L. R. 15 Eq. 167, 28 L. T. N. S. 11, 21 W. R. 286.

Where it appeared that the provisions of a city charter, with the general statutes, gave the municipal authorities, as incident to the city's ownership of the property, the lawful right to let or use the auditorium of the city hall for theaters, operas, concerts, lectures, dances, shows, or other entertainments, for profit or otherwise, it was held that there was no ground for holding that a person might nevertheless restrain its lawful use for those purposes merely because it lessened the profits which otherwise would accrue to him by the letting and use of his own hall for similar purposes. The court held that if such a person was in fact injured by such diminution of customers, the injury was necessarily too remote and inconsequential to be the basis of an action, and hence was damnum absque injuria. Stone v. Oconomowoc, 71 Wis. 155, 36 N. W. 829.

The general power of a municipality to engage in various phases of business activity, without reference to the element of competition, is discussed in the following cases and the notes thereto:

—furnishing fuel, Laughlin v. Portland, Ann. Cas. 1916C 734;

—furnishing ice, Holton v. Camilla, 20 Ann. Cas. 199; Union Ice, etc. Co. v. Ruston, Ann. Cas. 1916C 1274;

Public Utility.

IN ABSENCE OF EXCLUSIVE PRIVATE FRANCHISE.

The general power of a municipality to own or operate a public utility is not within the scope of the present discussion. Since a franchise is ordinarily necessary to the operation of a public utility within a municipality, the question of competition resolves itself into that of the right to enter into competition with an individual or corporation to whom a franchise to use the streets of the municipality for the purpose of rendering the same public service has previously been granted.

The granting of a franchise to a public service company for the establishment and maintenance of its plant on certain terms and conditions for a period of years, by a state or some municipality thereof, without any express or necessarily implied grant of exclusive rights or privileges, as an express stipulation that the franchise should be exclusive or that the city would not establish such a plant of its own, does not deprive a municipality of the right to erect and operate its own works for the same purpose and engage in the same public service within the city during the contractual term. And this is true, although it may thereby injure or practically destroy the business of the grantee of the franchise. The decisions so holding stand on the rule that, in a contract with a state or municipality conferring a power or privilege on a private corporation affecting the general rights and interests of the public, the grant or privilege must be clearly conferred, all implications, doubts and ambiguities being resolved against the grant or privilege claimed.

In North Springs Water Co. v. Tacoma, 21 Wash. 517, 58 Pac. 773, 47 L.R.A. 214, the court said: "Appellant maintains that the operation of the city's water system within the district that appellant has been supplying will injure, and may destroy, the value of its property, and that the franchisees under which it is operating are contracts made with the city and that the city, by its intended extension of its own water system, will become a competitor of appellant, and that such competition is a violation of the contract contained in the franchises granted by the city; and it invokes the protection of the state constitution and of the Federal Constitution (§ 10, art. 1, and § 1, art. 14, of amendments). . . . It is conceded by the learned counsel for appellant that the city was without power to grant any exclusive franchise to appellant; that, after appellant received its franchise, the same rights and privileges could be granted to any other person or private corporation. Indeed, it appears from the record that at the time appellant's grantor, Mullen, obtained the franchise to supply water in the certain district mentioned and in the city, a franchise to supply water and light to the city had theretofore been granted to the Tacoma Light & Water Company. Thus, at any rate, it was understood by all parties when Mullen obtained his franchise, that he might meet the competition of other private water companies. The power granted to the city under the Act of February 4, 1886, was to purchase or condemn waterworks or gas works within the corporate limits for public use; and subdivisions 7 and 8 of § 48 also authorized the city by ordinance to erect and maintain waterworks, or to authorize the erection of the same, for the purpose of furnishing the city with a sufficient supply of water. . . . It is contended with much earnestness by counsel for the appellant that the grant to the city was to construct waterworks, or to authorize the construction of the same by others; that it was empowered to pursue either method in obtaining waterworks, and that the grant was in the alternative. Both methods, however, could not be employed at the same time. . . . While it is true that supplying water to the inhabitants of the city and to itself does not originate in an exercise of the ordinary police powers of a municipal corporation, yet in this state, since the territorial organization, and it may be also said that generally in this country, municipal charters very generally confer this power upon cities. The respondent city was authorized, under its charter of 1886, to supply itself and its inhabitants with pure, fresh water. In the exercise of this power it could exercise a choice of modes. It could purchase or condemn any existing system, or it could grant the right to any person or corporation to lay mains and pipes and furnish water, or it could erect a system itself. There does not seem to be any prescription in its charter of the method, and there is no cogent implication that the city is restricted to any specific method in its power to build and operate waterworks. It would seem, therefore, that the city council could not absolutely bind the city in the future so that it could not exercise one of its specifically granted powers under its charter; and the well-known and accepted rule, that in grants of this character doubts must be resolved in favor of the public, requires more than mere negation to infer that the council has attempted to estop the city from the fair exercise of such granted power. The familiar rule that a privilege creating a monopoly cannot be given without the grant from the sovereign, the legislature, has been extended in this state, and that power taken from the legislature by the constitution; and § 8 of article 1 of the constitution . . . is also pertinent in considering the general policy of the state. We do not think the grant of the power to construct, or authorize others to construct, works to supply water to a city and its inhabitants, is in the alternative; but the original grant authorized it to provide water for the city, without limitation of the manner in which it may be done. . . . So, if it be conceded that the respondent city was authorized by the terms of its charter to make a contract that it would not itself supply water to the inhabitants in the limited district where the appellant's mains and pipes were placed, it did not make such agreement. There are no words of exclusion in the privilege granted appellant by the ordinance. There are no words of limitation upon the right of the city. There apparently is no plain inference that can be raised from the ordinance that such was the intention of the parties. If such intention existed, it would doubtless have been expressed in the contract. . . . As before observed, the city of Tacoma, in the ordinance which conferred the franchise upon appellant, did not expressly or by necessary implication agree not to erect its own waterworks, and the circumstances surrounding the parties at the time were not such as to impel the inference that such contract was in contemplation by them."

In Thomson Houston Electric Light Co. v. Newton, 42 Fed. 723, it was said: "The theory of the complainant is that under this statute the city had the option given it in regard to electric plants, and that it could originally have erected the same by vote of the people, but, having elected to authorize private parties so to do, it is estopped from afterwards entering the field as a competitor; that while the complainant has not an exclusive right under its agreement with the city, and cannot object to the city authorizing other private companies or persons to erect and maintain electric plants in the city, yet complainant has the right to enjoin the city from undertaking the work, because the city can, through the exercise of its taxing power over the property in the city, including that owned by complainant, raise money for the running of the plant, instead of being compelled to provide the same by charging for the use of the light, and thus the city can practically drive complainant out of the field, and destroy the value of its plant, which was erected in the city by an agreement with the municipal authorities. There is great force in the suggestion thus made. It is doubtless true that, if the city enters the field by the erection of its own plant, it will have an advantage over the complainant; yet it does not follow that the court can interpose and restrain the city from erecting the contemplated plant. As already stated, the city did not grant any exclusive rights to complainant; and the latter, when it erected its plant, took the chance as to future competition. All that is now shown is that the city proposes to erect an electric plant, and to raise the money for so doing by the issuance of bonds in the sum of $14,000. The statute confers the right so to do upon the city, and I can see no ground justifying the court in interposing by injunction, and preventing the city from establishing its proposed plant. The suggestion that the city may use its taxing power so as to prevent complainant from fair competition on its part is a suggestion only, and not the averment of a fact. The city may establish such rates for the lights furnished by it as to enable the complainant to fairly compete therewith. If it cannot do so, and the city can supply its citizens at a lower rate, are not the latter entitled to the benefit thereof? It is entirely possible that the proposed action of the city may cause loss to the complainant. But there is no ground justifying action by the court short of holding that, by the mere action of the city in authorizing the complainant to establish its plant without any grant of exclusive rights, the city thereby deprived itself of the right to erect an electric plant for the benefit of its citizens; and this extreme ground I am not prepared to take."

In Tillamook Water Co. v. Tillamook City, 139 Fed. 405, affirmed 150 Fed. 117, 80 C. C. A. 71, it was said: "In brief, the contract in the present case provides for no exclusive right in the complainant to supply water to the city and its inhabitants. It contains no covenant by the city that it will not erect waterworks of its own, or that it will abstain from granting such right to a competing company during the life of the contract; and the fact that the contract contains a covenant that the water company shall furnish water to the inhabitants of the city of Tillamook for a fixed period of time does not by implication restrain the city from erecting waterworks of its own."

In Washington-Oregon Corp. v. Chehalis, 202 Fed. 591, it appeared that the language of the franchise, which it was contended was exclusive, was as follows: "The city of Chehalis . . . hereby agrees that this ordinance and franchise and the rights contained and granted thereby . . . shall continue in full force for a period of thirty years, . . . during which time the city of Chehalis agrees not to contract with any other person or persons, corporation or corporations, for a supply of water." The court held that the city had not, by the franchise in question, precluded itself from erecting a water system of its own during the life of the franchise.

In Thomas v. Grand Junction, 13 Colo. App. 80, 56 Pac. 665, the court said: "By constructing waterworks of its own, a city may become its competitor in the sale of water to the citizens, but the city did not undertake, either in terms or by legal implication, to in any manner protect it from competition in this respect. The holder of the franchise would have the same objection if the city, instead of building its own works, granted another franchise to another individual or company, and plaintiff's counsel concede that this might be done. The city by its construction does not destroy the franchise of the company. It might and probably would impair its value, but of course the company could not complain, because the city had not by its contract bound itself to protect it from competition, nor precluded itself from the exercise of its right of construction."

In Glenwood Springs v. Glenwood Light, etc. Co. 202 Fed. 678, 121 C. C. A. 88, L.R.A. 1915C 438, the facts on which the company based its claim that the city was precluded from constructing and operating a system of waterworks to supply its inhabitants with water in competition with the system of the company were as follows: The contract contained a grant by the city of a legal franchise to furnish water in the town for all purposes, for the purpose of supplying the town of Glenwood Springs and its inhabitants with water for fire, domestic and other purposes, a grant of the right to lay its mains and pipes in the streets and alleys of the town, a grant of an exclusive right to furnish the town with water from fire hydrants for fire purposes, flushing sewers and supplying water for sprinkling streets from sprinkling carts, an agreement that the town would not take water from hydrants or water for any public purpose furnished by any person or persons other than the grantees of the franchise, an agreement by the town to pay the grantees specified prices for the use of a certain number of fire hydrants and to protect by proper ordinances the grantees in their use of the streets, alleys, and public places of the town in the construction and use of their buildings, mains, pipes, and waterworks and in the collection of their water rates. The court said, in denying the contention: "The argument is that by virtue of the provisions of the contract of 1887 which have been recited, and which by the extension agreement of 1905 remain in force until 1927, the city cannot, without the impairment of the obligation of its agreement, construct and operate waterworks of its own, and thereby compete with the company, that its competition would be more effective than that of private parties and might be destructive, and that, as it has the power of taxation, it may compel the company to contribute toward the expense of the construction and operation of a town plant that might destroy its property. When, however, all is said and considered, the real question is, What is the contract between these parties? If the contract is that during its continuance the town will not construct and operate a system of waterworks in competition with that of the company then the construction and operation of such a system would work an impairment of the obligation of its agreement. If, on the other hand, the contract is limited to a grant of the franchise to construct and operate a system of waterworks to supply the town and its inhabitants with water, to a grant of the use of the streets and alleys for this purpose, and to an exclusive right to furnish to the town at fixed rates all the water it shall use during the life of the contract for public purposes, such as the extinguishment of fires, the flushing of sewers and the sprinkling of the streets, the construction and operation of waterworks by the town to supply its inhabitants with water would be neither a violation of its agreement nor an impairment of the obligation thereof. Counsel for the company concede that the contract is not exclusive; that notwithstanding its provisions the town may lawfully grant to third persons the right to build and operate waterworks to supply the inhabitants with water in competition with the system of the company. In the absence of an express and clear stipulation to that effect, and the contract contains none, it is difficult to conceive that the parties to this agreement intended to exclude the town when they did not exclude others. They inserted in the agreement a plain provision that the town would take and pay for water from the hydrants of the grantees and that it would not take water for public purposes from any other party. But they inserted no stipulation that the town would not construct and operate a system of waterworks to supply its inhabitants with water in competition with the system of the grantees, and the logical inference is that they intended to make no such agreement. The exclusion of the grantor from the right to compete with the grantee does not inhere in a quasi municipal grant or contract unless it is clearly stipulated therein or necessarily implied therefrom, and in this grant it is neither and the town is not precluded thereby from constructing and operating a system of waterworks in competition with the company for the purpose of supplying its inhabitants with water."

In Memphis Electric Light, etc. Co. v. Memphis (Mo.) 196 S. W. 1113, the court said: "The franchise involved in this case expressly provides that it is not to be construed as exclusive. It contains no language expressly prohibiting the city from exercising its power to construct and operate a lighting plant during the franchise term. It simply grants to appellant the right to operate its plant during twenty years. Had appellant desired to exclude the city from competition with it, assuming the city is empowered to contract to abstain from such competition, it should have sought a franchise plainly effecting that result. The contract it secured does not do so, and, whatever the effect upon appellant may be of competition with a municipal plant, we cannot now add to the franchise stipulations the parties did not insert when they framed it."

In State v. Hamilton, 47 Ohio St. 52, 23 N. E. 935, it was said: "The only material question in this case is whether, upon the facts as above stated, the city of Hamilton has corporate power to erect its own gas works for the purpose of furnishing the public lighting to the city. . . . Section 2480 provides that, if gas companies when required by the council to lay pipes and light streets, alleys, public grounds or buildings, refuse or neglect for six months after being notified by the authority of the council, to comply with such requirement, the council may lay pipes and erect gas works for lighting such streets, alleys, or public grounds, and all other streets, alleys, and public grounds not already lighted; and such companies shall thereafter be precluded from using or occupying any of the streets, alleys, public grounds or buildings not already furnished with gas pipes of such companies. Section 2482 provides that, a neglect to furnish gas to the citizens, and other consumers of gas, or to the corporation, by any company, in accordance with the prices fixed and established by the council, from time to time, shall forfeit all rights of such company under the charter of which it was established; and the council may proceed to erect, or by ordinance empower any person to erect, gas works for the supply of gas to such corporation and its citizens. . . . Section 2486 enacts that, "The council of any city or village shall have power, whenever it may be deemed expedient and for the public good, to erect gas works at the expense of the corporation, or to purchase any gas works already erected therein." . . . It is urged in behalf of the Hamilton Gaslight Company, that the legislature has declared in sections 2480 and 2482 certain conditions under which the council may build gas works, and that in the absence of those conditions the city has not such power while there are gas works in the municipality that have complied with all the provisions of the law, and met all the demands made upon them. Such an expression of the legislature will, it is said, exclude the right of a city to erect gas works under any other circumstances. Those two sections designate what refusal or neglect on the part of gas companies to meet the requirements of the law would work a forfeiture of their rights under their charter, and authorize the council to lay pipes, and erect gas works, and exclude a gas company already in operation from occupying any streets not already furnished with gas pipes of such companies; but such authority is very different from the general power conferred upon the council by section 2486, to construct gas works without reference to the manner in which an existing company may use its franchise. Section 2486, in plain language, gives the power to the council, either to erect gas works or to purchase such works already erected. The authority granted is not coupled with any condition or contingency, but is to be exercised when the council may deem it expedient and for the public good. The language is free from ambiguity. The discretionary power would hardly seem consistent with the limitation sought to be imposed, that the council can build gas works only where there are no gas works in the municipality; or where gas companies already organized, refuse or neglect to comply with the requirements of the law as to lighting or laying pipes, or neglect to furnish gas to citizens. The interest of the city may demand that a gas company established and doing business, although complying with all statutes and ordinances, should not continue to enjoy exclusive possession of the field of operation. And it may be deemed expedient, and for the public good, to discourage the growth of a monopoly, by the city's erecting its own gas works, or encouraging the incorporation of a competing company. Certainly, it would not be a doubtful public policy to place the city on an independent basis, by clothing it with the power of building its own gas works if an emergency should arise, although there might be a company within the municipality, which fully discharged all its corporate duties. Indeed, the provision in section 2485, rendering it unlawful to give or continue to any gas company the exclusive privilege of using the streets, would seem designed not merely to prevent the sole occupation of the streets by one company as against another, but also to secure to the municipality the use of the streets, should it conclude to avail itself of the right, granted by the following section, of erecting gas works. It is conceded that a municipality within which a gas company has been already formed, may, by a vote of its citizens and by ordinance, authorize the operation of another gas company within its borders. Rev. Stats. section 3551. The municipality may also purchase the gas works of the newly organized company. But it is contended that if two such companies exist at the same time, in the same municipality, and occupying the same territory, the municipal authorities though purchasing could not operate the works of one in opposition to the other; that after such purchase, the law will not permit the city to use its own property for the purpose of lighting its streets for the public safety and convenience, unless it either buys out the other company, or the other company goes out of existence, or fails to discharge its statutory duty. The statute, it is evident, is not susceptible of such an interpretation, nor has the legislature, in our judgment, hampered by such limitations and conditions, the right of a city to purchase and operate the works of one of two competing gas companies within its borders. And if it may own and use without restriction the plant of one such company, it may well be inquired, why may not the city, so far as the other company is concerned, be authorized to erect its own gas works, whenever it may be deemed expedient and for the public good. In its present form, section 2486 was passed many years after the two sections which are reproduced in section 2480 and section 2482. Between the earlier and later statutory provisions we discover no repugnancy, and the canons of statutory construction do not require that either should prevail over the other. The authority given to municipalities by the later section, is distinct from and independent of the power granted by the two antecedent sections."

The foregoing decision was followed in Hamilton Gaslight, etc. Co. v. Hamilton, 146 U. S. 258, 13 S. Ct. 90, 36 U. S. (L. ed.) 963, affirming 37 Fed. 832.

AFTER GRANT OF EXCLUSIVE PRIVATE FRANCHISE.

Where a municipality has the power to exclude itself during the term of a contract from competition with a public service company and has granted in an ordinance, and the company has accepted, an exclusive right of furnishing a public utility to the city and its inhabitants, or the municipality has bound itself not to erect, maintain or become interested in any other system whereby that utility is to be furnished, it will be restrained from directly or indirectly impairing or destroying the value of the franchise by entering into competition with its grantee during the continuance of that contract by the establishment of a system or plant of its own. Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 1, 19 S. Ct. 77, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 341, affirming 60 Fed. 957; Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. 202 U. S. 453, 6 Ann. Cas. 253, 26 S. Ct. 660, 50 U. S. (L. ed.) 1102. See also Vicksburg v. Henson, 231 U. S. 259, 34 S. Ct. 95, 58 U. S. (L. ed.) 209, reversing 203 Fed. 1023, 121 C. C. A. 664.

In Vicksburg v. Vicksburg Waterworks Co. supra, the court said: "The suit was brought by the Waterworks Company, claiming an exclusive right as against the city under a contract with it for the construction and maintenance for a period of thirty years of a system of waterworks, which exclusive contract, it was alleged, would be practically destroyed if subjected to the competition of a system of waterworks to be erected by the city itself, which was in contemplation under authority of an act of the legislature of Mississippi. . . . We shall proceed to consider whether the language of the contract is such as to prevent the city, during the period named therein, from erecting a waterworks of its own. . . . Without resorting to implication or inserting anything by way of intentment into this contract, it undertakes to give by its terms to Bullock & Company, their associates, successors and assigns, the exclusive right to erect, maintain and operate waterworks, for a definite term, to supply water for public and private use. These are the words of the contract and the question upon this branch of the case is, conceding the power of the city to exclude itself from competition with the grantee of these privileges during the period named, has it done so by the express terms used? It has contracted with the company in language which is unmistakable, that the rights and privileges named and granted shall be exclusive. Consistently with this grant, can the city submit the grantee to what may be the ruinous competition of a system of waterworks to be owned and managed by the city, to supply the needs, public and private, covered in the grant of privileges to the grantee? It needs no argument to demonstrate, as was pointed out in the Walla Walla case, that the competition of the city may be far more destructive than that of a private company. The city may conduct the business without regard to the profit to be gained, as it may resort to public taxation to make up for losses. A private company would be compelled to meet the grantee upon different terms and would not likely conduct the business unless it could be made profitable. We cannot conceive how the right can be exclusive, and the city have the right at the same time to erect and maintain a system of waterworks, which may and probably would practically destroy the value of rights and privileges conferred in its grant. If the right is to be exclusive, as the city has contracted that it shall be, it cannot at the same time be shared with another, particularly so when such division of occupation is against the will of the one entitled to exercise the rights alone. It is difficult to conceive of words more apt to express the purpose that the company shall have the undivided occupancy of the field so far as the other contracting party is concerned. The term 'exclusive' is so plain that little additional light can be gained by resort to the lexicons. If we turn to the Century Dictionary we find it defined to mean 'Appertaining to the subject alone; not including, admitting or pertaining to any other or others; undivided; sole; as, an exclusive right or privilege; exclusive jurisdiction.' We think, therefore, it requires no resort to implication or intentment in order to give a construction to this phase of the contract; but, on the other hand, the city has provided and the company has accepted a grant which says in plain and apt words that it shall have an exclusive right, a sole and undivided privilege. To hold otherwise in our view would do violence to the plain words of the contract, and permit one of the contracting parties to destroy and defeat the enjoyment of a right which has been granted in plain and unmistakable terms. On the authority of the Walla Walla case, the city had the power to exclude itself for the term of this contract, giving the words used only the weight to which they are entitled, without strained or unusual construction, and we think it was distinctly agreed that for the term named the right of furnishing water to the inhabitants of Vicksburg under the terms of the ordinance was vested solely in the grantee, so far at least as the city's right to compete is concerned. Any other construction seems to us to ignore the language employed and to permit one of the parties to the contract to destroy its benefit to the other. We think the court below did not err in reaching this conclusion."

In Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co. 172 U. S. 1, 19 S. Ct. 77, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 341, affirming 60 Fed. 957, it was said: "Nor do we think the contract objectionable in its stipulation that the city would not erect waterworks of its own during the life of the contract. There was no attempt made to create a monopoly by granting an exclusive right to this company, and the agreement that the city would not erect waterworks of its own was accompanied, in section 8 of the contract, with a reservation of a right to take, condemn and pay for the waterworks of the company at any time during the existence of the contract. Taking sections 7 and 8 together, they amount simply to this: That if the city should desire to establish waterworks of its own it would do so by condemning the property of the company and making such changes in its plant or such additions thereto as it might deem desirable for the better supply of its inhabitants; but that it would not enter into a direct competition with the company during the life of the contract. As such competition would be almost necessarily ruinous to the company, it was little more than an agreement that the city would carry out the contract in good faith. An agreement of this kind was a natural incident to the main purpose of the contract, to the power given to the city by its charter to provide a sufficient supply of water, and to grant the right to use the streets of the city for the purpose of laying water pipes to any persons or association of persons for a term not exceeding twenty-five years. In establishing a system of waterworks the company would necessarily incur a large expense in the construction of the power house and the laying of its pipes through the streets, and, as the life of the contract was limited to twenty-five years, it would naturally desire to protect itself from competition as far as possible, and would have a right to expect that at least the city would not itself enter into such competition. It is not to be supposed that the company would have entered upon this large undertaking in view of the possibility that, in one of the sudden changes of public opinion to which all municipalities are more or less subject, the city might resolve to enter the field itself—a field in which it undoubtedly would have become the master—and practically extinguish the rights it had already granted to the company."

Although the general rule is that unless the municipality has excluded itself in plain and explicit terms from competition with a waterworks or other company during the period of the contract, it cannot be held to have done so by mere implication (see the preceding subdivision of this note), it has been held in two instances that, where the contract did not in terms express an agreement that the city would not, during the life of the contract, erect its own system for the purpose of supplying its inhabitants with water, it could not be doubted that such was the fair implication and reasonable intendment of the contract. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, etc. Co. v. Dawson, 130 Fed. 152, reversed on other grounds, 197 U. S. 178, 25 S. Ct. 420, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 713; Mercantile Trust, etc. Co. v. Columbus Waterworks Co. 130 Fed. 180. In the case first cited the court said: "The city, having induced the expenditure of money on faith of the promise that it would grant the exclusive use of the streets for the laying of pipes and mains by the water company, and having contracted to pay for the use of water for fire protection for a term of years, will not be permitted, in equity, to disregard its agreements by itself entering into ruinous competition with the other party before the expiration of the contractual term."

It is well settled that under the Pennsylvania statutes giving municipalities the power to adopt either of two methods for the supply of water, i. e., to build their own works, or to contract with a private corporation for the same purpose, if a municipality adopts the method of contracting with a private company, it exhausts its power on that subject, and hence cannot build a plant of its own and enter into competition with the company. White v. Meadville, 177 Pa. St. 643, 35 Atl. 695, 34 L.R.A. 567, overruling In re Milvale, 162 Pa. St. 374, 29 Atl. 641, 644; Metzger v. Beaver Falls, 178 Pa. St. 1, 35 Atl. 1134; *Wilson v. burg, 226 Pa. St. 624, 75 Atl. 945; Mellon v. Pittsburgh, 227 Pa. St. 7, 75 Atl. 956. Compare Centre Hall Water Co. v. Centre Hall, 186 Pa. St. 74, 40 Atl. 153 (no contract); Boyertown Water Co. v. Boyertown, 200 Pa. St. 394, 50 Atl. 189 (no contract); Phillipsburg Water Co. v. Phillipsburg, 203 Pa. St. 562, 53 Atl. 347 (exclusive privilege lost by company); Hastings Water Co. v. St. 148, 79 Atl. 402 (no contract); Bethlehem City Water Co. v. Bethlehem, 231 Pa. St. 454, 80 Atl. 984 (no contract). The reason of the rule was well stated in Welsh v. Beaver Falls, 186 Pa. St. 578, 40 Atl. 784, wherein it was said that where a contract is made with a private water company, authorized usually only to build its works and maintain its plant at one place, it would be grossly inequitable to hold that the municipality, after inviting the construction of such works, and contracting with the company for the water supply, could at any time thereafter destroy them, by constructing its own works, in the absence of an explicit statutory right. In Pennsylvania Water Co. v. Pittsburgh, 226 Pa. St. 624, 75 Atl. 945, the court said: "The whole effort of the appellant is to distinguish the present case from the Meadville case because of a single fact which appeared in the latter but does not appear in this. In the Meadville case the water company was incorporated under the original Act of April 29, 1874, which conferred upon such companies the exclusive right to provide water within the district for which they were chartered. Here the water company was incorporated subsequent to the amendment of June 2, 1887, P. L. 310, which denies such exclusive privilege to companies thereafter incorporated. The doctrine of the Meadville case needs no other vindication or exposition than is to be found in the opinion. All that is required here is a simple restatement of what the case does decide. In that as in every case the power of the municipality to provide a supply of water rested in express legislative grant. It was the extent of this grant, and what limitations, if any, were imposed on its exercise, that were the questions under consideration. The case decided that the grant left it optional with the municipality to provide water in one of two ways, either by constructing a water system of its own, or through an independent agency; that it could not employ both methods at the same time, and that when it had provided a water supply by contract with an independent agent, it was without power to employ the alternative method, so long as the right of the independent agent to supply the water continued and was being rightfully exercised. This was the whole of the decision; and it was made to rest fundamentally and exclusively on the ground that the municipality having once provided a supply of water for its inhabitants by one of the methods, the power granted it was exhausted. The decision puts no limitation whatever on the contracting power of the municipality where it has elected to get its water supply through an independent company; nor does it confine the municipality to that particular method for any longer period than during the existence of the contract between it and the independent agent. Where it does so contract the terms of the contract are for the municipality to define. It may, as was the case here, grant to the water company the privileges of the public streets for an indefinite term, in which case, the privilege continues so long as the company furnishes an adequate and suitable supply, or it may contract for a long or a short term as it prefers, and repeat the process as often as occasion requires. With the expiration of the term fixed by the contract the power of choice between methods revives, and the municipality becomes free as ever to adopt thereafter the method it formerly rejected. Now when the ground of the decision—viz., the exhaustion of power in the municipality, that is, the exhaustion of privilege of choice between methods,—is considered, what room can there be for supposing that it is authority only in cases where the company contracted with has under the law an exclusive privilege? Does not exhaustion result just as certainly where the contract for the supply is with a company not having an exclusive privilege as where it is with one having an exclusive privilege? Exhaustion follows when the object has been accomplished, no matter what the privileges of the agent employed to accomplish it. Any such distinction as is here insisted upon between companies, in this particular connection, would be arbitrary in the extreme, without any justification whatever in reason. Certainly no warrant can be found for it in the Meadville case. Not only so, but at best the distinction is most unsubstantial, when considered as affecting the rights of the municipality. It goes no deeper than this; in the one case the exclusive privilege is derived from express legislative grant; in the other, like exclusiveness necessarily results, against the municipality, for the reason that the latter having made its contract with the company for a water supply through it, has exhausted all the power it had for the time being to employ the other method; not that having contracted with one company, it may not give to another company the right to enter upon the streets and lay pipe; but it may not, whether there be one or several companies supplying the inhabitants with water, build waterworks of its own to compete with the companies which entered with its consent. . . . Again, the exclusive privilege, as against the municipality, in any water company having a contract with the municipality, we think necessarily results from quite other considerations as well. Take the present case: The Pennsylvania Water Company by ordinance was given the right to enter upon the streets of the borough with its mains and pipes for the purpose of supplying the inhabitants with water; it did so enter, and at a great cost to itself supplied and placed in position the necessary equipment, and has continued to meet every requirement of its contract with regard to the supply. It will not be pretended that the borough, if it still had a separate existence, could recall the franchise which it gave the company before its expiration, or that it could interfere with the company's mains and pipes in any such way as would prevent the company from furnishing a supply of water to all who desired it. Suppose, however, it were allowed to build and employ waterworks of its own, what would be the result? Competition? No, not competition—which would be bad under any condition as a gross perversion of municipal function—but absolute and total destruction of the company's property, as complete as would result from a forcible tearing up of the mains and pipes and casting them aside. We can do no better in this connection than repeat what was said by Mr. Justice Dean in the Meadville case, page 61: 'If anything be manifest, it is, that if two water mains be laid side by side on the same street, equally accessible to the householder on each side, conveying double the quantity needed, with double sets of hydrants, pumping stations, offices, salaries and expenses, one or the other must be abandoned. No community will pay double for any article of necessity or luxury. If the property holder must, by compulsory taxation, support the municipal system, he will not voluntarily support the private corporation system; such a conflict of interests will inevitably bankrupt the system which depends on the voluntary patronage of the public. We hesitate to assume, every court is bound to hesitate long before assuming, the legislature intends by grants to distinct corporations for public purposes, there shall arise such conflict in the exercise of the franchises as will result in practical destruction of property of any citizen without compensation. It is a cardinal rule of construction between older and younger grants of franchises, the sovereign does not intend the younger shall infringe on the older; but to assume these franchises can be in existence and in operation at the same time, is to assume the commonwealth has granted precisely the same thing to the municipality that it had already granted to the water company; for in a business view, the contemporaneous exercise of the franchise is impossible.' It is clear, that except as a contract with a water company for a water supply gives an exclusive right, as against the municipality, this must result—while the municipality may not violently tear from its place the property of the company and so deprive the company of its rights, it must be allowed to accomplish by indirection a result equally destructive and disastrous. The law will not aid in the accomplishment of any such end. For the reasons above given we think the distinction pressed upon our attention is unsubstantial and therefore unimportant." To the same effect see Mellon v. Pittsburgh, 227 Pa. St. 7, 75 Atl. 956.

Where a city has no power to grant a perpetual exclusive franchise to a water company for the privilege of laying water pipes for public use beneath the surface of the highways of the city, the word "exclusive," used in the contract, does not have the effect of an agreement on the part of the city not to construct and maintain a system of waterworks in competition with the water company. Sioux Falls v. Farmers' Loan, etc. Co. 136 Fed. 721, 69 C. C. A. 373, reversing 131 Fed. 890; Rogers Park Water Co. v. Chicago, 131 Ill. App. 35. See also Westerly Waterworks v. Westerly, 75 Fed. 181, 80 Fed. 611. In the case first cited the court said: "In discussing this branch of the case, the circuit court said: 'The word "exclusive" in the contract between the city and W. S. Kuhn is insufficient to raise the implication that the city, by the use of said word, thereby agreed to renounce its power to construct waterworks itself; because (1) such is not the ordinary meaning of the word; (2) because it is conceded that under the law the word "exclusive," if given its usual interpretation, would render the exclusive feature of the contract void; (3) because the express provision of the contract of the city to take water for a term of years raises the contrary implication that after the expiration of that twenty years both parties intended that the city should be free to exercise its power to construct and maintain waterworks, or to obtain its water in any other lawful way.' We concur in this view. It is difficult to see the force of the contention that, on account of once making a contract with the plaintiff for twenty years, the city irrevocably bound itself by an implied contract never to construct and maintain a waterworks system of its own. While it is doubtless true that the erection of such plant by the city will render the property of the water company less valuable, yet the city was not bound by the contract to refrain from exercising its power to construct and maintain waterworks after the expiration of the twenty-year period provided in the contract. The contract by its terms ceased to have effect after April 9, 1904, and the subsequent construction and operation of waterworks by the city for its own benefit and the benefit of its citizens would not, we think, be a violation of any of the express or implied provisions of the contract. The city undoubtedly had the power, by an express contract, to renounce its authority to construct and maintain waterworks itself during the time which it would be proper and lawful to grant the privilege to a third party."

In Rogers Park Water Co. v. Chicago, 131 Ill. App. 35, the court said: "But even with the word 'exclusive' in the ordinance given full force and effect as a legal and valid provision, we think still that it would be by 'mere implication' that it could be held that the village of Rogers Park by its use had shut out itself and the city of Chicago, by annexation its successor in public duties to the inhabitants of its territory, from the exercise of one of the most necessary and ordinary of municipal functions. To our mind the granting of an 'exclusive' right and privilege to one person means that the grantor will not grant the same right and privilege to another person—not that he binds his own hands otherwise."

In Brenham v. Brenham Water Co. 67 Tex. 542, 4 S. W. 143, it appeared that the city passed an ordinance granting to a water company "the right and privilege, for the term of twenty-five years from the date of the adoption of this ordinance, of supplying the city of Brenham and the inhabitants thereof with water for domestic or other uses and for the extinguishment of fires." In holding that this ordinance granted the water company the exclusive right and privilege of supplying water to the city for twenty-five years, but was invalid, as being a contract beyond the power of the city to make, the court said: "Taking all the laws into consideration, we cannot doubt the power of the city to make some contract through which the city might be furnished with water. It becomes necessary, for the proper determination of this case, to ascertain the character of the contract on which the rights of the parties depend. The subject-matter of the contract was one over which the city had control solely under the power confided to it as a municipal government, to be exercised for the public good, and not under any private corporate right or proprietorship. The first section of the ordinance professes to give and to grant a right and a privilege to the water company to supply the city and its inhabitants with water for the period of twenty-five years. Was it intended to make this right and privilege exclusive for that period of time? This must be ascertained from the language of the ordinance, the surroundings of the parties, and the purpose sought to be accomplished. The ordinance, in terms, professes to give and to grant a right to do certain things and therefore to receive certain benefits for a quarter of a century, i. e., to confer a claim to do certain things, and to receive a fixed compensation, which may be enforced for that period. It not only professes, in general terms, to confer such a right, but, as if to emphasize it, and to fully illustrate the character of right intended to be granted, it terms it a privilege. The word 'privilege,' as used in the ordinance, is evidently not used in the technical sense in which it is used in the civil law, or even under the common law, where used in the sense of 'priority,' but was intended to be given its ordinary signification, meaning a right peculiar to the person on whom conferred, not to be exercised by another or others. This right is to supply the city and its inhabitants with water, for their varied uses for twenty-five years, at fixed prices in enumerated cases, and at such prices as the water company and inhabitants may agree upon in other cases. The word 'supplying' must be considered in its connection with a view to ascertain whether it was used in its primary sense or in one more restricted; and, so considered, we can have no doubt that it was used in its primary sense, intending thereby to give the water company the right and privilege to furnish to the city and its inhabitants what water might be needed or necessary to be furnished through such a system. In the ordinance under consideration it can mean no less than to furnish all the water the city and its inhabitants may need to have furnished under the power given to the city through its charter, and this for the period of twenty-five years. It would do violence to the context to give to the word any other meaning. If nothing more appeared than we have considered, to give character to the contract and to illustrate the nature of the right intended to be secured through it, it seems to us that there is no escape from the conclusion that the parties contracted and intended to contract that the right of the water company should be exclusive. The fifth and sixth sections of the ordinance, however, if there were doubt, it seems to us would remove it. The water company obligated itself to erect and maintain a given number of fire hydrants on the mains which it absolutely agreed to put down, and for the use of these the city agreed to pay the sum of three thousand dollars per year for the period named. It further obligated itself to extend its mains, if requested to do so by the city, and upon each mile of such extension to erect not less than ten fire hydrants, for each one of which the city promised to pay a rental of sixty dollars per annum, as provided in the fifth section. Was the city, in this and in another part of the ordinance to which we have referred, agreeing to receive and the company to furnish the entire quantity of water to be used for fire and other enumerated public purposes during the twenty-five years? The contract, in terms, obligated the city to pay for this, for the full period, whether it used the water or not, and thus made the only right valuable to the water company in so far exclusive. If the city refused to take the water, and obtained it elsewhere—if the contract was valid, and the parties are to be supposed to have so considered it—then the city would but assume a double burden, which it cannot be conceived that the city ever contemplated. The language of the contract, the surroundings of the parties and their evident purpose, forbid the belief that they either intended to make the right and privilege of the water company other than an exclusive right to furnish and be paid for all the water the city and its inhabitants might need to have furnished through a system of waterworks for the full period of twenty-five years. Does the charter of the city of Brenham or that of the water company confer upon the city the power to make such a contract? . . . No express power is conferred upon the city, through either or both of the charters, to make a contract through which the water company could become entitled to the use of the streets, and to have the exclusive right to furnish the city and its inhabitants with water at a fixed rate for twenty-five years; and we do not see that power to make such a contract was necessary or essential to the proper exercise of the power expressly given. Under charters containing grants of power less full and express than are contained in the charter of the city of Brenham, it has been held that power existed to erect and operate waterworks under the control and ownership of the municipality when it deemed it necessary to the public good. The legislature had given power to the city of Brenham to erect, control and regulate waterworks, and this it may exercise, if it has or may have the pecuniary ability, unless restrained by the contract under consideration. . . . Will not the contract under consideration, if valid, have the effect, not only to embarrass the city government in the exercise of the power conferred upon it, but to withdraw from it the right to provide, in any other authorized way, water for public purposes and the use of its inhabitants, which was the sole purpose for which the power to erect, maintain and regulate waterworks was given to it? It seems so to us; for, as we have before said, the contract in effect assumes to give an exclusive right—assumes to surrender to a private corporation for a period of twenty-five years the power which the legislature conferred on the municipal government. The power given to a municipal corporation to contract in relation to a given subject-matter, does not carry the implication that it may contract, even with reference to that, so as to render it unable in the future so to control any municipal matter over which it is given power to legislate as may be deemed best. . . . There is, however, another question involved in this case which will be examined, reaching further than the one we have considered, and involving not only the power of the municipal corporation to make the contract sued on under the terms of the charters of both corporations, but involving the question of the power of the legislature, directly or indirectly, to confer upon the water company such rights and privileges as it claims under the contract. . . . A grant which gives to one or an association of persons an exclusive right to buy, sell, make or use a given thing or commodity, or to pursue a given employment, creates a monopoly. There are, however, certain classes of exclusive privileges which do not amount to monopolies, and a consideration of these and the grounds on which they stand is not now necessary. The right to exercise the exclusive privilege need not extend to all places, it is enough that it is to operate in and to the hurt of one community. It need not continue indefinitely so as to amount to a perpetuity; it is enough that it be an exclusive privilege for a period of time, of the character forbidden. The more general is its application as to places and persons, and the longer it is to continue, the more hurtful it becomes. In the case before us, the contract, as we have seen, gives the exclusive right to sell to a community, for public purposes, for the period of twenty-five years, thus affecting all the inhabitants in their common right directly, and in their individual rights at least indirectly. This right to sell for public purposes carries with it, through the contract, the obligation to buy for public uses. It gives the exclusive right to sell to the inhabitants of the city for the same period, for all the private uses for which they may need water, in such ways and to be so applied as it can be only by a system of waterworks, which is a denial in effect to the inhabitants of the right to buy for these private purposes from any other water company. Such an exclusive right prevents competition and tends to high prices, all matters affecting which the contract before us surrenders the right further to regulate for a quarter of a century. It has been said, in cases to which we will hereafter refer, that there can be no monopoly in the use of a street to lay down gas or water mains or pipes, because it is not a matter of common right to use streets for such purpose. This may be admitted without affecting the question before us. When such use, however, is but a means to the exercise of an exclusive right to sell water, and to compel a city or its inhabitants to buy it, it will be found difficult to separate the means from the end intended to be accomplished. A system of water or gas works may be operated in a town or city as well by one individual as by a private corporation, if he have the ability. No corporate franchise is necessary to that purpose. It is an occupation in which any person may engage if he has the means, which may and ordinarily will involve the right to use streets and other public grounds. This means to accomplish the purpose can ordinarily be acquired only through permission given directly or indirectly by the state; but cases may arise in which no such consent would be necessary. Such a franchise, when granted, is one of the feeblest character, and from its nature subject at all times to control. Some conflict of authority exists as to whether such contracts as that under consideration create monopolies. The question has arisen in several cases in which gas and water companies asserted exclusive right to use streets for laying down mains and pipes under charters granted which, in terms, gave exclusive right. . . . The exclusive rights, given by the contract before us, lead to the same results as a monopoly in any other matter, and whether a monopoly or not is best ascertained by the results which are brought about by a contract or law and the exercise of rights the one or the other may profess to confer. We are of the opinion that the exercise of the exclusive rights conferred on the water company produce the same results as would the exercise of an exclusive right which would fall within the most exacting definition of a monopoly, and that the allowance or creation of such exclusive rights is contrary to the spirit of the constitution of this state." To the same effect see Altgelb v. San Antonio, 81 Tex. 436, 17 S. W. 75, 13 L.R.A. 383.

It has been held that while a municipality has no right, in the absence of express legislative authority, to engage in business enterprises and to compete with its citizens, a person engaged in a similar business who asserts that the competition of the city is causing him injury and damage, has no legal or equitable ground of complaint, though in his capacity of citizen and taxpayer he is entitled to injunctive relief. Keen v. Way- cross, 101 Ga. 588, 29 S. E. 42, wherein the plaintiff sought to restrain the municipality from competing with him in the plumbing business. The court said: "It was insisted, however, that, conceding the city had no right to conduct the business in question, this was a matter with which the plaintiff had no concern, and therefore he had no legal ground of complaint. Regarding the plaintiff merely in his capacity as a plumber, this point is well taken. Thus viewing him, the only effect of the city's action was to interfere, by way of competition, with a monopoly which he seems to have previously enjoyed. This immunity from the harassment of competition was but the result of mere chance, and he could assert no property right therein; for the law recognizes in no one a right to create or maintain a monopoly. 'The only injury of which he can be heard in a judicial tribunal to complain is the invasion of some legal or equitable right. If he asserts that the competition of the [city] damages him, the answer is, that it does not abridge or impair any such right. If he alleges that the [city] is acting beyond the warrant of the law, the answer is, that a violation of its charter does not of itself injuriously affect any of his rights' as a licensed plumber entitled to pursue his calling in the city; for the municipality 'is not shown to owe him any duty,' in that capacity, 'which it has not performed.' . . . But it by no means follows that, as 'a citizen and taxpayer of the city of Waycross,' the plaintiff will not be heard to complain, or is without redress. 'It is the prevailing rule that taxpayers may enjoin municipal corporations and their officers from transcending their lawful powers or violating their legal duties in any mode which will injure the taxpayers,—such as making an unauthorized appropriation of the corporate funds, or an illegal disposition of the corporate property.' 2 Beach on Injunctions, § 1300. 'Following out the theory which regards the municipal corporation as a trustee for the inhabitants, it is almost, if not quite universally, conceded by the courts in the United States, that, in the event of the failure of the state law officer to intervene by virtue of his statutory or implied power to protect the interest of the state and of the corporators, any property holder or municipal taxpayer may resort to equity to prevent municipal corporations or officials from exceeding their lawful powers or neglecting or violating their legal duties, under any circumstances where the taxpayer's interest will be injuriously affected. And this is the privilege of the taxpayer, though it is not expressly conferred upon him by statute.' In private corporations, it is well settled that 'if the directors will not protect the rights of the creditors and stockholders, then the latter may and should attend to their own interests. There is no reason whatever why a different rule should be applied to municipal corporations, in which the taxpayers are the beneficiaries upon whose shoulders will ultimately fall the loss and expense which is caused by illegal, fraudulent or tortious acts, or by the inertness and general malfeasances of the municipal authorities.' Tiedeman on Mun. Corp. § 395. So, at the instance of citizens and taxpayers, courts exercising equitable jurisdiction will 'set aside and annul any and every illegal public official action or proceeding of county, town, or city authorities, whereby a debt against such county, town, or city would be unlawfully created, the public burden upon the community would be unlawfully enhanced, and the amount of future taxation would be unlawfully increased. . . . In the face of every sort of objection urged against a judicial interference with the governmental and executive function of taxation, these courts have uniformly held that the legal remedy of the individual taxpayer against an illegal tax . . . was wholly inadequate; and that to restrict him to such imperfect remedy would, in most instances, be a substantial denial of justice.' 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 260, pp. 347, 348. In this connection, see also 2 High on Injunctions, §§ 1239, 1269, 1271; Tied. on Eq. Jur. § 483; and the general conclusion announced by Judge Dillon in vol 2, § 922, of his admirable work on Municipal Corporations, after a painstaking review of the decisions, English and American, bearing upon the subject now under discussion."

But to entitle a complainant to equitable relief as a citizen and taxpayer on the ground that the municipal corporation is engaged in a similar business in competition with him, present or prospective damage must be shown by him; and an injunction will not be granted where no such showing is made. Baker v. Grand Rapids, 142 Mich. 687, 106 N. W. 208; Stone v. Oconomowoc, 71 Wis. 155, 36 N. W. 829. And see the reported case.

v.

STATE.

Alabama Supreme Court—June 17, 1915.

193 Ala. 55; 69 So. 569.

Criminal Law — Evidence — Intoxication as Bearing on Intent.

Accused, charged with murder in the first degree, may show that he was so intoxicated at the time of the killing as to be incapable of understanding that he was committing a crime, to disprove existence of specific intent essential in murder in the first degree.

Evidence of Intoxication — Admissibility.

It is not competent for witnesses of accused to testify that his intoxication rendered him, at the time of the killing, incapable of understanding that he was committing a crime, since that is a conclusion for the jury.

Same.

That accused, relying on intoxication at the time of the killing, offered a witness a drink shortly before the killing, is immaterial.

Same.

That accused, relying on intoxication at the time of the killing, had been drinking at other times, does not show incapacity to commit murder at the time of the killing, and questions as to his condition as to drinking on prior occasions are properly excluded.

Same.

A witness, testifying that accused, relying on the defense of intoxication, was drinking and acted queerly just before the offense, may not testify that he considered accused mentally unbalanced at that time.

Insanity as Defense — Proof — Conclusions of Witness.

That the mind of accused, relying on insanity, had not been very strong since he had a fever a year before the offense, was properly excluded, as the mere opinion of the father of accused, seeking to so testify.

Same.

A nonexpert witness, testifying to the insanity of accused, must state what acts of accused he has seen, and then give his opinion as to his sanity, but cannot testify that he has seen acts of insanity.

Same.

A witness for accused, relying on the defense of insanity produced by intoxication, may not testify that while accused is drinking his reason is dethroned, or that he then displays acts of insanity, or is not responsible for what he does.

Condition on Prior Occasion.

That accused, relying on insanity produced by intoxication, was on another occasion, when drunk, in such condition that no one could do anything with him, is properly excluded as irrelevant.

Insanity as Defense — Drunkenness.

Insane conduct or mania resulting from present intoxication of accused, charged with murder, does not excuse the crime; and where there was no evidence to show any fixed insanity, resulting from drunken habits or otherwise, abnormal conduct and conditions of accused, associated with present drunkenness, may not be shown.

[See 19 Ann. Cas. 1169.]

Judicial Notice — Inheritable Nature of Insanity.

The court judicially knows as an established truth of medical science that many forms of insanity are inheritable, and may recur in various individuals collaterally descended from a common source.

Insanity — Proof — Insanity of Relatives.

Evidence of the insanity of one or more members of accused's family, immediate or collateral, is not admissible, except in connection with other evidence directly showing that accused is insane.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

That the mother of accused and a maternal aunt were sent to the asylum may not be shown in defense of the insanity of accused, in the absence of anything to show the sort of asylum they were sent to, or why they were sent, and what their mental condition was at the time.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Opinions of witnesses acquainted with the relatives of accused, relying on insanity, that insanity runs in the family, are incompetent, because mere conclusions.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

The mere fact that a maternal aunt of accused, relying on insanity, is insane, and confined in an insane asylum, may not be shown in support of the defense of insanity, unaccompanied by any evidence of the nature, extent, duration, or symptoms of her mental disorder.

[See note at end of this case.]

Test of Irresponsibility — Knowledge of Consequences.

That accused was, at the time of the killing of decedent, so mentally unbalanced as not to know the consequences of his act, is not per se a palliation of murder, under a plea of not guilty, nor an excuse therefor, under a plea of insanity.

Instructions as to Insanity — Instruction Properly Refused.

A charge that if the jury believe that, at the time accused shot decedent, his conduct and acts were such that he was so mentally unbalanced that he did not know the consequences, that fact should be considered in determining the verdict, is properly refused, as misleading, and as singling out evidence for the consideration of the jury without stating any proposition of law.

Same.

An instruction that evidence that accused, relying on the defense of intoxication at the time of killing decedent, was intoxicated at the time, was admitted as bearing on the question of premeditation and deliberation, and if, after consideration of the facts, the jury have a reasonable doubt of the guilt of accused, they must acquit him, is properly refused, because misleading in its suggestion of acquittal because of accused's intoxication, while on the evidence there could be no acquittal on the plea of not guilty.

Same.

A charge requiring an acquittal of murder in the first degree, if accused was so drunk or mentally unbalanced as to cause him to turn a deaf ear to reason, is properly refused.

Burden of Proof as to Insanity.

A charge requiring the acquittal of accused, if the evidence leaves in the mind of the jury any reasonable doubt of his sanity, was properly refused.

[See 3 Ann. Cas. 926; 15 Ann. Cas. 95.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Cullman county: SPEAKE, Judge.

Criminal action. George James convicted of murder in first degree and appeals. AFFIRMED.

[57] Aside from the general issue, defendant also interposed the plea of not guilty by reason of insanity. Defendant was 18 years of age at the time of the killing, and the undisputed evidence shows that he entertained sentiments of hostility toward deceased, and that he killed him at night with a shotgun furtively fired through a window, while deceased was in his own home and seated in the midst of his family.

The state's witness Aaron testified on the cross-examination that defendant was at witness' house just before the murder; that he was drinking, and had a bottle of whisky, but he could not say he was drunk—he could walk straight, and he smelt whisky on his breath. The trial judge excluded defendant's question: "Did he offer you a drink?" The witness further stated that he had known defendant for 10 years, and that prior to the killing, and shortly before that occasion defendant passed him several times and looked like he had been drinking. The trial judge then excluded the following question: "What was his condition with reference to whether or not he had been drinking?" "Had he not been drinking pretty heavily for several days [58] prior to the killing?" "Tell the jury whether or not (just before the killing) in your opinion, the defendant was so much intoxicated as to be wholly unconscious of his acts." "And tell the jury, in your opinion, whether you considered him (at that time) mentally unbalanced."

The state's witness McCoy testified on cross-examination that he did not see defendant on the day of the killing, but had seen him frequently before that, and that he was well acquainted with the family of the mother of defendant, the Higginbothams. The trial judge then excluded these questions: "Insanity runs in the Higginbotham family doesn't it?" "The defendant's mother and sister were sent to the asylum, were they not?" "On other occasions, when he was drunk, was he so drunk as to be unconscious?"

Defendant's father testified for him that defendant had a spell of fever the year before, and also that he drank a good deal. The trial judge then excluded the following questions asked by defendant: "Since that fever, has his mind been strong or not?" "Since that fever, have you seen any acts of insanity?" "While in that condition [drinking]: (1) Is his reason dethroned? (2) Does he display any acts of insanity? (3) Is he responsible for what he does?"

Defendant's mother testified for him that she was present "Christmas a year ago" when he and his father had some trouble, and defendant was drunk, wild as a bear, and, further, that nobody could do anything with him like he is when he is drinking; affects his mind; don't know anybody." The judge excluded the expressions, "no one could do anything with him," and "affects his mind." The witness further stated that defendant nearly died the year before, and was in bed [59] three weeks with a spell of fever. The court then excluded the following question asked by defendant: "What was the condition of his mind after he got up?" He also excluded questions as to whether insanity ran in witness' family, and whether his sister is not now insane, and confined in the lunatic asylum at Tuscaloosa.

The following charges were refused to defendant:

(1) "If you believe from the evidence that at the time the fatal shot was fired by defendant that his conduct and acts were such that he was so mentally unbalanced or insane that he did not know the consequences, then you should take such into consideration in determining your verdict."

(2) "If you believe from the evidence that although you believe beyond all reasonable doubt that defendant is guilty of murder in the first degree, yet if you believe from the evidence that defendant was so mentally unbalanced that he did not know the consequences of his act, you should find him not guilty."

(3) "Evidence that the accused was intoxicated at the time of the killing, if you find such evidence has been offered in this case, is admitted for your consideration as bearing on the question of premeditation and deliberation; and if after a careful consideration of all the facts and circumstances in the case you have a reasonable doubt of defendant's guilt, you should find him not guilty."

(4) "If you believe from the evidence that, at the time the alleged fatal shot was fired by defendant, he was drunk or mentally unbalanced to such an extent as to cause defendant to turn a deaf ear to reason, you should not convict defendant of murder in the first degree."

[60] (5) "While defendant is required to prove that he was of unsound mind at the time of the homicide by the preponderance of the evidence, it is also true that upon the consideration of the testimony of the whole case, the state's as well as the defendant's, if any reasonable doubt remained in the minds of the jury, the verdict should be not guilty."

(6) "The legal presumption of sanity may be overcome by evidence tending to prove insanity of the accused, which is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of his sanity at the time of the commission of the act for which he is sought to be held accountable; but when that is done the presumption of sanity ceases, and the burden is upon the state, which is then required to prove his sanity, as an element necessary to constitute crime, beyond a reasonable doubt."

Daniel W. Troy, Talbert Letcher, P. M. Brindley and C. L. Price for appellant.

W. L. Martin and J. P. Mudd for appellee.

SOMERVILLE, J.—(1, 2) It was competent for the defendant to show that he was intoxicated to such a degree as to render him at the time of the killing incapable of understanding that he was committing a crime; this for the purpose only of disproving the existence of the specific intent or mental state which is an essential ingredient of murder. Waldrop v. State, 185 Ala. 20, 64 So. 80; Walker v. State, 91 Ala. 76, 9 So. 87. But it was not competent for defendant's witnesses to testify that his intoxication produced that result, since that was a conclusion to be drawn by the jury from the evidence. Armor v. State, 63 Ala. 173.

[61] (3-5) The fact that defendant offered the witness Aaron a drink before the killing was not material, and was properly excluded. And the mere fact that he had been drinking at other times had no tendency to show his incapacity to commit murder on the occasion in question; hence the questions to Aaron as to defendant's condition with reference to whether he was drinking on prior occasions were properly excluded. But the ruling was harmless in any case, as the witness had already testified that defendant looked like he was drinking. It may be that, had defendant offered to show that he had been "drinking pretty heavily for several days prior to the killing," with the explanation that he proposed to show fixed insanity as a result of long-continued drunken habits, this would have been competent as a link in such a chain of proof. But this purpose did not appear. Upon the predicate merely that defendant was drinking and acting queerly just before the killing, the trial judge properly refused to allow this witness to say whether he considered him "mentally unbalanced" at that time.

(6, 7) That defendant's mind had not been "very strong" since he had the fever the year before was obviously a mere opinion of the witness (defendant's father), and was of no probative value upon the issue of insanity vel non. Its exclusion was proper. Nor could the witness state that he had seen "acts of insanity" since the fever. He should have stated what acts of defendant he had seen, and then he might properly have given his opinion as to his insanity. Rembert v. Brown, 14 Ala. 360.

(8) So it was not permissible for this witness to state that while defendant is drinking his reason is dethroned, or that he displays acts of insanity, or that [82] he is not responsible for what he does. Henningburg v. State, 153 Ala. 13, 45 So. 246. Even if general results, thus drawn by the witness from other occasions, were relevant, these were conclusions to be drawn by the jury and not by the witness.

(9) The fact that on another occasion when defendant was drunk nobody could do anything with him was clearly irrelevant, and was properly excluded.

We have examined with due care all of the excluded testimony offered by defendant to show incapacity to commit murder, or to support his plea of insanity. In every case it was properly excluded, either because it related to irrelevant occasions, or was inadmissible opinion, or because the witness giving his opinion omitted the necessary predicate of facts, or was not sufficiently qualified by observation and knowledge. Parrish v. State, 139 Ala. 28, 42, 36 So. 1012; Dominick v. Randolph, 124 Ala. 557, 564, 27 So. 481; Odom v. State, 174 Ala. 4, 56 So. 915; Henningburg v. State, 153 Ala. 13, 45 So. 246.

(10) In this connection it is to be noted that insane conduct or mania resulting merely from present intoxication is not the insanity which excuses crime. Gunter v. State, 83 Ala. 96, 109, 3 So. 600; Parrish v. State, 139 Ala. 47, 36 So. 1012; Buswell on Insanity, 449. All of the alleged abnormal conduct and conditions of defendant, offered to be shown by the several witnesses, were directly associated with present drunkenness, excepting only the instance of fever above referred to. So there was in fact no evidence before the court tending to show any fixed insanity, resulting from drunken habits or otherwise.

(11) In some of the early cases it has been held that proof of insanity among the relations of the defendant is admissible only in connection with expert testimony [63] that insanity is in fact hereditary. Reg. v. Tucket, 1 Cox C. C. (Eng.) 103; State v. Simms, 68 Mo. 305. We think, however, that courts must now judicially know, as an established truth of medical science, that many forms of insanity—or, at least, the physical and neurotic conditions which tend to produce or invite such forms—are transmissible from parents to children, and may recur in the various individuals collaterally descended from a common source. People v. Garbutt, 17 Mich. 9, 97 Am. Dec. 162, and note, 174; Baxter v. Abbott, 7 Gray (Mass.) 71, 81.

(12) But, while evidence of the insanity of one or more members of the defendant's family, immediate or collateral, is admissible to show the hereditary taint in his own blood, such evidence is never admissible, except in connection with other evidence directly tending to show that the defendant is himself insane. State v. Cunningham, 72 N. C. 469; Laros v. Com. 84 Pa. St. 200, 209; State v. Van Tassel, 103 Ia. 11, 72 N. W. 497; Watts v. State, 99 Md. 30, 57 Atl. 542; People v. Smith, 31 Cal. 466; Murphy v. Com. 92 Ky. 485, 18 S. W. 163; Snow v. Benton, 28 Ill. 306; Guiteau's Case, 10 Fed. 161, 167; Whart. & Stille's Med. Jur. § 377; Clev. Med. Jur. of Ins. 528. For, as said by Bynum, J., in State v. Cunningham, supra: "To allow such evidence to go to the jury as independent proof of the insanity of the prisoner would be of the most dangerous consequence to the due administration of criminal justice, since there are but few persons, it is ascertained, who have not had ancestors or blood relations, near or remote, affected by some degree or mental aberration."

But, independently of this consideration, the questions by which defendant sought to show hereditary insanity were either inapt or legally objectionable.

[64] (13) The fact that defendant's mother and a maternal aunt "were sent to the asylum," there being nothing to show what sort of asylum they were sent to, why they were sent, and what was their mental condition at the time, was patently inadmissible.

(14) So also the opinions of witnesses, however well acquainted they might be with defendant's maternal relatives, that "insanity runs in the family," were utterly incompetent, not only because they were mere conclusions, but because the witnesses were not qualified to give their opinions on such a subject.

(15) Defendant offered to show by his mother that her sister is "now insane, and confined in the lunatic asylum at Tuscaloosa." It may be that the bare fact that a parent of the defendant is insane and under confinement on that account would be admissible as tending to show hereditary insanity in the defendant, which however, we need not now decide; but we think the bare fact that a maternal aunt is insane, and confined in an insane asylum, without any evidence to show the nature, extent, duration, or symptoms of her mental disorder, and nothing to suggest that it has arisen from causes or conditions which are transmissible, as distinguished from those which are purely personal or ephemeral, does not furnish any rational basis upon which the jury could infer the existence of hereditary insanity in the family of defendant.

"It is doubtless the general and well-established rule, that, where the mental soundness of an individual is in question, the sanity of the blood relations in the ancestral line may be shown as tending to establish the fact in issue (Walsh v. People, 88 N. Y. 458); but that rule does not permit indiscriminate and unexplained evidence of diseases afflicting such relations and affecting [65] their mental faculties. There must be evidence tending to show at least that such diseases are hereditary or transmissible. Reichenbach v. Ruddach, 127 Pa. 564, 18 Atl. 432; State v. Van Tassel, 103 Ia. 6, 72 N. W. 497; . . . It is a scientific fact of common knowledge that the transmissibility of the malady known a 'general paresis' depends to a great extent upon the conditions underlying the disease. . . . Whether the particular form of the disease from which the testatrix and her family suffered was of such a transmissible character that she might be said to have derived it from her ancestors cannot be determined from the evidence in the record, and it is therefore difficult to see how the testimony of the physicians (that her mother and brother were afflicted with general paresis) was really pertinent to the issue whether the testatrix was possessed of testamentary capacity." In re Myer, 184 N. Y. 54, 76 N. E. 920, 6 Ann. Cas. 26, and note collecting the authorities.

(16, 17) Charge 1, refused to defendant, instructs the jury that if, "at the time the fatal shot was fired by the defendant, his conduct and acts were such that he was so mentally unbalanced or insane that he did not know the consequences, then you should take such into consideration in determining your verdict." The fact that one who kills is at the time so mentally unbalanced as not to know the consequences is not per se a palliation of murder under the plea of not guilty, nor is it an excuse therefor under the plea of insanity. A man's mind may be temporarily unbalanced by fear, or hatred, or other causes, not associated with mental disease; and equally the most intelligent and responsible man may not perceive all the consequences of his act. Neither of these phrases is apt, and the [66] charge could only have misled and confused the jury. Moreover, it is objectionable as singling out evidence for the consideration of the jury, without stating any proposition of law.

Refused charge 2 requires a verdict of not guilty if defendant "was so mentally unbalanced that he did not know the consequences of his acts," and was properly refused for reasons just above stated. The legal tests of criminal irresponsibility by reason of insanity have been frequently stated and applied in accordance with the leading case of Parsons v. State, 81 Ala. 577, 2 So. 854, 60 Am. Rep. 193, and we need not now restate the law. However, this charge was fully covered by defendant's given charge 4.

(18) Refused charge 3 is palpably misleading in its suggestion of complete acquittal because of defendant's intoxication. On the undisputed evidence there could be no acquittal on the plea of not guilty.

(19) Refused charge 4 required an acquittal of murder in the first degree, if the defendant was so drunk or mentally unbalanced as "to cause him to turn a deaf ear to reason." Its refusal was proper, and needs no comment.

(20) Refused charges 5 and 6 require the acquittal of defendant, if the evidence leaves in the mind of the jury any reasonable doubt of his sanity. This is not the law in this state, and these charges could not be properly given.

An examination of the entire record discloses no error of law of which defendant can complain, and the judgment must be affirmed.

Affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

(July 2, 1915.)

[67] SOMERVILLE, J.—We have examined with due care the several questions now urged for our consideration.

(21) 1. It must be observed that, at the stage of the trial when the court excluded the defendant's question to the state's witness Aaron, "Had he not been drinking pretty heavily for several days previous to the killing?" there was no testimony before the court that defendant was drunk in any degree on the day of killing, nor at any other time. It is, of course, to be conceded that, when there is evidence of drunkenness, its probable degree may be illustrated by showing that it was immediately preceded by protracted and heavy drinking, yet proof of the latter fact alone does not even prima facie show that it was in fact followed by any degree of drunkenness or insanity. See Snead v. Scott, 182 Ala. 97, 62 So. 36; and Sharp v. State, 193 Ala. 22, 69 So. 122. Had this question been propounded at a later stage of the trial, it might have been error to exclude it.

2. For the same reason the defendant's condition "relative to drinking" on several occasions shortly preceding the killing, but disconnected therewith in continuity, was, when sought to be elicited from this witness, prima facie irrelevant. Moreover, though the meaning of this question is somewhat obscure, we are satisfied, as already stated, that it had been already fairly answered, to the extent of the witness' knowledge, by his statement that on these occasions "he seemed to be drinking."

(22) 3. While mental emotions, as well as physical sensations, are usually exhibited by facial expressions, [68] and, when relevant, a witness who observed a person's facial expression is generally allowed to say that it indicated any of the ordinary and familiar mental emotions or physical sensations which common knowledge informs us may be thus visibly indicated (Stone v. Watson, 37 Ala. 279; Carney v. State, 79 Ala. 17; Long v. Seigel, 177 Ala. 338, 58 So. 380; Barlow v. Hamilton, 151 Ala. 634, 44 So. 657, and cases cited), yet the question of whether a person looked natural or unnatural does not come within the reason of that rule. Any one of a hundred things might cause a person to look unnatural, without in any way evidencing an insane mental condition. Such an opinion by this witness was, at least upon the issues here involved, too vague and too conjectural as to its significance to be of any material probative value.

We are impelled to adhere to our conclusions on the original hearing.

All the Justices concur.

NOTE.

Admissibility, on Issue of Sanity, of Evidence of Insanity of Ancestors or Kindred.

The recent cases are in accord with the holding in Matter of Myer, 184 N. Y. 54, 6 Ann. Cas. 26, that since it is a well-established fact of medical science that many forms of insanity are inheritable, proof of the insanity of ancestors or kindred of a person whose sanity is under investigation is admissible. Wear v. Wear (Ala.) 76 So. 111; Dillman v. McDanel, 222 Ill. 276, 78 N. E. 591, 113 Am. St. Rep. 400; Martin v. Beatty, 254 Ill. 615, 618, 98 N. E. 996; Fish v. Poorman, 85 Kan. 237, 240, 116 Pac. 898; State v. Warner (Vt.) 101 Atl. 149. And see the reported case. Compare Owen v. Groves, 145 Ga. 287, 38 S. E. 964.

In State v. Warner, supra, the defendant was convicted of first degree murder. The defense was insanity and evidence was introduced tending to show insanity in the family. The court said: "When a respondent puts his mental condition in issue by the introduction of evidence tending to show his insanity, he opens an inquiry that may take a very wide range; how wide depends upon the circumstances of the case in hand. . . . Broadly speaking, his whole life may be canvassed for evidence bearing upon the question, and his ancestry and family history may be investigated. In this very case, the respondent properly introduced evidence tending to show insanity in his ancestors, and asked the jury to believe that the seeds of the malady came to him by inheritance."

Evidence of ancestral insanity, however, is circumstantial and in order to render it admissible there must be prior proof of insanity of the person whose mental condition is in issue. Thus in Fish v. Poorman, 85 Kan. 237, 240, 116 Pac. 898, it was said: "Plaintiffs also offered proof, which the court rejected, showing that several relatives of Mrs. Sherwood were insane, and that one of them, Elizabeth Powell, her mother's sister, died in an insane asylum. This class of testimony is generally held admissible on the recognized principle of the hereditary character of insanity, but only in corroboration of proof that a particular person is or was insane."

But proof of a taint of insanity in a person's family without actual evidence of insanity in the person himself will never be allowed to overcome the presumption of his sanity. By the weight of authority such proof is said to be competent only when there is other proof tending to establish the insanity of the person in question. . . . We think the testimony here should have been admitted."

So in Wear v. Wear (Ala.) 76 So. 111, the court said: "Two of the assignments (11 and 12) complain of the admission of evidence by Mrs. Partain to the effect that her grandfather, decedent's father, was insane before his death, and that decedent's brother was then insane. Where there is other proof tending to establish the want of mental capacity of a person whose mental capacity is under investigation to make a will, it is competent to show in that connection that ancestors and blood relatives of the person under inquiry had become insane."

Contrary to the holding of the reported case, that evidence of the insanity of ancestors or kindred is not admissible unless the particular form of insanity is shown to have been transmitted to the person whose sanity is questioned, is the case of Dillman v. McDanel, 222 Ill. 276, 78 N. E. 591, 113 Am. St. Rep. 400. It was contended in that case that a will had been obtained by undue influence and that at the time of making the will testator was of unsound mind. Evidence was introduced tending to show that an aunt of the testator had been insane for eighteen months and that a cousin had been and was at the time of trial mentally deranged. The evidence was objected to on the ground that the insanity from which the aunt had suffered was not of a kind that was hereditary. The court, however, ruled that the evidence was properly admitted, saying: "Wesley R. Baldrige, a witness for contestants, was permitted, over objection, to testify that Jane Devin, a paternal aunt of the deceased, was 'crazy' for a period of eighteen months and then recovered, and it is urged that this evidence was incompetent for the reason that it was not supplemented by any evidence showing that the insanity from which the aunt suffered was of a kind that was hereditary, and that in any event the disease could not have been transmitted from her to the deceased. The precedents are not a unit on this question, but we think the greater weight of authority is that, where the sanity or insanity of an individual is the subject of judicial investigation, and there is other evidence tending to show mental unsoundness, it is competent to show the insanity of his collateral blood relations, not further removed than uncles and aunts, without making proof that the insanity from which they suffered was hereditary in character. . . . There was also evidence, which was received without objection, that Sarah E. Hudelson, a cousin of the deceased, had been insane for a great many years and was so at the time of the trial." The foregoing holding was recognized in Martin v. Beatty, 254 Ill. 616, 618, 98 N. E. 996, wherein evidence that two brothers, two sisters, and a nephew of the testator had been insane was held properly admitted.

In Owen v. Groves, 145 Ga. 287, 88 S. E. 964, proof, based on general repute in the family, that a brother of the testatrix had died insane, was rejected as hearsay.

PACIFIC POWER AND LIGHT COMPANY

v.

WHITE ET AL.

Washington Supreme Court—April 20, 1917.

96 Wash. 18; 164 Pac. 602.

Sales — Warranty — Duration — When Contract Executed.

A contract of September 8th in terms: Articles of agreement between named persons witnesseth that the parties of the first part have bargained and agreed to sell and do hereby sell to the party of the second part all the stock of a certain company for $25,000, of which $1,000 is to be paid at once, and balance on or before September 17th, and on receipt of stock, and the parties of the first part agree and warrant that the company's liabilities did not on September 1st exceed $11,500, after allowing for claims then due it, and if they do exceed it, the excess shall be deducted from the purchase price, and the parties of the first part will on or before September 13th furnish a statement of the liabilities, and then the party of the second part shall have privilege of verifying it by books, accounts, and other papers and records of the company, so that, if possible, it may be done by September 17th—is not, when an audit was furnished, an executed contract passing title, but still an executory contract, as regards consideration for the warranty of September 19th, that the liabilities did not exceed the amount shown by the audit, which before proceeding further with the consummation of the purchase the party of the second part required certain of the parties of the first part to execute; the party of the second part not being required to consummate the purchase till protected in some satisfactory way against any undisclosed liabilities of the company.

Consideration for Warranty.

A warranty that there are no undisclosed liabilities against a company given by a part of the owners of its stock, whereby one having an executory contract of purchase thereof is induced to proceed to a consummation of it when not legally bound to do so, has consideration.

Construction of Warranty — Meaning of "Liabilities."

"Liabilities" of a corporation, warranted in a contract of sale of its stock and in a separate warranty not to exceed a certain amount, are not limited to contractual liabilities, but include those for torts.

Duration — Continuing Warranty.

A warranty on which sale of the stock of a corporation is made against its liabilities, undisclosed or contingent or otherwise, exceeding a certain amount, is continuing.

Agency — Undisclosed Principal — Rights in Warranty to Agent.

A warranty on which sale is made to one in fact acting as agent inures to the benefit of the undisclosed principal.

[See note at end of this case.]

Sales — Warranty — Distinction between Warranty and Guaranty.

A contract inducing consummation of purchase of the stock of a corporation, whereby part of the sellers warrant that the corporation's liabilities do not exceed a certain amount, is one of warranty, and not of guaranty, being an absolute undertaking in praesenti, as well as in futuro.

Action on Warranty — Necessary Parties.

Though sale of the stock of a corporation is by all the stockholders, only those stockholders who execute a warranty against liability that the corporation's liabilities do not exceed a certain amount, whereby the purchaser is induced to consummate his purchase, are necessary parties to action on the warranty.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county: FRATER, Judge.

Action by Pacific Power and Light Company, plaintiff, against W. H. White et al.,

defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Kerr & McCord for appellant.

Charles E. Patterson, Tom S. Patterson and Hurlbut & Neal for respondents.

[19] PARKER, J.—This is an action to recover damages upon a warranty. The demurrer of the defendants, White and Campbell, to the complaint of the plaintiff, Pacific Power & Light Company, having been sustained by the superior court and the plaintiff having elected to stand upon its complaint and not plead further, judgment of dismissal was rendered against it. From this disposition of the cause, the plaintiff has appealed to this court.

Counsel for appellant amplified its complaint to a considerable extent in response to a motion and demand in that behalf made by counsel for respondents. This was done before the ruling of the trial court upon respondents' demurrer. We therefore view the complaint as so amplified, as the superior court did, in determining the question of the sufficiency of the facts so pleaded to constitute a cause of action entitling appellant to relief. The controlling facts so appearing may be summarized as follows: In the negotiations leading up to and in the making of the two contracts here involved, Chas. D. Fullen was acting as agent for appellant. This fact of Fullen so acting as agent for appellant, we assume, was then unknown to respondents and all the other parties to the contracts, since the contracts themselves and the pleadings are silent upon that question. The first of the contracts reads:

"Articles of agreement, made and entered into this 8th day of September, A. D. 1910, by and between W. H. White, Thos. F. Jack, of Seattle, Washington, for themselves and A. H. Campbell, of Toppenish, Washington, for himself and [20] as agent for Herbert Wright and W. P. Taylor, parties of the first part, and Chas. D. Fullen, of Seattle, Washington, party of the second part.

"Witneseth: That the parties of the first part have bargained and agreed to sell and do hereby sell unto the said party of the second part the entire capitalization and all of the stock of the Reservation Electric Company, a corporation, organized under the laws of the state of Washington and engaged in operating and conducting an electric light plant in the town of Toppenish, Washington, said stock carrying with it the entire assets of every kind and nature of the said Reservation Electric Company, together with all the rights, franchises, privileges and good will belonging thereto, for and in consideration of the sum of $25,000, of which the sum of $1,000 is paid at the time of the signing of this agreement, and the balance of said sum, to wit, $24,000, is to be paid on or before September 17, A. D. 1910, and on the receipt by said party of the second part of the shares of stock representing the capitalization hereinbefore referred to.

"The said stock shall be deposited with the Scandinavian American Bank of Seattle, Washington, and when the entire amount thereof is so deposited, the said party of the second part shall pay the said sum of $24,000 to the parties of the first part on or before the 17th day of September, A. D. 1910.

"The parties of the first part agree and warrant that the liabilities of said corporation did not and shall not exceed the sum of $11,500 on the 1st day of September, A. D. 1910, after allowing for all accounts and claims due to the said corporation on that date; and in the event that said liabilities exceed said amount, then the same, so far as the excess over $11,500 is concerned, shall be deducted from the purchase price of said stock. The parties of the first part, through A. H. Campbell as secretary and manager, are to furnish to the party of the second part a statement showing the said liabilities as herein before mentioned, on or before the 13th day of September, A. D. 1910, and then the said party of the second part shall have the privilege of verifying the same by examination of the books, accounts and other papers and records of the said Reservation Electric Company, so that if possible the same may be done before September 17, 1910. If the indebtedness as above determined is less than $11,000, then the said party of the second part [21] is to pay to the said parties of the first part the difference between $11,000 and the indebtedness as determined, the understanding being, that the entire cost of said plant to said party of the second part, including the liabilities of said corporation, shall not be less than $36,000.

"In Witness Whereof, the said parties hereto have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"W. H. White (Seal)

"Thos. F. Jack (Seal)

"A. H. Campbell (Seal)

"Chas. D. Fullen (Seal)."

After this contract was entered into, an audit was made of the books of the Reservation Electric Company, which showed liabilities of that company to the extent of $12-506.03. Appellant, before proceeding further with the consummation of the purchase of the stock, required respondents to execute and deliver a contract of warranty reading as follows:

"Seattle, Sept. 19, 1910.

"Mr. Chas. D. Fullen

"Seattle, Wash.,

"Dear Sir: We have examined the statement of Price, Waterhouse & Co., certified public accountants, as to Reservation Electric Company, dated Sept. 17, 1910, a copy of which was furnished to us, and we are prepared now to say and warrant, that at the close of business for the month of August, 1910, the accounts and bills payable, after deducting the accounts receivable, did not and do not exceed the sum of $12,506.03.

"In addition thereto, we represent and state to you that then there were no other undisclosed or contingent liabilities existing against said company in excess of said amount.

"We further represent to you that there has been no unusual or unnecessary expenditures made during the month of September other than those in the ordinary course of business and which were necessary for carrying on the business of said Reservation Electric Company, as no increase has been made in the liabilities of said company, of which you have not been fully advised.

"Respectfully yours,

"W. H. White

"A. H. Campbell

"Thos. F. Jack."

[22] This is the warranty here sued upon. We quote from the contract of September 8th as bearing upon the question of the consideration for the execution of this warranty contract. The sale of the stock was thereupon on that day consummated by delivery thereof to Chas. D. Fullen and the payment of the purchase price as contemplated by the contract of September 8. Appellant "was induced to purchase said stock, and did purchase said stock, and pay said valuable consideration therefor, by reason of said statements, warranties and representations made by said defendants, and believed that said statements, representations and warranties were true, and relied thereon."

In January, 1910, the Reservation Electric Company became liable to one White for damages for personal injuries received by him as the result of the negligence of that company, which liability was unknown to Chas. D. Fullen and appellant, his principal, at the time of the consummation of the sale of the stock on September 19th, and was not included in the $12,506 liabilities of that company then disclosed by respondents and warranted by them to be all the liabilities of that company. Thereafter, in October, 1910, an action was commenced against the Reservation Electric Company by White to recover damages for which it was so liable to him. Trial of that action in the superior court resulted in a judgment against that company in favor of White for the sum of $3,000, which judgment was thereafter affirmed by this court. White v. Reservation Electric Co. 75 Wash. 139, 134 Pac. 807. Immediately upon the commencement of that action in the superior court, appellant notified respondents, and each of them, of the fact of its commencement and called upon them to defend the Reservation Electric Company and save it harmless from that liability. The Reservation Electric Company was ultimately compelled to pay that judgment. It is for damages so resulting to appellant in the impairment of the value of the stock of the Reservation Electric Company purchased by appellant from respondents that [23] recovery is sought in this action upon the warranty contract of September 19, 1910.

It is contended by counsel for respondents that: "The contract of Sept. 19th is a nullity because, prior to that time, the contract of sale was completed and title to the property had passed, so that there was no consideration whatever for this contract." It is true that the sale contract of September 8th contains the words "have bargained and agreed to sell and do hereby sell." Should we look no further to the provisions of that contract, it might well be argued that it became an executed contract passing title upon its being signed by the parties thereto. There are, however, other provisions therein which we think render it plain that both the vendors and the purchaser had something more to do before that contract could be regarded as executed and passing title. Respondents did not make delivery of the stock, nor were they required to do so until the final payment of the purchase price was made by appellant. This of itself might be regarded as merely the retention of control over the stock for the purpose of securing the purchase price, and, therefore, not inconsistent with the passing of title upon the signing of the contract. But respondents also had something to do as a prerequisite to the perfection of their right to have the purchase of the stock consummated. By the terms of that contract, they and their associates warrant that the "liabilities" of the Reservation Electric Company did not exceed the sum of $11,500. They also agreed to furnish evidence of the amount of the liabilities of that company. They also agreed that the amount of such liabilities was to become finally determinative of the exact amount of the purchase price, $25,000 being only tentatively stated as the amount of the purchase price in the contract. Plainly, by the terms of the contract, appellant was not compelled to blindly accept the information to be furnished by respondents as conclusive. It was before the acceptance by appellant of this information to be furnished by respondents and their [24] associates, before payment of the balance of the purchase price, and before delivery of the stock, that appellant demanded and received from respondents the warranty contract of September 19th which induced it to consummate the purchase. Assuming for the present that the liability of the Reservation Electric Company to White was one which respondents and their associates were required to disclose and warrant against under the contract of September 8th, it is plain that appellant was not required to consummate the sale under that contract until it was protected against liabilities of the nature which White had against that company, either by deducting the amount of such liabilities from the purchase price or in some other manner satisfactory to appellant, and the fact that that liability was not known to appellant at the time surely did not lessen its right to be protected against it. Such expressions as "do sell," "have sold," and "hereby sell," used in a contract of sale and which, standing alone, might indicate a present sale and passing of title, are not conclusive upon that question when used in a contract of sale other provisions of which negative the idea of title passing upon the signing of such a contract. As to when title passes under such a contract becomes a question of intention to be gathered from all of its terms. It seems clear to us, in the light of the things which, by the terms of the contract, respondents were required to do before appellant was required to consummate the sale, that the contract of September 8th did not become an executed one or pass title until after the execution of the warranty contract of September 19th, and that, when that warranty contract was executed, respondents' rights had not become so fixed and determined that they could have compelled the consummation of the sale without the doing of anything further on their part.

In the early case of Meeker v. Johnson, 3 Wash. 247, 257, 28 Pac. 542, Judge Dunbar, speaking for the court touching the effect of the word "sold" upon the question of passing title, as used in a sale contract, said:

[25] "It is true that the formal word 'sold' is used in this contract . . . ; but so it is in a great majority of contracts of this kind where it is not claimed by either party that they are anything more than executory contracts. This may be, and doubtless is, one expression among others, to indicate the intention of the parties; but it is only one, and is not conclusive when the other conditions in the contract indicate a different intention."

See also North Pacific Lumbering, etc. Co. v. Kerron, 5 Wash. 214, 31 Pac. 595; Pacific Coast Elevator Co. v. Bravinder, 14 Wash. 315, 44 Pac. 544; North Idaho Grain Co. v. Callison, 83 Wash. 212, 145 Pac. 232; 6 R. C. L. 590; 35 Cyc. 281.

Having concluded that the sale contract of September 8th was still executory and had not resulted in the passing of title to the stock at the time of the execution of the warranty contract of September 19th, we think it follows that there was ample consideration to support the latter contract, since it appears by the allegations of the complaint that appellant was induced to proceed to a consummation of the sale contract by the execution of the warranty contract, at a time when it was not legally bound to do so; that is, at a time when respondents had not done all they were required to do under the terms of the sale contract entitling them to have the sale consummated. Congar v. Chamberlain, 14 Wis. 258.

It is contended in respondents' behalf that the warranties contained in the contracts of September 8th and September 19th have no reference to any liability of the Reservation Electric Company other than contractual liabilities. The provision in the contract of September 8th for the furnishing by respondents of a statement of the liabilities of that company, and the privilege of appellant to verify the same by an examination of the books of that company before the consummation of the sale, and the fact that the determination of the total amount of the liabilities of the company was to control the exact amount of the purchase price, might seem to furnish some ground for this contention; but when [26] the contract of September 8th is read as a whole, we think it is rendered plain that appellant was induced to purchase the stock of the Reservation Electric Company in reliance upon the fact that every liability of that company should be disclosed before the consummation of the sale by the payment of the purchase price. It is plain that liabilities of the Reservation Electric Company growing out of torts would lessen the value of the stock which was the subject of the sale, just as effectually as liabilities growing out of contract. It seems quite plain to us that appellant entered into the contract of sale with respondents, having in view that every liability of every nature which would affect the value of the stock would be disclosed before the consummation of the sale, and that all parties to the contract were proceeding upon that theory. We think that the word "liabilities," as appearing in both contracts, is there used in its broad sense and was intended by all parties to the contracts to include every debt or obligation of the Reservation Electric Company which would impair the value of the stock of that company. Bouvier defines "liability" as "responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action." Plainly, according to the allegations of the complaint, White's cause of action for damages was then such a liability against the Reservation Electric Company and one which materially impaired the value of the stock of that company.

It is contended by counsel for respondents that the warranties contained in the contracts are not continuing warranties. Looking alone to the sale contract of September 8th, there might be some ground for this contention, in view of the fact that the terms of that contract seemed to contemplate that the total amount of the liabilities should be first ascertained and the purchase price determined accordingly. It seems to us, however, that the warranty in the contract of September 19th is plainly a continuing warranty. Indeed, it was manifestly not for the purpose of warranting against [27] then disclosed liabilities, since they were to be then taken into consideration in the fixing of the purchase price. It could serve no purpose if not a continuing warranty looking to the future protection of appellant against other existing liabilities. Even if the warranty in the contract of September 8th was not strictly a continuing warranty, the uncompleted duty of respondents and their associates under that contract to disclose all the liabilities of the Reservation Electric Company constituted sufficient consideration for the execution of the warranty of September 19th, which plainly is a continuing one.

We have assumed so far, for convenience of discussion, that appellant is in fact the purchaser under the contract of September 8th. It is contended by counsel for respondents that appellant can in no event have the benefit of the warranty it here sues to recover upon, because it is not the beneficiary named therein, and its interest in the transaction being only that of an undisclosed principal, it has no greater rights than an assignee of its agent, Chas. D. Fullen. Counsel invoke the general rule that a warranty in the sale of personality does not run with the property, and the assignee of the purchaser cannot avail himself of such warranty as against the original seller, citing 35 Cyc. 370. It seems to us that appellant does not stand in the shoes of an assignee or grantee of its agent, Fullen, in view of the fact that Fullen was, at the time of the execution of both contracts, in fact acting for appellant as its agent. This fact appearing by the allegations of the complaint, we think appellant's rights are controlled by another rule of law, well stated in 2 C. J. 873 as follows:

"As a corollary to the principle that the rights of the other contracting party are not affected by the disclosure of a theretofore unknown principal, it is a well established general rule that, where an agent on behalf of his principal, enters into a simple contract as though made for himself, and the existence of the principal is not disclosed, the contract inures to the benefit of the principal who may appear [28] and hold the other party to the contract made by the agent. By appearing and claiming the benefit of the contract, it thereby becomes his own to the same extent as if his name had originally appeared as a contracting party."

Of course, the rights of the other contracting party as against the agent, with whom he thinks he is dealing as principle, might impair the undisclosed principal's rights. This, however, is not a question to be here considered. As the facts here appear, respondents' burdens and obligations under their contract of warranty of September 19th are not increased in any respect by appellant, as the undisclosed principal, claiming under that warranty, any more than as if Fullen himself were claiming under it. Respondents are not going to be subjected to successive suits for any one breach of their warranty by successive assignees or grantees of the purchaser of the stock, which is apparently the main reason for the rule of not allowing recovery upon a warranty other than by the one to whom it was given, as pointed out by Justice Lamar in Smith v. Williams, 117 Ga. 782, 45 S. E. 394, 97 Am. St. Rep. 220. In this connection, counsel also invoke the rule that no one can acquire any rights under a special "guaranty" other than the one who is expressly referred to or necessarily embraced in the description of the persons to whom the guaranty is addressed, citing 20 Cyc. 1429. We think it plain, however, that the contract here involved is one of warranty and not of guaranty. While these words are often somewhat indiscriminately used, they do not carry the same meaning or refer to obligations of the same legal nature. In 12 R. C. L. 1056, the difference in legal effect between a warranty and a guaranty is stated as follows:

"It seems that derivatively the words 'warranty' and 'guaranty' import the same kind of transaction, and they are still loosely employed as though they were synonymous. In legal conception, however, a guaranty is distinguishable from a warranty. Each is an undertaking by one party to another to indemnify or make good the party assured against some possible default or defect in the contemplation of the [29] parties; but a guaranty is understood, in its strict legal and commercial sense, as a collateral warranty, and often as a conditional one, against some default or event in the future, whereas the term 'warranty' is generally understood as an absolute undertaking in praesenti as well as in futuro, against the defect, or for the quantity or quality contemplated by the parties in the subject-matter of the contract. In the sale of a commodity, an undertaking by the seller to answer for defects therein is construed as a warranty, though the seller uses the term 'guarantee.'"

A guarantor might be quite willing to enter into a contract guaranteeing payment of an obligation in the future by one person and yet be quite unwilling to guarantee such payment by another. In other words, the guarantor's burden might be quite different in the one case from what it would be in the other. So it will not be presumed that he intends to be bound except for the obligation of the person named in the guaranty contract. There has not come to our attention any decision or other authority holding to the view that an undisclosed principal to a contract of warranty like that here involved cannot have the benefit of such warranty to the same extent as if it were any other simple contract obligation on the part of the warrantor. We are of the opinion that appellant is entitled to the benefit of this warranty if the allegations of its complaint are true and respondents have no affirmative defense impairing such right, either against it or its agent, Chas. D. Fullen, assuming that it dealt with Fullen without knowledge of his agency for appellant.

Some contention is made in respondents' behalf that there is a defect of parties. This contention, however, proceeds upon the theory that this action is based upon the sale contract of September 8th as well as the warranty contract of September 19th, it being conceded by counsel for respondents that if the action rests upon the warranty contract of September 19th alone, there is not a defect of parties. What we have said, we think, leads to the conclusion that the cause [30] of action is, and can be, rested upon the warranty contract of September 19th. The sale contract of September 8th is of no consequence here except as having a bearing upon the question of consideration for the execution of the warranty contract of September 19th. In other words, the first contract is here to be considered only for the purpose of determining whether or not it was completely executed and had passed title to the stock before the execution of the warranty contract.

We conclude that the facts stated in the complaint are sufficient to constitute a cause of action entitling appellant to recover upon the contract of warranty executed by respondents on September 19, 1910. The order sustaining the demurrer to appellant's complaint and the judgment of dismissal are reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

NOTE.

Warranty to Agent as Inuring to Benefit of Undisclosed Principal.

Where a contract not under seal is made with an agent in his own name for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or the principal may sue on it; the defendant in the latter case being entitled to be placed in the same position at the time of the disclosure of the principal as if the agent had been the real party in interest. See the note to Powell v. Wade, 55 Am. St. Rep. 916. It follows as a corollary to that rule, that any benefit or advantage derived by the agent in the nature of a warranty either express or implied inures to the benefit of the undisclosed principal. Cushing v. Rice, 46 Me. 303, 71 Am. Dec. 579; Beebe v. Robert, 12 Wend. (N. Y.) 417, 27 Am. Dec. 132; Kelly Asphalt Block Co. v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. 211 N. Y. 68, 105 N. E. 88, L.R.A.1915C 256, affirming judgment 153 App. Div. 907, 137 N. Y. S. 1125, which affirmed 136 App. Div. 22, 120 N. Y. S. 163; Woodward v. Stieff, 171 N. C. 82, 87 S. E. 955; Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124. And see the reported case. See also Carter v. Harden, 78 Me. 528, 7 Atl. 392.

In case of a purchase or exchange of goods by an agent, even if the principal is not disclosed, and the bill of sale is made to the agent himself, the property, immediately on the execution of the contract, vests in the principal, and the right of action on an implied warranty or on fraudulent representations made to the agent, is in the principal. Cushing v. Rice, 46 Me. 303, 71 Am. Dec. 579.

In Kelly Asphalt Block Co. v. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. 211 N. Y. 68, 105 N. E. 88, L.R.A.1915C 256, affirming judgment 153 App. Div. 907, 137 N. Y. S. 1125, which affirmed 136 App. Div. 22, 120 N. Y. S. 163, wherein an undisclosed principal sued for damages for a breach of implied warranty on a contract of sale, it was held that while the fact that the seller would not have made the contract if it had known who the real buyer was, might have justified it in refusing to perform on learning the truth, having executed the contract the seller could not escape liability thereon for a breach of an implied warranty in the absence of any fraud in the making of it.

In Ross v. Northrup, 156 Wis. 327, 144 N. W. 1124, which is not directly in point as the question there involved was the existence or nonexistence of a warranty, it was held that the plaintiff's rights must be measured by those of his agent, and if he was an undisclosed principal his rights on a warranty could be no greater than that of his agent.

MARCONI WIRELESS TELEGRAPH
COMPANY OF AMERICA.New Jersey Court of Errors and Appeals—
June 15, 1914.

86 N. J. Law 183; 90 Atl. 1017.

Corporations — Issue of New Stock — Preferential Rights of Stockholders.

A corporation increasing its capital stock may offer the stock at par to its bona fide stockholders who appear to be such on the books of the corporation, and it need not accept the subscription of any other person. [See note at end of this case.]

Evidence — Weight — Uncontradicted Testimony.

An assignee suing on a claim, who has not been led to expect that a fact defeating a recovery on the claim would be attempted to be proved by an admission of his assignor, does not, by failing to contradict testimony of a witness as to admissions of the assignor, admit the truth of the testimony, but that is for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Hudson county.

Action by George W. C. Schmidt, plaintiff, against Marconi Wireless Telegraph Company of America, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Aaron A. Melniker for appellant.
Griggs & Harding for respondent.

[184] GUMMERE, C. J.—On April 18th, 1912, the defendant corporation, having resolved to largely increase its capital stock, offered to its stockholders of record the right to subscribe for twenty-five shares of new stock, to be issued at par, for every share held by them respectively. On that day one Parsons appeared on the books of the company to be a holder of one hundred and thirty-five shares, and she assigned her right to subscribe to Levy Brothers, the power to make such an assignment being conferred upon stockholders by the corporation. Levy Brothers, within the time limit fixed by the company, subscribed for three thousand three hundred and seventy-five shares, and paid the required deposit. The money was subsequently returned to them, and their subscription refused, upon the ground that Miss Parsons was not, on April 18th, 1912, or at any time thereafter, a stockholder of the defendant corporation, having sold her stock a considerable time before the date mentioned. Levy Brothers, conceiving that the action of the defendant corporation in refusing their subscription was without legal justification, claimed that they were entitled to be paid by the latter the difference between the price at which they subscribed for the stock, and its market value after it was issued, and this claim being repudiated by the company, they assigned to the appellant, Schmidt, any right of action growing out of the refusal of the company to accept their subscription. At the trial the defendant company called as a witness John W. Griggs, its president and general counsel, who testified that prior to the assignment to the plaintiff he had an interview with Levy Brothers, or some of them, with relation to their subscription and its rejection, in which he told them that the company had received information that Miss Parsons had sold and parted with all her right in the stock which stood in her name several years before the issue of the new stock had been determined upon, and was then told by them that such was the fact, but that the persons who had bought the stock were in South America, and that as they were, in a measure, clients of theirs (the Levy Brothers) [185] they thought they ought to make the subscription to protect them, although they had no authority from their clients to take such action in their behalf. At the close of the case the trial court held that the proof was conclusive that at the time of the assignment by Miss Parsons to Levy Brothers of her right to subscribe to the new issue, she was not a stockholder of the defendant corporation, and had no interest therein, and that, this being so, the corporation was clearly within its rights in refusing Levy Brothers' subscription, notwithstanding the fact that Miss Parsons appeared as a stockholder upon the books of the company. So holding he directed a verdict in favor of the defendant; and from the judgment entered thereon the plaintiff appeals.

We concur in the view of the trial court that the defendant corporation was under no legal obligation to accept the subscription of any person who was not, at the time when the new stock was offered for sale, a bona fide holder of stock in the company, or exercising the rights of such a holder. The right to subscribe depended upon a double condition—first, that the subscriber was in fact a stockholder of the company; and second, that he appeared to be such on the books of the company. But we cannot agree that it was so conclusively established that Miss Parsons was not the owner of stock at the time she made the assignment to Levy Brothers, as to make that essential fact one to be determined by the court rather than by the jury. There is nothing in the pleadings, or the proofs, to indicate that the plaintiff who was the assignee of Levy Brothers, had any knowledge that they had made the admission of the nonownership of stock by Miss Parsons testified to by Mr. Griggs, or that he had reason to anticipate that there would be any attempt made to prove her nonownership by the admission of his assignors. None of the members of the firm of Levy Brothers were called as witnesses, and it does not even appear that they were in court at the trial. Not having been led to expect that the fact of nonownership by Miss Parsons would be attempted to be proved by the admission of his assignors; not even having any knowledge, so far as the case shows, that Levy Brothers [186] had any information upon this subject, he apparently was compelled to permit the testimony of Mr. Griggs to go unchallenged. It cannot, therefore, be said that by his failure to controvert it he impliedly admitted its truth. Of course the testimony of a man whose character for truth and integrity is so universally known as that of Governor Griggs would always be accepted as a correct recital of the facts spoken to as he remembered them. But it will hardly do to say that the character of a witness is the determining factor upon the question whether the facts testified to by him shall be determined by the court or by the jury. It cannot be that where the character of the witness for truth and veracity is known by the court to be unimpeachable, the facts sought to be established by his testimony are to be determined by the court, but that where in the judgment of the court, the witness is not entitled to full faith and credit, the facts sought to be proved by him must be determined by the jury. No such rule of evidence exists. In every case where the issue depends upon the determination of facts the existence of which is not admitted, the jury, and not the court, must determine them.

We conclude, therefore, that it was error for the judge to take from the jury the question whether or not Miss Parsons, at the time of her assignment to Levy Brothers, was or was not the owner of stock in the defendant company, and that, for this reason, the judgment must be reversed.

For affirmance: None.

NOTE.

Right of Stockholder to Preference in Subscribing for New Stock.

Introductory, 132.

General Rule, 132.

Waiver of Right of Preference, 133.

Remedies, 133.

Introductory.

The present note reviews the recent decisions passing on the right of a stockholder to a preference in subscribing for new stock. The earlier cases are collected in the notes to Stokes v. Continental Trust Co. 9 Ann. Cas. 738, and Humboldt Driving Park Assoc. v. Stevens, 33 Am. St. Rep. 654.

General Rule.

The recent authorities recognize the general rule that in case of the issue of new stock by a corporation shareholders have a preferential right to subscribe for the new stock in proportion to their original holdings before subscriptions are received from strangers. Snelling v. Richard, 166 Fed. 635; Bates v. United States Machinery Co. 216 Fed. 140, 132 C. C. A. 384; Kingston v. Home L. Ins. Co. (Del.) 101 Atl. 898; Bennett v. Baum, 90 Neb. 320, 133 N. W. 439; Whitaker v. Kilby, 55 Misc. 337, 106 N. Y. S. 511, affirmed 122 App. Div. 895, 106 N. Y. S. 1149; Sommer v. Armor Gas, etc. Co. 71 Misc. 211, 128 N. Y. S. 382; Bond v. Atlantic Terra Cotta Co. 137 App. Div. 671, 122 N. Y. S. 425; Strickler v. McElroy, 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 165; Martin v. Gibson, 15 Ont. L. Rep. 623. See also Waters v. Waters, 130 App. Div. 678, 115 N. Y. S. 432; Sovereign Bank v. McIntyre, 44 Can. Sup. Ct. 157.

The foregoing rule has been applied in cases where the directors of a corporation issue new stock, in order to gain control of the corporate affairs. Strickler v. McElroy, 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 165; Whitaker v. Kilby, 55 Misc. 337, 106 N. Y. S. 511; Martin v. Gibson, 15 Ont. L. Rep. 623.

Thus in Strickler v. McElroy, 45 Pa. Super. Ct. 165, it appeared that the directors issued to themselves an undisposed of portion of increased capital stock. The court said: "The plaintiff was at that time the owner of 152 shares of the stock of the company and this action was brought to recover his proportion of the profit derived by the defendants from the sale of the stock to themselves. To support his claim he relies on the generally accepted principle relating to the administration of the business of a corporation that where the capital stock is increased and is about to be issued every existing stockholder then has the right to subscribe at par for such a proportion of the stock to be issued as his holdings bear to the amount of stock then outstanding. The rule is thus stated by some of the text-writers: 'If the capital stock is increased by the proper authorities the right to take the additional shares vests in the stockholders pro rata.' Taylor on Corporations, sec. 569 (5th ed.) 'When a capital stock of a corporation is increased by the issue of new shares, each holder of the original stock has a right to offer to subscribe for and demand from the corporation such a proportion of the new stock as the number of shares already owned by him bears to the whole number of shares before the increase.' 1 Cook on Corporations sec. 286 (6th ed.). And this applies to such part of the original capital stock as is issued long after business is commenced by the company. "Those who are shareholders when an increase of the capital stock is effected enjoy a right to subscribe to the new stock in proportion to their shares and before subscriptions may be received from outsiders.' 23 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law 853."

In Whitaker v. Kilby, 55 Misc. 337, 106 N. Y. S. 511, affirmed 122 App. Div. 895, 106 N. Y. S. 1149, it appeared that the directors of a corporation, without knowledge on the part of the other shareholders, had issued new stock which they themselves purchased. It was held that all stockholders should be given an equal right to subscribe for their proportional share of the stock, the court saying: "So far as regards the issue of stock, the plaintiff is entitled to relief. Directors cannot, with secret knowledge of the existence of a contract which they claim to be of great value, issue treasury stock of the corporation and buy it in themselves, particularly when the transaction converts them from minority to majority stockholders. Such a transaction is in the highest degree inequitable. All stockholders should be given knowledge of contracts affecting the value of the stock, and should be allowed to subscribe for their proportional share of the new issue."

In Bates v. United Shoe Machinery Co. 216 Fed. 140, 132 C. C. A. 384, wherein it appeared that a stockholder had transferred his shares of stock in the defendant corporation to a person whose application for a transfer on the books had been wrongfully refused, it was held that the transferee should be considered as a record holder on the books of the company and entitled to his pro rata share of the new stock issued. See also the reported case as to the necessity of recording a transfer.

In Bond v. Atlantic Terra Cotta Co. 137 App. Div. 671, 122 N. Y. S. 425, it was held that where new stock was issued in payment for property purchased by the corporation, the stockholders had no preferential right to acquire the stock. The court said: "A stockholder may not be deprived of his right to participate in the management of the affairs of the corporation by voting on his stock in the same manner and to the same extent as other stockholders in the proportion that his holdings bear to theirs; and his share or interest in the corporation cannot be affected (unless the statutory law expressly so provided before he became a stockholder) without his consent or (except in the case of stock issued for property) without affording him an opportunity to purchase a share or interest, in proportion to his holdings, in any increase of the capital stock so as to enable him, if he so desires, to retain the same proportionate share or interest in the corporation."

Where an issuance of new stock is authorized, a stockholder who declines to take any of the increase waives his right thereto, and the waiver is binding on a subsequent transferee. Hall v. Hall, 30 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 826. In that case the action was to set aside a sale of 54 shares of capital stock which was an uncalled for portion of an increase. The plaintiff contended that the sale was unauthorized and the shares should have been distributed pro rata among the shareholders. However, it appeared that the plaintiff had purchased the stock under which the new shares were claimed since the time of the increase and that the original holders thereof had declined at the time of the increase to purchase the new shares. It was held that by so doing they impliedly waived their right thereto, so that the stock became treasury stock, and that their transferee took subject to the waiver.

However in Sommer v. Armor Gas, etc. Co. 71 Misc. 211, 128 N. Y. S. 382, it was held that failure to pay for new stock, which had been allotted pro rata among the shareholders, before a certain date fixed by resolution, did not amount to a waiver of the right of preference no attempt having been made to dispose of it. The court said: "The right of existing stockholders to subscribe for increased capital stock must be exercised within a fixed or reasonable time, and mere failure to exercise such right within such time bars the stockholder from contesting a disposition of the stock to someone else, nothing more. It seems that defendant might, after September twenty-second, and before plaintiff's demand, have disposed of her shares, at par or otherwise, without incurring any legal liability by reason thereof. . . . Until plaintiff declined to take the shares, or consented to the action of the defendant in withholding them from her, plaintiff was entitled to demand and receive her shares on payment therefor, as long as the new stock remained undisposed of."

Remedies.

Equity will aid a stockholder who has been deprived of his right to a proportional share of new stock issued. Snelling v. Richard, 186 Fed. 635; Bates v. United Shoe Machin- ery Co. 216 Fed. 140, 132 C. C. A. 384; Whitaker v. Kilby, 55 Misc. 337, 106 N. Y. S. 511; Martin v. Gibson, 15 Ont. L. Rep. 623. In the case first cited it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the directors from issuing any of the new stock. The court said: "The amended bill prays that the corporation and the directors be enjoined from issuing any of the new stock without first affording complainants a reasonable opportunity to subscribe therefor in proportion to their present holdings. This is their right, and if they avail themselves of it they will retain control of the company. . . . The motion for a preliminary injunction is granted."

Where directors of a corporation subscribed for all of a new issue of capital stock so that they might gain control of the company it was held in Martin v. Gibson, 15 Ont. L. Rep. 623, that the action of the directors deprived the minority holders of their right to the stock and the directors should be restrained from voting on the increase. The court said: "I am of opinion that the minority shareholders were not required to submit to the form of application proposed by the circular letter issued. They were invited to state whether they desired to increase their holdings, and it was on terms that such shares might be allotted as to the directorate seemed desirable and necessary. There was no recognition of any right on the part of existing shareholders to claim a pro rata division of the proposed new issue, and at this time, by the appropriation of the 350 shares, the minority had become less than one-third in value of the shareholders. Therefore, I do not hold the plaintiff to be precluded by the limited opportunity afforded by the circular from now seeking relief in respect of the total issue and allotment of the new stock. The action of the directors is left open to the investigation of the court. . . . It may be that it was not in the immediate and direct contemplation of the directors to oust the minority from their place of vantage, but this was the inevitable effect of what was done; and, while this consideration helps to eliminate the element of fraud, it does not lessen the injurious effect of the partial allotment. I do not find any fraud to be established, and it is not necessary to allege it in order to get relief. The costs have been but little—if at all—increased in this regard, so that costs of the action may be awarded to the plaintiffs: excluding any costs arising from the charge of fraud. The judgment should be so framed as to restrain voting upon the increased capital shares, and declaring that the allotment to the five directors and their appointees was in excess of the powers of the directors. If necessary, the allotment may be vacated so that the whole increased issue may be laid open to be properly disposed of, having regard to the interests of all the shareholders. It has not been necessary to consider the doctrine of 'inherent right' which is discussed and upheld in the American cases, but I am inclined to think that the same conclusion as has been arrived at in this case would have held good, even if no element of the plus-one-third minority had entered into consideration, on the general principle and guide, in dealing with the distribution of new stock and the claims of existing shareholders, that 'quality is equity.'"

CITY OF ST. LOUIS

v.

NASH.

Missouri Supreme Court—January 6, 1916.

266 Mo. 523; 181 S. W. 1145.

Statutes — Legislative Definitions — Effect.

A legislative body may within limits define the objects affected or designed to be by its own enactments, and the supreme court is ordinarily bound, in construing its acts or ordinances, to follow its own definitions.

[See Ann. Cas. 1914B 186.]

Words and Phrases — Meaning of "Tent."

An ordinance of the city of St. Louis defined a "building" as any structure for the support, shelter, or inclosure of persons, and defined buildings of the fourth class as any building not of the first three classes, and provided that no fourth-class building should be built within the fire limits. Defendant constructed a moving picture theater, ninety-seven feet long, fifty-eight feet wide, with a height along the center of thirty feet, using telegraph poles joined by a wire cable and guy cables to support and attach a canvas covering and at the rear built a stage of wood, with wings composed partly of wood and partly of canvas, made a floor of boards nailed to cross-pieces sunk in the ground, equipped the stage and the whole structure with electric lights, the front with doors of wood and glass, and a ticket booth of wood, and furnished it with stoves for heating and with benches to seat 640 persons, which, if a building, was a building of the fourth class. Rev. St. 1909, § 8057, declares that words in statutes are to be regarded as used in their plain, usual, and everyday meaning. It is held that the structure was not a "tent," defined as a pavilion or portable lodge consisting of canvas, etc., supported and sustained by poles used for sheltering persons from the weather, especially soldiers in camp, in that it lacked the element of portability and was constructed of other materials than those ordinarily used in tents, but was a "building" within the intent of the ordinance. [See note at end of this case.]

Validity of Ordinance.

Such ordinance was referable to the police power, and was not invalid on the ground of its unreasonableness.

Error to St. Louis Court of Criminal Correction: CLARK, Judge.

Proceeding against Michael Nash for violation of ordinance of City of St. Louis. Judgment for defendant. City brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

William E. Baird and Truman P. Young for plaintiff in error.

Taylor R. Young and Edward W. Foristel for defendant in error.

[524] FARIS, P. J.—This is a case growing out of the prosecution of defendant in error for an alleged violation of an ordinance of the city of St. Louis. Being cast in the police court and likewise in the Court of Criminal Correction to which it appealed, the city [525] brings the case here by writ of error. Since, throughout, no change has occurred in the parties, we will for charity's sake refer to them as the plaintiff and the defendant, respectively.

The section of the city ordinances which the complaint alleges that defendant violated, reads thus:

"Sec. 341. No fourth-class buildings shall hereafter be built within the district known as the fire limits, as hereafter defined, except such buildings as are provided for in sections 342 and 343 of this article." (Here follows a description of the fire limits.)

When the case reached the Court of Criminal Correction a motion to quash the complaint was filed by defendant, but action thereon was deferred by the learned judge nisi till he had heard the case on the merits. Thereupon the case was presented below upon agreed facts, which the court heard and thereafter entered an order quashing the complaint. Therefore, though we follow the language of the court nisi in stating that the motion to quash was sustained, it is plain that the case was actually heard and decided on the merits.

The agreed facts are lengthy; but since in the view we take of the controversy, alone, the method of the construction and physical nature of the structure erected and used by defendant is important, we will not burden the statement of the case with more of the facts than will but suffice to illuminate this single point. Specifically, defendant was prosecuted for erecting and using as a moving-picture theatre, a certain structure which plaintiff contends violated the provisions of the section of the city ordinances which we quote above. The erection and use of the structure within the fire-limits were admitted. It is therefore manifest that the whole case turns on the nature of the structure so erected by defendant. The agreed facts [526] thus describe the materials of which it was constructed, the manner of construction thereof and the purposes for which it was used, viz.:

"Said shelter or structure is ninety-seven feet in length and fifty-eight feet in width, and has a height along the center of thirty feet, and a height along the sides, between the ground and the eaves, of eight feet. It is supported by two telegraph poles fourteen inches in diameter firmly set in the ground, one at the front end, facing Jefferson Avenue, on the inside, about ten feet west of the entrance, and in the center thereof. The other on the outside and west of the west end thereof. Said telegraph poles are thirty-five feet high, and between them is stretched a wire cable an inch and a half or two inches in diameter. To said cable are attached ropes which extend down to the top of the canvas cover and support the same. Also at intervals of eight feet, ropes extend down from the center of the top of the cover of said shelter or structure to the sides and bottom thereof, and most of them are connected with wooden posts securely driven in the ground and which are located about ten feet outside of the canvas cover, which keeps the covering taut. There are thirty of said poles upon each side of said shelter or structure, one-half of which are eight feet in height and the remainder twelve feet in height. Said poles are about three and one-half inches in diameter, and in the center of the top thereof is an iron peg securely driven therein, about one-half inch in diameter and eight inches in length and which projects above the top of the said pole about five inches. The canvas covering is composed of 12-ounce Army Duck Canvas. At the front end of said shelter or structure two wire cables or guy cables extend from the top of the front telegraph pole, one to the northeast corner of the lot upon which said shelter stands, and the other to the southeast corner. Said cables are attached to [527] posts firmly embedded in the ground fifteen feet outside of said shelter. At the rear end of said structure or shelter are three guy cables which extend from the top of the telegraph pole at the rear of said structure to posts firmly embedded in the ground, one of them at the northwest corner of the lot upon which said shelter or structure is located, another at the southwest corner and another at the west and near the center of the west end of said lot. The front and rear ends of said shelter or structure are supported by two poles, eighteen feet high, at each end thereof, which support the canvas cover at a point fifteen feet from the top of the cover on each side and at the end thereof. At the rear end of said shelter or structure is located a stage or platform, built of wood, upon each side of which are wings or dressing rooms composed partly of wood and partly of canvass. Inside of said structure or shelter are rows or tiers of seats in bench form. Between said rows of seats there is one aisle down the center six feet wide, and on each side of said shelter or structure there is also an aisle eight feet wide. There are sixty-four benches, each of which will seat ten people, so that said shelter or structure has a seating capacity of six hundred and forty persons. The said shelter or structure is equipped with electric lights set in iron conduit for lighting in the evening, and the stage or platform is also equipped with electric footlights set in conduit. Said shelter or structure is constructed in such a way that the sides can be raised up in the summer time and lowered in the winter time, and in the winter time the said sides are lowered, and at all places, except exits, when the sides are lowered, are banked along the outside with earth sufficient to shut out drafts. Said shelter or structure is equipped with four so-called cannon, or heavy cylindrical, stoves for heating, one stove being placed in each corner thereof, and the stovepipe goes out [528] through a hole in the side, which is fortified with asbestos and tin, and projects ten feet outside of the canvas cover. The floor of said structure or shelter is of earth and cinders, except that in front of each seat there is a board plank eight inches wide upon which the audience rest their feet. And in each aisle there is a board walk eight feet wide composed of one by two boards laid flat on the ground and nailed to cross pieces sunk in the ground. And between the ticket office and the east side of said shelter or structure are also similar boards laid in like manner. The seats are built of wood, in the form of benches. Along the street line or entrance to the lot upon which said shelter or structure stands is a series of door panels, composed of wood and glass, and consisting of eight such door panels. Six of said panels swing on hinges, and may be opened for the admission or exit of persons. Immediately inside of said outside entrance is an open space of ten feet where there exist two brick columns with wood jambs upon which two swinging doors are hung, composed of wood with glass windows, about seven feet in width and eight feet high. Between the two entrances there is a booth made of wood seven feet high and in the shape of a half moon, and is located outside of the shelter or structure. After passing through said inside entrance doors the audience are admitted into a small corridor or chamber, with a canvas cover, with canvas sides, which leads through a canvas curtain directly into the main auditorium. In the summer time these doors and the corridor are done away with, and the audience simply pass from the ticket office into the main auditorium. There they are seated for the purpose of witnessing exhibitions of moving pictures, etc. One exhibition is held every evening, and further, there is an exhibition every Sunday afternoon. Such, in general, is the description of the structure or shelter in question."

[529] It is clear that if the erection and use of the structure above-described violate the provisions of section 341 of the ordinances, the court wis erred; if it does not, he was right. Let us look to this point.

I. Confining the case to yet narrower limits, it is obvious that the question turns on whether the described structure is or is not a "building" within the purview of the section of the fire limits ordinance set forth, supra, and which plaintiff alleges defendant violated. If it is a building it is conceded to be such a one as is by the city ordinances designated, "of the fourth-class," the erection of which, at the place where defendant built and maintained the structure in controversy, is absolutely forbidden by said section 341. Plaintiff urges that the structure is a building; defendant just as strenuously contends that it is a tent. This, in a nutshell, is the concrete point confronting us.

The city ordinances define buildings of the several classes thus:

"Building of the First Class' shall be taken to mean a building of fire-proof construction throughout, the structural parts of which are wholly of brick, stone, or tile, concrete, iron or steel, or other equally substantial and incombustible materials. 'Building of the Second Class' shall be taken to mean a building of mill or slow combustion construction, wherein all floors and roofs are constructed of heavy dressed timber, exposed beams, girders and planking and supported upon masonry walls, or on wooden or fire-proofed iron or steel columns. 'Building of the Third Class' shall be taken to mean any building not of the first or second class, the external and party or division walls of which are wholly of brick, stone or other equally substantial and incombustible materials. 'Building of the Fourth Class' shall be taken to mean [530] any building not of the first, second or third classes." [Sec. 336, R. C. St. Louis.]

There is but little doubt we opine that within limits not necessary here to discuss (since obviously the boundaries are wide enough to include the facts here), a legislative body may define the objects affected or designed so to be by its own enactments, and that we are bound ordinarily in construing its acts or ordinances to follow its own definitions. [State v. Allison, 155 Mo. 325, 56 S. W. 467.] Therefore we note that a "building" is thus defined by the ordinances of plaintiff city:

"'Building' shall be taken to mean any structure for the support, shelter, or enclosure of persons, animals or chattels; and when separated by division walls without openings, then each portion of such building shall be deemed a separate building." [Sec. 336, R. C. St. Louis.]

So again narrowing the limits of the question and the scope of the instant inquiry, we need only to ascertain whether the structure in question was a building within the purview of the above definition.

Defendant strenuously insists that the structure in controversy is a tent, and that a tent is not a building. Quod erat demonstrandum. We may question this position from two angles: (a) Can it be maintained upon the facts, and (b) if it can be so maintained will the legislative definition nevertheless include it and make of it a building when, absent the definition, it was before but a tent?

The lexicons, under the statutory admonition that words found in statutes are to be regarded ordinarily as being used in their plain, usual and everyday meaning (Sec. 8057, R. S. 1909), define the word "tent" thus: "A pavilion, or portable lodge consisting of skins, canvas or some strong cloth stretched and sustained by poles, used for sheltering [531] persons from the weather, especially soldiers in camp." [Webster's Int. Dic.]

The above definition of the lexicographers is in line with that of the courts, as witness the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals which defines a tent thus: "A 'tent,' in the ordinary acceptation of the word, is a pavilion, portable lodge, or canvas house, inclosed with walls of cloth and covered with the same material." [Killman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 222, 28 Am. Rep. 432.] Likewise pertinent to the question whether a tent is a house, and therefore a building, the curious may consult the cases of Novell v. Boston Academy, 130 Mass. 209; Blakemore v. Stanley, 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689; Favro v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. 452, 46 S. W. 932, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950; Williams v. State, 105 Ga. 814, 32 S. E. 129, 70 Am. St. Rep. 82; State v. Poole, 65 Kan. 713, 70 Pac. 637; People v. Stickman, 34 Cal. 242.

Analyzing the facts of construction in the light of the definitions, supra, but leaving out of view the dimensions of this structure, which are ninety-seven by fifty-eight by thirty feet, we observe that it seems to lack portability, in that it is supported by telegraph poles fourteen inches in diameter "set firmly in the ground." These telegraph poles are bound together by a two-inch wire cable, which serves as, and in lieu of, a ridge-pole. From these telegraph poles other wire cables, five in all, called guy-cables, run down to an attachment to other posts "firmly embedded in the ground." Likewise a departure touching the sort of materials used in construction is noted. For at the rear of the structure there is "a stage built of wood, upon each side of which are wings or dressing rooms composed partly of wood and partly of canvas." This stage and the whole structure for that matter, is equipped with electric lights, and at the front of the stage there are footlights set in a conduit. Practically the whole of the floor, in fact all space, except that on which the seats sit, is covered [532] with boards. Such floor is constructed for the most part of one by two boards laid flat and nailed to cross-pieces sunk in the ground. The front of the structure which abuts on the street, is made of eight door panels, which swing on hinges and which are made of wood and glass. Just inside of the outside entrance there are two brick columns with jambs of wood, to which are hung doors of wood and glass, seven feet wide and eight feet high. Between the row of eight wood panels and the row made up of the brick columns and swinging doors there is a crescent shaped booth made of wood, which apparently serves as a place for selling tickets. But this should suffice for an iteration of points of dissimilarity between this structure and a tent. The others may be picked out of the description which we print in our statement. It will be seen that the element of portability is sadly lacking, and that other materials, to wit, wood and glass and brick, have been added to the skin and canvas-covering of the genus tent, connoted by the definitions of the cases and of the lexicographers. Clearly this structure cannot be made a tent merely by calling it a tent, even though touching a matter to an extent analogous, one Squeers of Dotheboys Hall sapiently observed that "there is no law to prevent a man from calling his house a hall if he wants to do so." [Nicholas Nickleby, reported by Charles Dickens.]

So, examined by the touchstone of similarity of earmarks, we must conclude that the structure in controversy is not a tent, as the latter word is generally understood. In passing we may say that the word "tent" as used in our statutes, numerouslly cited to us by defendant, means "tent" as the word is ordinarily understood, and therefore the language of those statutes is in no way pertinent to contradict what we say above [533] II. We turn to the definition then to determine if we can, whether within the purview of the ordinances of the plaintiff city, it is a building. We need consider only the first part of the definition, to wit: "'Building' shall be taken to mean any structure for the support, shelter, or enclosure of persons, animals, or chattels," and leave off the last, to wit: "and when separated by division walls without openings, then each portion of such building shall be deemed a separate building;" for obviously if we conclude that it is a building we are not called on to proceed further and rule that it is two buildings, even though the facts that there is a wooden stage at one end and a wood and glass ticket office and entrance at the other, seem pertinent to this view.

Looking at the legislative definition and measuring the structure here thereby, there is no escape from the conclusion that it is a building within the purpose and intent of the fire-limits ordinance, and so we rule.

III. Neither do we think that the ordinance is void for that it is unreasonable. Defendant urges this, saying, if we understand his contentions, which are somewhat vague, that should we hold that the ordinance includes a structure of the sort here in question, then such a construction renders the ordinance void because it is unreasonable and unduly burdensome. Such ordinances are referable to the police power, through an invocation of which alone are they sustainable. We are not advised wherein the alleged unreasonableness lies; neither do the cases cited by defendant throw any light upon the point. Speaking generally we may say that if such structures as that here under discussion are not to be regulated and their erection either forbidden, or at least controlled, by ordinance, there seems to be nothing in this case at least which would prevent the construction of inflammable and [534] unsightly conglomerate sheds of the same sort anywhere and everywhere in the city, and the carrying on therein of permanent businesses of whatever sort indefinitely. Such a condition is unthinkable. We need not take up space considering this phase of the case, but disallow it out of hand.

Let the case be reversed and remanded, with directions to the court nisi to overrule the motion to quash the complaint and to retry the case in such wise as is not inconsistent with the views herein expressed. All concur.

NOTE.

Legal Meaning of "Tent."

The reported case seemingly decides that it is the element of portability and the nature of the materials, which will determine the legal meaning of a "tent," and that since the first element was lacking in the structure under consideration and the materials were other than those ordinarily used in the construction of tents it was therefore a building within the meaning of a statute relating to municipal fire limits.

In Callahan v. State, 41 Tex. 43, it was held that theft from a tent was not within a statute relating to the theft of property "from a house." The structure under consideration "consisted of two forks driven in the ground with a ridge pole across which was stretched a piece of ducking; this was closed at one end by another piece of cloth hung up and was open at the other end." The court said: "Such a structure as that described by the witness would in common language be called, as it was called by the witnesses, a tent; never a house. It is not necessary in this case to make the effort to determine the exact point when a structure, from its construction and uses, would cease to be a tent, and would be taken and understood to be a house, according to the usual acceptance in common language of the word 'house;' for, as described by the witness, it comes so nearly not being even a tent, as that term is understood in common language, that it cannot be other than a tent. However difficult it might be to define in words the exact difference in some possible cases between a house and a tent, it can readily be conceived that there are houses that cannot be called, taken, or understood to be tents, and tents that cannot be called, taken, or understood to be houses; and this is one of them."

But in Killman v. State, 2 Tex. App. 222, 28 Am. Rep. 432, a prosecution for keeping a disorderly "house," it was held to be proper to refuse the following instructions: "1st. A house is any building, edifice, or structure inclosed with walls, and covered, whatever may be the materials used for building. A tent does not come within the meaning of house. 2d. If, therefore, from the evidence in this case the jury find that the place which the defendant is charged with keeping a disorderly house was not a house as defined above, but a tent, they will acquit the defendant." The court said: "A tent, in the ordinary acceptance of the word, is a pavilion, portable lodge, or canvas house, inclosed with walls of cloth and covered with the same material. One of the definitions of a house, given by Webster in his invaluable dictionary, is that it is 'a place where guests are received and entertained for compensation.' The description given by the witnesses of the structure in which defendant is charged with keeping a disorderly house is that 'it is a large tent of canvas, supported by poles let into the ground; the walls and roof are of canvas, the floor is of plank.' The defendant kept the place, had a bar there, received the money over the counter, and all the women who resorted there were prostitutes or whores.

. . . The decision in [the] case [of Callahan v. State] was mainly made to depend upon the particular facts and circumstances of that particular case; that the structure therein described, from which the property was stolen, could in no manner be considered a house. The language quoted, however, does in our opinion equally as well convey the idea that there are tents which can be called, taken, and understood to be houses, and the tent described in this case we think is, if there ever was such an one, just one of those tents. . . . We can well imagine why such a building as that described in Callahan v. State would not be considered such a house as would support a charge of theft from a house. The prominent controlling idea connected with that offense was that everything contained in the building was, and should be, protected securely and sacredly by the walls inclosing it; which idea could not attach to a structure which, in the language of the court, 'came so near not even being a tent . . . that it could not be other than a tent.' The controlling idea in the offense under consideration is that the structure is a place 'kept for the purpose of public prostitution, or as a common resort for prostitutes and vagabonds.' To hold that such a house could not be kept in a tent, and especially in such a tent as that described in the evidence in this case, would be in effect to close up all bawdy and disorderly houses, simply because they were made of wood, brick, or stone, and to give free and unrestrained license to all those who desire to carry on the illegal business in pavilions of the richest material, or tents of ordinary canvas or cloth, no matter how large and commodious, or how many and richly-furnished rooms or compartments they might contain. Such structures are more apt to become disorderly nuisances than houses of brick or stone, owing to the facility with which noises made within could be heard from without. . . . Taking the whole instruction together, as asked, we do not think the court erred in refusing to give it."

A tent was held to be a "private residence" in Hooper v. State (Tex.) 105 S. W. 816, wherein the court reversed a judgment convicting one for gaming in violation of a statute prohibiting gaming in a place other than a private residence. And see Hipp v. State, 45 Tex. Crim. 200, 75 S. W. 28, 62 L.R.A. 973.

In Blakemore v. Stanley, 159 Mass. 6, 33 N. E. 689, the erection of a tent was held to be in violation of the terms of a deed which restricted the grantee from erecting a "building" to cost not less than a specified sum, far in excess of the cost of the tent. See also Favro v. State, 39 Tex. Crim. 452, 46 S. W. 932, 73 Am. St. Rep. 950, wherein it was held that a wagon sheet stretched over forked poles, which poles were nailed to planks, and the planks in turn nailed to stakes driven in the ground, the structure being used as a residence, was a house, within a burglary statute defining a house, as any building or structure erected for public or private use, of whatever material constructed.

In Tatum v. State, 156 Ala. 144, 47 So. 339, the defendant was convicted on an affidavit charging him with betting "at a game played with cards or dice, in a public house, highway or some other public place, or an outhouse where people resort," in violation of a statute against gaming. The evidence tended to show that the playing took place in a tent where any and all persons could come in and did come in without invitation or knocking at any time of the day or night, thus making it a "public place" within the meaning of the statute against gaming. In Davys v. Douglas, 4 H. & N. (Eng.) 180, 28 L. J. M. C. 193, 7 W. R. 327, wherein it was held that a booth theater which was of a portable nature, carried by a company of strolling players from place to place, and which was constructed of canvas and wood, was not a "house or other place of public resort for the public performance of stage plays" within a statute. To the same effect see Fredericks v. Howie, 1 H. & C. (Eng.) 381. See also Fredericks v. Payne, 1 H. & C. (Eng.) 584, 32 L. J. M. C. 14, 8 Jur. N. S. 1109, 7 L. T. N. S. 329, 11 W. R. 36.

STATE EX REL. BURNS

v.

LINN.

Oklahoma Supreme Court—December 14, 1915.

49 Okla. 526; 153 Pac. 826.

Municipal Corporations — Charter — Effect as Superseding State Laws.

The provisions of the charter of the city of Tulsa, adopted under the authority of section 3a, art. 18, of the constitution (section 329, Williams' Ann. Const.), and section 539, Rev. Laws 1910, supersede all laws of this state in conflict with such charter provisions, in so far as such laws relate to merely municipal matters.

Same.

Such charter provisions do not supersede the general laws of the state of general concern, in which the state has a sovereign interest, and where the provisions of said charter conflict with the general laws of the state of this character, such laws will prevail.

Relation of State to Municipality — Enforcement of Laws.

The state has a sovereign interest in the enforcement of its general laws against the traffic in intoxicating liquors, against gambling and prostitution, within the territorial limits of the city of Tulsa.

Municipal Officers — Removal — Failure to Enforce Laws.

The state may impose upon the local officers of the city of Tulsa specific duties in the matter of the enforcement of the laws of the state having force and effect within the city, and may provide penalties for failure to discharge such duties, and in respect to the duties so imposed the municipality and its officers are the agents of the state, and subject to its command and control at all times, and may be removed for a failure to enforce such laws.

[See note at end of this case.]

Procedure for Removal — Charter Remedy Not Exclusive.

The provisions in the charter of the city of Tulsa for the removal of the chief of police of such city are not exclusive, but such authority is cumulative to and concurrent with the jurisdiction vested in the district court by the general laws of the state.

Statutes — Requisites — Certainty.

The provisions of chapter 39, as amended by chapters 26 and 133, Session Laws 1913, are not void for uncertainty in respect to the duties therein imposed upon police officers.

Public Officers — Who Are State Officers — Officer of Municipality.

The general rule, in the absence of special constitutional provision, is that all officers whose duties pertain to the exercise of the police power of the state are in that sense state officers, and under the control of the legislature, even though they may be officers of a municipality and charged with the enforcement of the local police regulations of such municipality.

Original action for writ of prohibition. Foster N. Burns, relator, against Conn Linn, District Judge, defendant. The facts are stated in the opinion. WRIT DENIED, AND PETITION DISMISSED.

S. P. Freeling, Smith O. Matson and J. H. Miley for defendant.

[527] HARDY, J.—On November 12, 1915 there was presented to the district court of Tulsa county, by a grand jury duly impaneled therein, an accusation in writing charging the plaintiff, as chief of police of the city of Tulsa, with habitual and willful neglect of duty and willful maladministration in office, in that he failed and refused to perform the duties expressly enjoined on him in reference to the enforcement of the prohibition laws of this state and the laws with reference to gambling and the keeping of bawdyhouses or the renting or letting of buildings for such purpose, in which accusation it was alleged that the plaintiff had knowingly, willfully, and unlawfully failed, neglected, and refused to enforce the laws mentioned, and had knowingly allowed and permitted violations thereof, both as to violations of the liquor laws and laws against gambling, and that he had likewise allowed and permitted a large number of houses to be let, rented, and operated as bawdyhouses, and had allowed and permitted a large number of women to openly, continuously, and notoriously maintain and operate houses of prostitution in said city, in violation of the law, and had for many months prosecuted a system whereby the keepers of such houses and inmates thereof were compelled to forfeit a bond or pay at intervals a fine to the city of Tulsa, with the implied understanding between [528] them and the plaintiff that they should receive immunity from arrest and prosecution for a period of about one month from the date of each payment, and that said sums were accepted in reality as a license whereby such persons paying the same were permitted to violate the laws in regard to such violations, and the grand jurors prayed the court for judgment and decree ousting and removing the plaintiff from office, and that pending a hearing thereof plaintiff be suspended until final determination be had.

Plaintiff filed in this court his petition for a writ of prohibition against defendant, as judge of the district court of Tulsa county, prohibiting him from hearing said accusation and from removing him from office in accordance with the prayer thereof. To this petition is attached a copy of the accusation, setting out in detail the various acts alleged against him. The defendant filed a demurrer to the petition, and upon the issues thus joined the matter was submitted to the court.

The question presented is whether, under the provisions of the charter of the city of Tulsa, which contains provisions for the removal from office of various city officials, the jurisdiction of the city is exclusive, or whether, under the general statutes of this state, jurisdiction is vested in the court to entertain that proceeding. The plaintiff contends that the provisions of the charter and the ordinances adopted thereunder, authorizing a removal of the city officers, confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the city, and that such charter provisions and ordinances supersede and displace the general laws of the state in reference to such matters, and that plaintiff, as chief of police of the city of Tulsa, is not amenable to said general laws, nor subject to the jurisdiction of the [529] district court in the trial of the accusation presented by the grand jury.

The city of Tulsa, under section 3a, art. 18, of the Constitution (Williams' Ann. Const. section 329), duly adopted a charter prepared as therein provided, which was approved by the Governor and became the organic law of the city. By this charter provision was made for the organization, conduct, and control of a system of police and other city officials, and for the removal from office of such officials; and thereafter ordinances were adopted by said city, organizing a police force, providing for the appointment, prescribing the duties, and fixing the salaries of the chief of police and other members of the police force, and regulating the manner of their removal. That it was within the power of the city under its charter provisions to adopt these ordinances is not questioned, and defendant concedes that by virtue thereof in matters purely local and municipal the provisions of the charter and ordinances govern. He insists, however, that under the general statutes of this state it was the duty of plaintiff, as chief of police of said city, in addition to his duties under the ordinances of said city, to enforce the general laws of the state referred to, within such city, and that for a failure or neglect thereof he was subject to removal under the general laws of the state.

By section 3631, Rev. Laws 1910, it is made the duty of all police officers to enforce all of the provisions of chapter 39 of said laws, relating to intoxicating liquors, which chapter has been amended by chapters 26 and 133, Sess. Laws 1913, and it is provided that, should any such officer fail or refuse to perform any duty required by the provisions of such chapter, he shall be removed from office as therein provided; and said section authorizes [530] the filing of a petition in the district court of the county wherein such officer resides, in the name of the state, on the relation of any citizen thereof, upon the recommendation of a grand jury, or on the relation of the board of county commissioners, and the procedure for hearing and determining such proceeding when instituted is set out therein. And it is further provided by section 3633 that all police officers in any city or town, having notice or knowledge of any violation of such chapter, shall notify the county attorney of the fact of such violation, and furnish him the names of persons by whom such violations can be proven, and for a failure or neglect of official duty in that respect such officer may be removed from office, as provided by law. By section 2510 it is made the duty of all police officers to inform against and prosecute all persons whom they believe from credible information to be offenders against the gambling laws of the state, and it is provided that any such officer failing or omitting to do so may be punished by a fine of not exceeding $500, and not less than $50. By sections 2467 and 2469 the keeping of a bawdyhouse, or knowingly letting a building for such purpose, is prohibited, and the punishment prescribed therefor. Section 5592 provides that:

"Any officer not subject to impeachment, elected or appointed to any state, county, township, city, town, or other office, under the laws of the state may, in the manner provided in this article, be removed from office for any of the following causes: First. Habitual or willful neglect of duty. . . . Sixth. Willful maladministration."

Section 5593 provides the manner of removal and authorizes an accusation in writing by the grand jury to the district court of the county in which the officer is elected, and the procedure for the trial thereof is set out [531] in subsequent sections of said article. By the provisions of section 3a, art. 18, of the Constitution, when a charter has been adopted in the manner therein provided, such charter becomes the organic law of such city and supersedes any existing charter and all amendments thereof, and all ordinances inconsistent therewith. It is provided, however, in the same section that said charter shall not be in conflict with the Constitution and the laws of the state. Section 539, Rev. Laws 1910, which was in force when the charter was adopted, provides that where such charter has been framed, adopted, and approved, when any of its provisions shall be in conflict with any law or laws relating to cities, in force at the time of the adoption and approval thereof, the charter provisions shall prevail, and operate as a repeal or suspension of such law or laws, to the extent of such conflict, and further provides that such charter shall be consistent with and subject to the provisions of the Constitution, and not in conflict therewith, and not in conflict with the laws relating to the exercise of the initiative and referendum and other general laws of the state not relative to cities of the first class.

These constitutional and statutory provisions have been construed by this court in a number of cases, and it has been the uniform holding of the court that the provisions of a charter adopted and approved in accordance with such constitutional and statutory provisions become the organic law of such municipality and supersede the laws of the state in conflict therewith in so far as they attempt to regulate merely municipal matters. Owen v. Tulsa, 27 Okla. 264, 111 Pac. 320; Lackey

v. State, 29 Okla. 255, 116 Pac. 913; Mitchell v. Carter, 31 Okla. 592, 122 Pac. 691; Oklahoma R. Co. v. Powell, 33 [532] Okla. 737, 127 Pac. 1080; In re Simmons, 4 Okla. Crim. 662, 112 Pac. 951. And it has been further held that such charter provisions, where they conflict with the general laws of the state, must give way, and, while they may run current with the general laws of the state, they may not run counter thereto. Board of Education v. State, 26 Okla. 366, 109 Pac. 563; State v. Cummings, 47 Okla. 44, 147 Pac. 161.

The charter of the city of Tulsa was under consideration by this court in the case of Owen v. Tulsa, supra, and by the Criminal Court of Appeals in Re Simmons, supra, and it was held in each case that the provisions of said charter did not supersede the general laws of the state not relating to cities. This being the construction placed upon these provisions and upon the Tulsa city charter, it then becomes necessary to determine whether the laws with reference to intoxicating liquors and gambling and prostitution above set out are matters that are merely municipal in their nature, or whether they are such matters as are of concern to the state at large, and in which the state has a sovereign interest for the benefit of the people of the state generally. The history of the prohibition laws of this state is well known, and it is only necessary to make a brief reference thereto. One of the terms of the Enabling Act required that the state, as one of the conditions of statehood, should prohibit the manufacture, sale, barter, giving away, or otherwise furnishing intoxicating liquors, except as therein authorized, within that part of the state then known as the Indian Territory, and also the Osage Indian reservation and all other parts of the state which existed as Indian reservations on the 1st day of January, 1906, for a period of 21 years from the date of the admission of the [533] state into the Union. In accordance with this requirement, at the time the proposed Constitution was voted upon, a separate prohibition article was submitted to the people, which was adopted, and has ever since been a part of the organic law of this state. The laws against gambling and prostitution are general, and intended to operate throughout the entire state, and such statutes are police regulations necessary for the maintenance of the public peace and the good order of society, and are matters in which every citizen of the state has an interest, and are not local and confined to the municipality of Tulsa, to be regulated by its charter provisions and ordinances to the exclusion of the general laws of the state upon the subject. In Thurston v. Caldwell, 40 Okla. 206, 137 Pac. 683, the present Chief Justice, in discussing a similar question then under consideration, said:

"But even those who press this view most extremely acknowledge the absolute supremacy of the Legislature in many matters of chiefly local interest, in which, nevertheless, the state has a sovereign interest, among which may be mentioned state control over local police protection. . . ."

See also In re Ambler, 11 Okla. Crim. 449, 148 Pac. 1061.

In Lackey v. State, supra, this court approved and followed the rule in Missouri, construing a similar provision in the Constitution of that state (section 16, art. 9), authorizing cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants to frame charters for their local government, consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of that state. The Missouri court holds that a charter adopted by a city under the authority of the constitutional provision mentioned superseded the statutes of the state [534] where they conflicted as to purely municipal regulations. Kansas City v. Marsh Oil Co. 140 Mo. 458, 41 S. W. 943; Brunn v. Kansas City, 216 Mo. 108, 115 S. W. 446. But where such provisions conflict with the general laws of the state in matters where the state has a sovereign interest, or affect matters of general concern, the state laws control. State v. Kansas City Police Com'rs, 184 Mo. 109, 71 S. W. 215, 88 S. W. 27. The Legislature passed laws creating a board of police commissioners for the city of St. Louis, and in discussing such laws, in State v. Mason, 153 Mo. 23, 54 S. W. 524, the court said:

"Laws like these and those of other states providing a metropolitan police system for large cities are based upon the elementary proposition that the protection of life, liberty, and property and the preservation of the public peace and order in every part, division, and subdivision of the state, is a governmental duty which devolves upon the state, and not upon its municipalities, any farther than the state in its sovereignty may see fit to impose upon or delegate it to the municipalities. The right to establish the peace and order of society is an inherent attribute of government, whatever its form, and is co-extensive with the geographical limits thereof, and touching every part of its territory."

The Minnesota decisions are in harmony with the rule in Missouri, and in the case of State v. Robinson, 101 Minn. 277, 112 N. W. 269, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1127, the court, after discussing the relative powers of a city under a charter form of government and of the state for handling various matters of purely municipal concern, with which the state did not concern itself, said:

"But in so far as the general laws of the state operate and have force and effect within the municipality, and the officers thereof are charged with their enforcement, the municipality and its officers are the agents, and subject [535] to the command and control, of the state government at all times. The Legislature may impose upon the local officers specific duties in the matter of the enforcement of the laws of the state and prescribe penalties for a failure to perform the same. Indeed, the efficient administration of the law, adopted for the welfare of the state at large, renders it imperative that the state, as guardian for the people as a whole, should possess and exercise this . . . control. Its absence would lead to a failure of law enforcement, so essential to the good order of society and the protection of property and property rights. That the state, when creating a municipal subdivision for local self-government, retains this general supervisory control over the affairs thereof, except so far as expressly or by fair implication surrendered, there can be no serious question."

The general rule, in the absence of special constitutional provision, is that all officers whose duties pertain to the exercise of the police power of the state are in that sense state officers, and under the control of the Legislature, even though they may be officers of a municipality and charged with the enforcement of the local police regulations of such municipality. 28 Cyc. 296. Counsel at the bar in oral argument of this case declined to discuss the question as to whether the enforcement of the prohibition and gambling laws and laws against prostitution were purely municipal, or whether they affected the state at large, taking the position that the sole question for our determination was one of jurisdiction, being whether the general laws of the state enacted for the removal of delinquent police officers are valid and operate within the territorial limits of the city of Tulsa, or whether the provisions of the charter and ordinances are exclusive. We have already shown that it is within the power of the state to enact laws for the police protection of its citizens, which laws shall be effective [536] throughout the state and all of its subdivisions, and coextensive in their operation with the territorial limits of the state, and that such laws would be effective in the city of Tulsa, and the provisions of the charter and ordinances of said city could not operate as a repeal thereof. It is true that the city might enact ordinances, not inconsistent with the state laws, regulating such matters within its territorial limits, and make suitable provisions for the enforcement thereof, and provide for the removal of officers charged with the duty of enforcing such regulations who should fail in the discharge of that duty. This does not mean, however, that the state has completely abdicated all authority in the premises and delegated full and unrestricted control over such matters to the local officials. If the contention of plaintiff be admitted, it destroys the uniformity and efficiency of the police power of the state, leaves these matters subject to the sole management of the local authorities, and would permit a condition to exist in a city with such charter entirely different from and at variance with the conditions in other parts of the state; and if the officers of a city which has adopted a charter are not in sympathy with the enforcement of such laws, or other laws of like character, were the enforcement of said laws left entirely in their hands, it is easy to see that such laws, or indeed any law, might become a dead letter, and their enforcement a farce, and wholesale violations thereof might occur with the knowledge and consent of the city officials.

Neither can we give our consent to the contention that the provisions in the charter for the removal of the city officers is exclusive, and arrests the jurisdiction of the court to hear the accusation presented by the grand jury. While under the provisions of the charter the [537] petitioner might be removed in accordance therewith by the board of city commissioners, this does not necessarily oust the jurisdiction of the court to proceed in the manner complained of. The authority in the board of commissioners may exist concurrent with the jurisdiction of the court. The proceedings before the board are of an administrative character (Coffey v. Superior Ct. 147 Cal. 525, 82 Pac. 75), while the procedure in the district court is judicial in its nature, and must be conducted in the manner pointed out in the statute. Such remedies are cumulative and are concurrent, and the court has jurisdiction to hear and determine the accusation presented, notwithstanding the provisions of the charter and ordinances. This question was presented to the Supreme Court of Minnesota in the case of State v. Robinson, supra, and that court held that the charter provisions did not oust the jurisdiction of the court to entertain proceedings for the removal of the mayor of the city of St. Cloud. The case of Coffey v. Superior Ct. supra, involved a like question. The charter of the city of Sacramento made provision for the control of city officers charged with misconduct and for their removal from office. The Penal Code of the state also made provision for the removal of delinquent officers. The court held the charter provisions and the provisions of the general law to be concurrent, that the removal was not purely a municipal affair, and that the superior court had jurisdiction under the general laws, which was consistent and concurrent with the jurisdiction of the city under the provisions of the charter.

Plaintiff cites the case of Dinan v. Superior Ct. 6 Cal. App. 217, 91 Pac. 806, and Craig v. Superior Ct. 157 Cal. 481, 108 Pac. 310, holding that charter provisions [538] for the removal of police officers supersede the general law conferring jurisdiction upon the superior court. Both of these were California cases, and were decided after the case of Coffey v. Superior Ct. After the decision in the Coffey Case the Constitution of California was amended by adding to section 16, article 20, the following proviso:

"Provided, however, that in the case of any officer or employee of any municipality governed under a legally adopted charter, the provisions of such charter with reference to the tenure of office or the dismissal from office of any such officer or employee shall control."

And section 8½, article 11, of the Constitution of that state expressly provided that it should be competent to make provision in freeholders' charters—

"for the manner in which, the times at which, and the terms for which the members of the boards of police commissioners shall be elected or appointed, and for the constitution, regulation, compensation, and government of such boards and of the municipal police force."

These provisions are not found in our Constitution. Other decisions holding that the power to remove municipal officers vested in the governing bodies of the municipality and that vested by the general laws in the courts are concurrent and are not exclusive the one of the other, are as follows: Mancker v. Faulhaber, 94 Mo. 430, 6 S. W. 372; State v. Walbridge, 119 Mo. 383, 24 S. W. 457, 41 Am. St. Rep. 663; State v. Wells, 210 Mo. 618, 109 S. W. 758; State v. Noblesville, 157 Ind. 31, 60 N. E. 704; State v. Adams, 46 La. Ann. 830, 15 So. 490; State v. Civil Dist. Ct. Judge, 50 La. Ann. 655, 23 So. 886.

Plaintiff also relies upon the case of Hodges v. Tucker, 25 Idaho 563, 138 Pac. 1139, decided by the [539] Supreme Court of Idaho. The case is not in point, for the reason that in section 7459, Rev. Code of Idaho, no provision was contained relating to municipal officers, and the court held that there was no attempt or intention, either expressed or from which a presumption could be entertained, to confer jurisdiction upon the district court to hear and determine a case growing out of a violation of a city ordinance or a neglect of duty to enforce a city ordinance, in cities that had organized and accepted the provisions of the Black Law. The matters complained of in that case were a failure to enforce certain ordinances of Boise City relative to the keeping and maintaining of bawdy-houses. The court further decided that Laws 1911, c. 82, known as the Black Law, indicated an intention upon the part of the Legislature to provide a complete system within itself, in which provision was made for the removal of the officer in question, and that the procedure therein was exclusive.

The case of Hilzinger v. Gillman, 56 Wash. 228, 105 Pac. 471, 21 Ann. Cas. 305, decided by the Supreme Court of Washington, was to the effect that the provisions in the charter of the city of Everett for the recall of certain officers was valid and not in conflict with the provisions of the Constitution of that state (article 5, section 3) providing that all officers not liable to impeachment should be subject to removal for misconduct and malfeasance as provided by law.

Counsel contend that section 5592 only applies to officers elected or appointed under the laws of the state, and inasmuch as plaintiff holds office under the city charter, and was not elected or appointed under the state laws, said section has no application, and confers no jurisdiction upon the district court to entertain the proceedings [540] therein pending. Section 3631 contains complete procedure for the removal of police officers failing to enforce the prohibition laws of the state, independent of section 5592. Section 3633 imposes certain duties upon police officers, and for a failure or neglect of duty in the enforcement of chapter 39 relating to intoxicating liquors authorizes their removal in the manner provided by law. This has reference to the procedure contained in sections 5592 and 5593, authorizing the removal of the officers therein named for the causes and in the manner specified. By the inclusion in its charter of provisions for the removal of its police officers the city might take to itself exclusive jurisdiction for the removal of such officers for neglect of duty in enforcing its local regulations and for causes purely municipal, but by the adoption of such charter could not relieve such officers from the obligation to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the general laws of the state, nor deprive the state of its authority to compel an enforcement of such laws by a removal of the officers charged with the enforcement thereof for neglect or failure in that respect.

The language of the California court in Conn v. Richmond, 17 Cal. App. 705, 121 Pac. 714, 719, quoted in Dunham v. Ardery, 43 Okla. 623, Ann. Cas. 1916A 1148, 143 Pac. 331, L.R.A.1915B 233, to the effect that the tenure of office and method of removing city officials were purely municipal matters, was written by that court after the California Constitution had been amended as hereinbefore indicated and in the light of those constitutional provisions, and was cited by Mr. Justice Riddle, who wrote the opinion of this court in support of the conclusion, reached in that case, that a provision in the charter of the city of Guthrie for the recall of city officials was [541] valid and was not in conflict with the Constitution and laws of this state.

The holding in Lackey v. State, supra, that the election of municipal officers was a matter of merely municipal concern, means that the state has delegated to the local municipality regulations of the method of selecting its local officers, but does not intimate that the state may not impose upon police officers such duties as it has in reference to the enforcement of its police regulations prescribed for the protection and maintenance of the public peace and safety, and for a failure to perform such duties may not provide for their removal from office.

The contention is further made that the statutes under which the accusation was presented are void for uncertainty, in that it appears that no specific duties are imposed upon the plaintiff. This contention we think it without merit.

Counsel urge upon us the importance of a correct decision in this case, and view with alarm the far-reaching consequences which they fear will follow a denial of the writ. We are not unmindful of the fact that the question is an important one, and yet it is not new in this state, for in the various decisions of this court heretofore rendered the rule is well established that the provisions of a city charter adopted under the constitutional and statutory authority do not suspend or supersede the general laws of the state relating to matters of general state concern or involving the exercise of the state's sovereignty, and it was specifically decided in Thurston v. Caldwell, supra, that the state has a sovereign interest in local police regulation, and certainly the enforcement of [542] the laws relating to liquor, gambling, and prostitution are matters within the sovereign power of the state, which it has not seen fit, either by the Constitution or the statutes, to completely surrender into the hands of city officials, and the power to enforce obedience to its statutes is necessarily an inherent attribute in the power to enact them, for if it be once conceded that the state may not by proper measures enforce its regulations, the regulations themselves become futile and ineffective, except so far as the sentiment of any particular community may demand that the same be enforced, or so far as the officers thereof may see fit so to do, according to their particular personal views upon the matter. We do not apprehend that any dire consequences will follow a pronouncement upon our part that the state still has the right to compel an enforcement of its wholesome police regulations in each and every part of the state, and that officers may not with impunity neglect the duties imposed upon them by law, at their pleasure.

The demurrer is sustained, the writ is denied, and the petition dismissed.

All the Justices concur.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that the failure of a municipal chief of police to enforce the laws with reference to the sale of intoxicants and the keeping of disorderly houses is a sufficient ground for his removal in a proceeding by the state. Despite a home rule charter the state retains, it is held, its inherent sovereign interest in the enforcement of the laws of the state within the limits of a municipality, and the municipal officers are for the purpose of such enforcement agents of the state and amenable to removal by it. Failure to enforce the law as a ground for the removal of a public officer is discussed in the note to State v. Donahue, Ann. Cas. 1913D 18. See also the recent case of State v. Howse, Ann. Cas. 1917C 1125.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF ALBUQUERQUE

v.

STOVER.

New Mexico Supreme Court—March 30, 1915.

21 N. Mex. 453; 155 Pac. 905.

Bills and Notes — Agreement to Extend — Construction — Necessity of Consent of Holder.

A promissory note, containing the provision that "all parties hereto, . . . agree that this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us, and after such extension, the liability of all parties shall remain as if no such extension had been made," grants no power to the maker or other parties to the note to extend the time of payment without the consent of the payee or holder.

[See note at end of this case.]

Effect on Negotiability.

A provision in a note in the foregoing form does not render the note non-negotiable under the law merchant or the provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Law (Law 1907, c. 83).

[See 17 Ann. Cas. 52; Ann. Cas. 1914B 210; 125 Am. St. Rep. 185.]

Bona Fide Purchasers — Circumstances Putting One on Inquiry.

The general principles, running throughout the whole law, that notice of facts which should put one upon inquiry and which, if followed up with diligence and understanding, would lead to the truth, have no application to the question of good faith in the taking of negotiable instruments. The question in such cases is, Did the holder have actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounted to bad faith? Suspicious circumstances, negligence, or wilful ignorance may be evidence of bad faith from which the jury may find the fact. The holder, however, will be protected unless, at the time he took the paper, he had reason to believe, and did believe, there was some defect or infirmity in the paper. The facts in this case examined and held not to authorize a finding that the appellant bank did not take the note in good faith; there being no substantial evidence to support any such finding.

Proof of Bona Fides — Sufficiency.

Sections 646, 649, 653, Code 1915, applied, and held that the plaintiff bank, under the circumstances, took the note in question charged with the burden of proof that it took the same in the course. Held further, that under the proof, that burden had been successfully met. Held further, that where the evidence was all one way, and the witness stands unimpeached in any way, his evidence is to be taken by this court as true in determining whether there is any substantial evidence to support the verdict.

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Bernalillo county: MECHEM, Judge.

Action by First National Bank of Albuquerque, plaintiff, against Roderick Stover, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

A. B. McMillen for appellant.

F. E. Wood and E. W. Dobson for appellee.

[456] PARKER, J.—A promissory note was made and delivered in the following form:

Albuquerque, N. M., Jan. 5, 1911.

6250.00

On or before two years after date I promise to pay to the order of W. H. Gillenwater at Montezuma Trust Company six thousand two hundred fifty and no 100 dollars, with interest at the rate of six per cent per annum from April 1, 1912, until paid, payable semi-annually, with ten per cent additional on the amount unpaid as attorney's fees, if placed for collection in the hands of an attorney. All parties hereto and all indorsers hereof waive grace and protest and all appraisement laws and agree that this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us, and after such extension, the liability of all parties shall remain as if no such extension had been made.

Payable at the Montezuma Trust Company, Albuquerque, N. M.

[Signed] Roderick Stover.

Action was brought on the note by the plaintiff as indorsee, claiming to be a bona fide holder for value without notice and prior to maturity. The answer admitted the execution and delivery of the note, but alleged, by way of defense, that the note was given in payment for shares of stock in a bank of which the payee of the note was the head, under a proposed scheme for its reorganization and the increase of capital stock; that it was agreed between the parties that proceeds arising from the sale of said stock should be deposited with and held as a special [457] deposit by the Montezuma Trust Company until the reorganization should be completed; that if the defendant would purchase 50 shares of the new capital stock for the sum of $6,250, his note would be accepted therefor, payable at such time as he desired, and that if for any reason it was not convenient for him to pay the note when it became due, he might extend the same from time to time until such further time as he desired; that said note would not be used, delivered, put into effect, or considered valid or in force until the entire $200,000 of capital stock should be fully subscribed; that said note was accordingly given in payment for a subscription for 50 shares of the stock in the said corporation contemplated to be organized; that the said corporation was never organized or created, nor were any other subscriptions to the stock thereof ever secured or paid for; that thereafter, in violation of this promise and agreement with the defendant, the payee of the note fraudulently and without authority indorsed the said note to the plaintiff in this case for the sole personal use and credit of the said payee; that the plaintiff had full knowledge and notice of all of the facts hereinbefore stated, and took the said note charged and chargeable with full knowledge and notice thereof and of each of said facts. The plaintiff replied, denying that it took the said promissory note with knowledge of the facts and alleged that the same was delivered to the plaintiff for full value in due course of business. At the close of the trial each party moved for a directed verdict in his favor, and the court thereupon directed a verdict for the defendant. The only testimony given in the case was that of the vice-president and manager of the plaintiff bank, designed to show that the bank took the note as collateral security for a present loan made to payee of the note at the time, and in good faith without any notice of the facts alleged in the answer by way of defense. The motion of the defendant for a directed verdict was upon the ground that the note was without consideration, and that the note itself by its terms is not a negotiable promissory note, and that the plaintiff, therefore [458] took it chargeable with all the defenses and equities which would have been good as between the original parties. The grounds of the motion in behalf of the plaintiff for a directed verdict in its favor are not stated. A verdict was rendered by the jury, in accordance with the instruction of the court, in favor of the defendant. The motion for a new trial was filed and overruled, and the plaintiff appeals.

It is apparent that the question involved is a very narrow one. The position of the defendant is clearly shown by his motion for a verdict in his favor. It is based upon the proposition that the note was without consideration, or rather that the consideration therefor failed, which facts are admitted by the pleadings. Upon the state of the pleadings it is clear that the original payee had no cause of action upon the note against the defendant. The defendant further urged upon the trial court that the form of the note is such that it is a non-negotiable instrument. Therefore, it is argued, that it was impossible for the plaintiff to become the holder in due course so as to cut off the defenses which would be available as between the original parties to the note. The argument is made by counsel for appellee that the note is non-negotiable for two reasons, viz.: (1) It contains a provision that the maker shall have the right to extend the maturity of the note from time to time at his pleasure, thus rendering the time of payment indefinite and uncertain; (2) even if the power to extend the time of payment is conferred by the terms of the note, upon the payee or holder alone, yet this renders the time of payment indefinite and uncertain and destroys the negotiability of the note. On the other hand, counsel for appellant argues that no such power is conferred upon the maker, and he denies appellee's second proposition entirely.

The language employed in the note is certainly unfortunate. It provides that:

"All parties hereby . . . agree that this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us."

[459] The maker of the note is certainly one of the "parties." The maker certainly has the power to extend the time of payment of the note by the express terms of the contract, in so far as the terms used give that power. But is the grant of power to the maker to extend the time of payment an absolute grant of that power regardless of the consent of the holder? It would seem that the answer is determinable by a proper definition of the words "may be extended." It is a matter of common knowledge and practice that an extension of the time of payment of a note is accomplished by the concurrence of the payee or holder, and some one or more of the other parties to the contract. The actual extension of the time is effectuated by the agreement of the payee or holder. The maker or indorsers cannot extend the time unless the payee consents. If it is intended to give to the maker absolutely the right to extend, a provision is sometimes inserted that he may have the right to an extension for a certain specific time, or according to whatever the contract may be between the parties. The provision then in this contract that "this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us," in the light of commercial custom and usages, as well as common knowledge, is the equivalent of saying that "this note may be extended, with the consent of the payee or holder, from time to time," etc., because it is a contradiction in terms to say that a note may be extended without the consent of the payee or holder, unless the contract provides in terms that the maker shall have the right to an extension. The words "without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us" can clearly have no application to the payee or holder. As before seen, there can be no such thing as an extension without his consent. The extension is effectuated by the making of a new contract between the parties, except in those cases where the right is given in terms to the maker, and a granting of the extension is, in such case, but the performance of a contract already made. That this is the sense in which the word "extended" was [460] used by the parties is made more manifest by the following clause:

"And after such extension liability of all parties shall remain as if no extension had been made."

There could be no liability on the part of the payee or holder, and the words used clearly indicate that the object of all of the provisions in regard to extensions were inserted simply to avoid the consequences, under the law merchant, of an extension without the consent of the indorsers or sureties. They do not grant the arbitrary right to the maker or other parties to the note to extend the same at their will and against the consent of the payee or holder; they simply provide that, in case of extension, they agree that their liability shall remain unchanged. It follows that the payee or holder of this note may insist upon payment of the same when due, and that there is consequently no uncertainty as to the time of payment, by reason of any right conferred upon the maker.

We are aware that this interpretation does violence to the naked letter of the contract. It provides that the note may be extended by "any one" of the parties without the "knowledge or consent" of any of the others. Then the maker may mentally resolve to extend the note indefinitely, and, without the knowledge or consent of the payee, may effectuate an indefinite extension, thereby rendering the contract an empty shell, devoid of meaning or efficiency. If such were the sense in which the word "extended" was used by the maker and payee in this case, they must be convicted of a foolish and vain act, if not an intention to carefully prepare a trap for the unwary. But no such presumption can be indulged. They are to be presumed to have intended to put out an ordinary note, expressing the ordinary binding contract of this kind.

Not much, if any, direct precedent is to be found in the cases, because no such language, probably, was ever before used in a note. Some of the cases, however, are valuable for their statements of the principles governing these matters.

[461] In Pomeroy First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 116 N. W. 341, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, 17 Ann. Cas. 52, the note in question contained the provision that: "The makers and indorsers herein severally . . . consent that the time of payment may be extended without notice."

It was argued that under this provision the holder of the note might, without notice, extend the note indefinitely, thereby rendering the time of payment uncertain and the note consequently non-negotiable. The court said: "It is strenuously argued that the use of the word 'makers' in the waiver admits of an extension being made at any time on the part of the holder, by a mere secret mental process unknown to any other party. This may be true as a psychological fact, but we do not deem it so as a matter of practice in commerce and banking. To us it is quite clear that it has the same effect as though the note read 'on the 1st day of October, 1903, or thereafter on demand,' in which case there would be no question of its negotiability. Holders of notes do not, by a secret mental process, make an extension of the time of payment, but such extension, if made at all, is made by an agreement between the principal debtor and the holder of the paper, either with or without the consent of the indorsers."

In National Bank of Commerce v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 83 S. W. 368, the note in question contained the provisions that: "The makers and indorsers hereof hereby severally . . . agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to holder."

The Texas court said: "If, as argued, the effect of the stipulation is to give the right to the maker, without the consent of the holder, or to the holder without the consent of the maker, to appoint another date of payment and thereby extend the time, it may be that it would render the instrument not negotiable. But we do not think it capable of that construction. It does not say that either the holder or the maker may extend the note. It merely makes a provision in case the time of payment may be extended. How extended? It seems to us that the extension meant is that which takes place when the debtor and creditor make an agreement upon a valuable consideration for the payment of the debt on some days subsequent to that previously stipulated. The obvious purpose of the provision [462] taken as a whole was merely to relieve the holder of the paper from the burdens made necessary by the rigid requirements of the mercantile law in order to secure the continued liability of the indorsers and sureties upon the paper. Therefore what was meant by the stipulation as to extension of time was simply that in case the holder and the maker should agree upon an extension, the sureties and indorsers should not be discharged. The holder and maker of any note may, at any time, agree upon an extension; therefore the fact that they may have that right does not affect the negotiability of the paper. . . . So in that case, the time at which the maker may elect to pay is uncertain, but the time at which the holder may demand payment is certain. It follows that if the holder has the absolute right to demand payment at a certain date, the note is negotiable."

In Longmont Nat. Bank v. Loukonen, 53 Colo. 489, 127 Pac. 947, Ann. Cas. 1914B 208, the note in question contained a provision that: "The makers and indorsers hereof hereby . . . agree to any extensions of time of payment and partial payments before, at or after maturity."

The court said: "The provision under consideration does not mean that the holder can arbitrarily extend the time of the payment of the note as he may see fit, over objection by the maker, nor can the latter make an extension without the consent of the holder."

In Navajo County Bank v. Dolson, 163 Cal. 485, 126 Pac. 153, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787, the note in question provided that: "We agree that after maturity this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us, and after such extension the liability of all parties shall remain as if no such extension had been made."

The court, in speaking of this provision, says: "There is nothing uncertain in this note about the date of maturity. The provision refers only to something that may be done by the maker, if the holder agrees thereto, 'after maturity.' Clearly the provision referred to is in no way binding upon the holder of the note. No one can reasonably claim that the effect thereof is to give the maker the right to extend the time of payment, without the consent of the holder. The note was dated April 23, 1908, and by its terms, [463] unaffected by anything in the provision referred to, was to mature 'nine months after date,' at which time the holder, so far as anything contained therein is concerned, had the absolute right to insist on payment. There was no provision under which the time so specified could be changed, or the right of the holder to insist on payment at such time he held to be affected. Where the time is thus definitely and irrevocably fixed at which the note shall mature and the holder shall be at liberty to compel payment, we are unable to see how a provision, looking to a possible agreement between the parties after maturity, for an extension, renders the executed note at all indefinite or uncertain as to the time when it is payable."

The interpretation of the language which is identical with the note here in question, in this regard, is exactly as we have interpreted this one. The fact of the slight difference in the phraseology in the other regard in no way affects the reasoning in the California case.

In Missouri-Lincoln Trust Co. v. Long, 31 Okla. 1, 120 Pac. 291, the note contained the provision that: "The makers . . . consent that the time for payment may be extended without notice thereof."

The court holds that the provision does not make a note non-negotiable, relying upon Pomeroy First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 116 N. W. 341, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, 17 Ann. Cas. 52, supra, and other cases for authority.

In Stitzel v. Miller, 250 Ill. 72, 95 N. E. 53, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1004, Ann. Cas. 1912B 412, the note contained the provision that: "We also agree that in case said note is not paid at maturity, it is at the option of the holder hereof to extend, as he deems proper, the payment of the above note, and that said extension shall not in any manner release one or either of us from the payment hereof."

The court says: "The contention that said quoted words gave the holder the authority to extend the note as he pleased, that it could not be known what extensions he might grant, and that therefore the time when the note became due . . . was uncertain and undeterminate, rendering the note non-negotiable, cannot be sustained. The note expressly provides that such option to extend can be exercised only upon the failure of the payors to make payment at its maturity."

[464] the decision is based upon the proposition that until the note matures no person under its terms had power to make an extension of time for payment, and contains an expression to the effect that, if there was authority to extend the note before maturity, it would render the note non-negotiable.

A much more serious question arises under appellee's second proposition. It is apparent that if a provision is inserted for extensions at or after maturity, they can have no effect upon the negotiability of the note, because at maturity the note ceases to be negotiable by operation of law. It therefore becomes immaterial that a provision is inserted that, after the maturity of the note, the sureties and indorsers shall not be discharged in case the note is extended. This is clearly pointed out in the Illinois and California cases, cited supra.

But where there is a provision authorizing extensions prior to maturity, then a more serious proposition is presented. If the note may be extended from time to time at will during the period prior to maturity, then the time of payment becomes uncertain and indefinite. It is upon this proposition that, in a majority of the states, we believe, a note like the one here in question is held to be non-negotiable. Thus in Smith v. Van Blarcom 45 Mich. 371, 8 N. W. 90, the note contained a provision that: "The makers and indorsers of this note expressly agree that the payee, or his assigns, may extend the time of payment thereof indefinitely, as he or they may see fit."

The court, per Campbell, J., said: "By the terms of this note, which must be read subject to the condition, it was not payable absolutely three months after date or at any other one time. The time of payment could be postponed not merely once, but as often as either Charles H. Van Blarcom or his assigns might think it desirable. There is nothing on the face of the note whereby any one can tell, either directly or by reference to any particular event, at what period this paper will become absolutely payable. We cannot conceive how this can be treated as not payable on a contingency."

[465] In Richmond Second Nat. Bank v. Wheeler, 75 Mich. 546, 42 N. W. 963, a note containing a similar provision was likewise held to be non-negotiable. In Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Ia. 348, 13 N. W. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 685, the note contained a provision that: "The makers and indorsers of this obligation further expressly agree that the payee, or his assigns may extend the time of payment thereof from time to time indefinitely, as he or they may see fit."

The court said: "But the note before us may never fall due, for payment may be extended indefinitely. . . . By regarding such paper as non-negotiable no prejudice will result to the mercantile and financial business of the country, but sharpers will be defeated in their attempt to swindle the confiding and unwary, a result in accord with sound policy and good morals."

In Farmer v. Graettinger Bank, 130 Ia. 469, 107 N. W. 107, the note contained the provision that: "Sureties hereby consent that time of payment may be extended from time to time without notice thereof."

The distinction drawn in this case is evidently based upon the fact that in the former there was an agreement to an extension, but in the latter there was merely an agreement that the surety should not be discharged in case an extension should be granted. In Glidden v. Henry, 104 Ind. 278, 1 N. E. 369, 54 Am. Rep. 316, the provision for extensions are the same as in the Michigan case, supra, and the court said: "In the case before us, all parts of the note must be looked to in determining the quality of the paper. There is a promise to pay in 12 months, but that promise is not certain and unconditional. The other clause is that the time of payment may be extended indefinitely, as the parties may agree. From an inspection of the note, it is impossible to tell when it may mature, because it is impossible to know what extension may have been, or may hereafter, be agreed upon."

In Coffin v. Spencer, 39 Fed. 262, the provision in the note was practically the same as in the Michigan [466] and Indiana cases, and the Circuit Court for the District of Indiana said: "The latter I think the true reading, and it means that at any time before or after maturity of the note by its terms, or by the terms of any agreement for renewal or extension, the holder, whether the payee or any assignee, may, by agreement with the maker, or with an indorser or other party liable on the paper, renew or extend the date of payment 'from time to time,' that is to say, definitely, without prejudice ultimately to his remedies against any of the parties. Every successive taker of the paper is, of course, bound to take notice of this stipulation, and, instead of looking only to the face of the instrument for the time of its maturity, as in case of commercial paper he must, is put upon inquiry whether or not any agreement for a renewal or extension of time has been made by his proposed assignor or by any previous holder. . . . The note in suit, it seems clear enough, cannot be deemed negotiable."

In Union Stockyards Nat. Bank v. Bolan, 14 Idaho 87, 93 Pac. 508, 125 Am. St. Rep. 146, the provision in the note is as follows: "No extension of time of payment, with or without our knowledge, by the receipt of interest or otherwise, shall release us or either of us from the obligation of payment."

The court said: "This is an express contract to the effect that the time of payment may be extended to any one or all of the sureties, guarantors, indorsers, or makers of the note, without notice to all or any one of them. This undoubtedly renders the note non-negotiable under all the authorities that have been brought to our attention on the subject."

In Rossville State Bank v. Heslet, 84 Kan. 315, 113 Pac. 1052, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 738, the provision of the note was that: "Each signer and indorser makes the other an agent to extend the time of this note."

The court refers to the former case in that state of City Nat. Bank v. Gunter, 67 Kan. 227, 72 Pac. 842, in which the provision appeared in the note that: [467] "The makers and indorsers . . . agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to holder."

In discussing the case under consideration, and the Gunter Case, the court said: "Interpreting 'signer' to mean 'maker,' and the agency of each maker and indorser to act for the other, as equivalent to a consent to the action of either to an agreement for extension made by another, the only material difference discernible is that in the Gunter Case the note stated that the extension might be made before or after maturity, while in this case it authorizes the extension without stating when it may be made. The precise inquiry suggested is whether the authority to extend here given may be exercised only after maturity. If so, the time is fixed for payment; for the promise, apart from this clause, is to pay on January 1, 1909, and an authority to extend afterwards would only amount to a waiver of the right to be relieved from liability for an extension without such authority. If, however, the clause is to be construed as giving the parties named the right to extend the time before maturity, its effect would be precisely the same as though the words 'on or before' had been inserted, and the rule of the Gunter Case would apply. . . . The vice of the stipulation in question is that the day of payment cannot be determined. The signer (maker) or any indorser may, at any time he sees fit to do so, as agent one for another, extend the time for payment by agreement with the holder. The payee in transferring the note may become an indorser, and therefore an agent for the maker, and his indorsee may in turn, become an indorser with like power, so that the time of maturity must be indefinite, and not determinable from the instrument."

See further many cases collected in a note to Pomeroy First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 Ann. Cas. 52.

It clearly appears from the reading of the foregoing cases, and many others which we have examined, that in the opinion of those courts the uncertainty as to the time of payment, which is held to render the note non-negotiable, arises out of the fact that there is an agreement in the note that the same may be extended prior to maturity. The fact that such extension of the time of payment is contemplated and provided for is held to render the time of payment so uncertain as to destroy the negotiability of the instrument. On the other hand, there is a line of cases, mostly more modern, which takes an opposite view of provisions of this kind. They are based upon the proposition [468] that the time of payment within the meaning and requirement of the law merchant and the negotiable instrument law is certain or determinable, whenever the time at which the payee or holder may demand payment is certain or determinable. We have before seen that, under the terms of this instrument, in this case, the payee or holder is entitled to demand payment on the day specified therein, there being no right on the part of any other party to the instrument to compel him to extend the same against his consent. The Texas case, heretofore cited and quoted from, is one of the leading cases adopting the latter position. The North Dakota case is another leading case to the same effect. In Missouri-Lincoln Trust Co. v. Long, the Supreme Court of Oklahoma announces its adherence to the same doctrine that so long as the payee or holder may insist upon the payment of the note at maturity, there is no uncertainty as to the time of payment, citing the Texas case, supra, and Missouri cases. In Longmont National Bank v. Loukonen, supra, the makers and indorsers agreed to any extensions of time of payment before, at, or after maturity. The Colorado court in that case adopts the reasoning of the Texas and North Dakota courts, and says: "The time of payment of this note, by its express terms, is certain. A definite time when the holder may demand payment is stated, and the period of maturity is fixed. There is nothing in the note which gives the maker, or any one else, a right to demand an extension, or which binds the holder to give it. We are unable to perceive how the mere fact that the signers and indorsers undertake to be bound by any extension of time of payment, which may thereafter be settled upon, takes from an instrument in all other respects commercial paper, its negotiable character. Any agreement for an extension, not appearing in the instrument and unknown to a purchaser for value before maturity, would not defeat his right to demand payment of the note according to its original terms.

. . . The sole purpose of the stipulation is for the protection of the holder, by continuing the liability of both maker and indorser in case of extension. . . . A legal right exists in the maker and holder of any negotiable instrument to agree to an extension, and the fact that such legal right exists does not make the paper non-negotiable; no more should the fact that the maker's consent to an extension, which he always has the legal right to give, is [469] expressed in the note, but which does not in fact constitute an extension, have such effect. To hold that an undisclosed agreement to extend destroys the obligation to pay a note according to its terms, thus making the time of payment uncertain, in the hands of a bona fide holder for value before maturity, would be contrary to every principle of justice and fair dealing. Such would be the effect of declaring this instrument non-negotiable."

The court cites the Missouri, North Dakota, Texas, and Oklahoma cases, before referred to.

In City Nat. Bank v. Goodloe-McClelland Co. 93 Mo. App. 123, the note provided that: "The makers and indorsers agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to the holder."

The court held that this provision did not impair the negotiability of the note.

We propose to adopt what, we are free to admit, is the minority doctrine, at least so far as numbers of states are concerned, because we believe the doctrine to be founded in reason and to be the best suited to business and commercial usage. It is a matter of common knowledge that it is the general, if not the universal, custom of banks to insert provisions of a similar nature to the ones inserted in the note in question, whenever they loan money. We cannot see that harm can come to the people of the business world by holding this note to be a negotiable instrument. On the other hand, we can see that harm may come from unduly hampering business transactions of this kind. If a banker must insist upon payment of a note at maturity or otherwise lose the security of indorsers upon commercial paper, then the borrowers of money from banks will inevitably suffer great inconvenience, and often great loss. This is apparent to all who have had experience or observation in commercial transactions of this kind. Nor will this holding operate as a restraint upon the dealing in commercial paper for the reason that under sections 52 and 56 of our negotiable instruments law (chapter 83, Laws of 1907) the assignee cannot take such paper and lose the benefit of its negotiable character unless he [470] has actual knowledge of the infirmity or defect, or knowledge of such facts that his action in taking the instrument amounts to bad faith. A simple inquiry in good faith of the payee or holder of negotiable paper as to whether the same had been extended by the parties thereto would, we assume, be held to constitute such assignee a holder in due course. It follows that the judgment of the district court in holding that the instrument was non-negotiable was erroneous.

It is urged by counsel for appellant that this court should now enter judgment for the plaintiff upon the note in question. It appears, however, from the pleadings that the question of taking of the note by the plaintiff in good faith or bad faith was in issue, but was not decided by the court, the court having directed a verdict for the defendant upon the sole proposition that the note was non-negotiable, and that therefore there was no question as to the good faith or bad faith of the plaintiff, in taking the note, for determination by the jury. It is argued, on the other hand, by counsel for appellee, that the action of the court in directing a verdict for the defendant was a finding that the burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff in regard to good faith in the taking of the note had not been met. We think not. The district court, at the instance of counsel for the defendant, held that the note was non-negotiable, and that therefore it was subject, in the hands of plaintiff, to all of the defenses set up in the answer. The plaintiff, of course, denied the allegations in the answer that it had taken the note in bad faith, and introduced proof on the issue. But this issue has never been submitted to a jury, nor decided by the court. It is therefore apparent that the cause must be retried.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded to the district court, with instructions to award a new trial; and it is so ordered.

Roberts, C. J., and Hanna, J., concur.

ON REHEARING.

(January 11, 1916.)

[471] PARKER, J.—In the last section of the opinion we determine that the question as to whether the plaintiff took the note without notice, and in good faith had not been determined in the court below, and consequently we remanded the cause for a new trial. A later examination of the record, however, discloses that in this we were in error, and for that reason we have granted a rehearing.

At the close of the case each party moved for an instructed verdict in his favor, the defendant specially submitting the case on the "basis of all evidence." This necessarily submitted to the court the evidence on the question of notice and good or bad faith on the part of the appellant in taking the note. The appellant does not resist this proposition, but, on the contrary, insists that the evidence submitted authorizes and requires a judgment in its favor. Appellee, of course, argues that the evidence authorized the direction of a verdict in favor of appellee upon this point, and that the action of the court cannot be disturbed here. There is a controversy between counsel as to the issue tendered by the answer. It was alleged in the answer that: "The said plaintiff had full knowledge and notice of all of the facts hereinabove stated, and took the said note charged and chargeable with full knowledge and notice thereof, and of each of said facts."

In the reply the appellant denied this allegation of the answer, and alleged that it acquired said note for full value in due course of business prior to its maturity, and without knowledge of any defect or want of consideration or other defects claimed by said defendant. Upon this state of the pleadings the appellant argues that there was tendered the sole issue of notice or want of notice to the appellant of the infirmities in the paper, and that no issue of bad faith in taking the note was tendered by the pleadings. The appellee contends that the allegations of the answer are broad enough to tender the issue both of actual notice and of knowledge of such facts that the taking of the instrument amounted to bad faith. In view of [472] the disposition which we will make of the matter, we do not deem it necessary to determine specifically whether the issue tendered was narrowed by the pleadings, as claimed by the appellant, or not, and the case will be treated as if the pleadings tendered both issues.

One M. W. Flournoy, vice-president and manager of the appellant bank, was the only witness who testified upon these subjects. He flatly denied that he or the appellant bank had any knowledge or notice of the defects or infirmities of the paper at the time the bank took the same; the business having been done entirely between the holder of the note and the witness as such vice-president and general manager. Upon cross-examination the witness was not shaken in any particular from the position which he took on direct examination in this regard. The issue then as to whether the appellant bank had notice of the infirmities of the paper at the time it acquired it may be dismissed from further consideration, there being no evidence of any kind in the record to support a finding that it did have such notice, and, on the other hand, evidence given all showing that it did not have such notice.

Upon cross-examination the witness Flournoy was pressed for facts which might show that he was aware of the financial condition of the payee, and the general condition of his business affairs, from which it was thought to be inferred that the note was taken in bad faith. He was asked whether he did not know, prior to taking the note, that the Montezuma Trust Company, of which the payee of the note was the head, was in bad financial condition, and that the payee was endeavoring to reorganize the same with additional capital. The witness admitted that he knew that the Montezuma Trust Company was doing business under unfavorable conditions; that he had declined to join in the reorganization of the same, and supposed that the plan had been abandoned. He testified that the Montezuma Trust Company appeared to be in financial difficulty. He further testified that the payee presented the note, and asked a loan of $5,000 with the note as collateral security, which was made, and the proceeds placed [473] to the credit of the Montezuma Trust Company according to the custom of years; the payee not having a personal account with the appellant bank. The note was upon a printed blank, with the Montezuma Trust Company named as payee, and it was interlined, substituting the name of the payee for that of the Montezuma Trust Company. The note was payable on or before two years from date, and the witness testified it was not customary for the appellant bank to discount such note, but it was customary to take the same as collateral. The note provided for semi-annual interest, but the witness did not demand interest for about one year after the date of the note. He explained the failure to demand the interest by saying that, the note being held as collateral security, the bank did not attend to the collection of the interest promptly, as it would in case the bank really owned the note. The witness said he understood the maker of the note to be a man of means, and knew nothing about his business affairs, or whether he had needs to raise money on notes, and made no inquiry of the payee as to how he came to have the maker's note. This is the substance of the testimony of the witness Flournoy, on this subject on cross-examination. The most that can be said for this evidence is that the bank failed to make inquiry of the payee how or why he came to have such a note of the maker. That the bank did not take the note in bad faith in the sense that it knew of these infirmities, and attempted to defraud the maker to its advantage, or that of the payee, is apparent. The evidence points to no other conclusion. The bank simply failed to inquire of the payee how or why he had such a note, either through negligence, or carelessness, if, indeed, it was its duty to so inquire, or under suspicious circumstances.

Appellee argues that while gross negligence is not the same thing as bad faith, it may be evidence of the same and, in this case the appellant bank having been negligent, or being aware of suspicious circumstances, these facts are sufficient to support a finding of bad faith in taking the note. He relies upon Goodman v. Harvey, 4 Ad. & El. 870, 31 E. C. L. 212; Ward v. City Trust Co. 192 N. Y. [474] 61, 84 N. E. 585; McNight v. Parsons, 136 Ia. 390, 113 N. W. 858, 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 15 Ann. Cas. 665; In re Hopper-Morgan Co. 156 Fed. 525; and 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments (6th ed.) § 776.

In Goodman v. Harvey, supra, the bill was given by the defendants to a shipowner for freight. It was presented for acceptance by an agent of the holder, and acceptance was refused, and the bill was protested. The bill was then returned to the payee, and was again put out by him, and was discounted by the plaintiff. When it became due, it was presented to the makers, and payment refused, and it was thereupon again protested for nonpayment. The jury, in answer to a question from the Lord Chief Justice, said that in their opinion the notarial marks on the bill were sufficient notice to an indorsee of nonacceptance. The court said: "The question I offered to submit to the jury was whether the plaintiff had been guilty of gross negligence or not. I believe we are all of opinion that gross negligence only would not be a sufficient answer where the party has given consideration for the bill. Gross negligence may be evidence of mala fides, but it is not the same thing. We have shaken off the last remnant of the contrary doctrine. Where the bill has passed to the plaintiff without any proof of bad faith in him, there is no objection to his title. The evidence in this case as to the notarial marks could only weigh as rendering it less likely that the bill should have been taken in perfect good faith."

In Willis v. England Bank, 4 Ad. & L. 32, 31 E. C. L. 19, it is said: "A doctrine has, indeed, prevailed that the person taking a negotiable instrument must show that he used such caution as a prudent man acquainted with business would exert; but this gave rise to many complicated questions, and the law has now nearly reverted to the old rule, which was that of certainty and convenience, that the bona fide holder of a negotiable instrument for value is entitled as against every one. It would probably be considered now, if the precise point arose, that the real question was bona fides. . . . It would, perhaps, be more correct to say that the same facts might raise the presumption of gross negligence or that of fraud. The facts might show a determination to wink at anything."

[475] In Ward v. City Trust Co. supra, the trust company had representatives on the board of directors of a corporation, and two of the officers of the corporation used the funds of the corporation for the payment to the trust company of their personal obligations to it. The transaction was on its face apparently without authority on the part of the officers of the bank. The court said: "It is not enough for the trust company to part with value by surrendering the note and collateral, for it was bound to act in good faith in order to get good title. . . . Bad faith in taking commercial paper does not necessarily involve furtive motives; for it exists when the purchaser has notice of facts which, if unexplained, would show that he was taking the property of one who, to quote again from Paviour case, 'owed him nothing, in payment of a claim that he held against some one else. . . . Even if his actual good faith is not questioned, if the facts known to him should have led him to inquiry, and by inquiry he would have discovered the real situation, in a commercial sense he acted in bad faith, and the law will withhold from him the protection that it would otherwise extend.'"

The court said further: "The presumption was against the transaction, and, as we have seen, unless the presumption was overcome by reasonable inquiry, the transaction, unlawful in fact and unlawful on its face, is presumed to have been known to the trust company to be unlawful."

In McNicht v. Parsons, the note was delivered by the maker to the payee under agreement that it should not be negotiated until it was ascertained whether a certain fact came to pass, and in case it did not, the note was to be void and to be returned to the defendant. The question was whether the holder and plaintiff was a holder in good faith. It appears that the plaintiff in that case was really a dummy, and the note was indorsed to him for the express purpose of avoiding such defenses as the defendant might make against the holder of the note. The plaintiff made no attempt to assert the good faith of his purchase, or to negative the fact that he had notice of any defense thereto. The trial court directed a verdict for the plaintiff upon the ground that there was no evidence of bad [476] faith in the taking of the note. The judgment was reversed. It is said by the court: "It is equally true that, if the facts shown have any fair tendency to show bad faith, the question remains one of fact, and not of law. It is especially the case where the evidence of fraud is sufficient to put the burden of showing good faith on the holder."

In re Hopper-Morgan Co. supra, it appeared from an agreed statement of facts that the plaintiff purchased the note in a peculiar way, under peculiar circumstances, and with knowledge that the note had been issued for some particular purpose, not disclosed, but that Mugler, who had disposed of it to Prescott, from whom the claimant obtained it, was not the owner, and had the right to use it as collateral merely. The court said: "If the purchaser of the note has actual knowledge of the infirmity in the note, or want of title in the one from whom he takes it, that, of course, ends the case. If he has no such actual knowledge, then bad faith or a willful disregard of known facts showing the infirmity or want of title or a willful evasion of knowledge of the facts, will be sufficient to defeat recovery. Facts sufficient to create a suspicion of the truth are not sufficient to show knowledge or bad faith, nor is mere gross negligence in making inquiry, or in failing to make inquiry, alone, sufficient. There must be either actual knowledge or bad faith. Bad faith may be shown by a willful disregard of and refusal to learn the facts when available and at hand."

It is apparent from what has been shown as to the facts in each of the foregoing cases that they have no application to a case like the one under consideration. In each of those cases, except, perhaps, the English cases, there was something about the nature of the transaction itself which excluded and prevented any dealing concerning the same in good faith. In the case at bar there was nothing whatever about the nature of the transaction which called for explanation; it bore no evidence whatever of illegality or fraud, but was the usual and ordinary commercial transaction. Mr. Daniel, in discussing this proposition, uses the following language: "It thus appears that the majority rule, referred to in the [477] foregoing discussion, that there must have been actual notice or bad faith, has been codified in those states which have enacted the statute. According to that rule, and under the statute, mere suspicion of defect of title or knowledge of circumstances which would excite suspicion in the mind of a prudent man, or even gross negligence on the part of the taker of the instrument, at the time of transfer, will not defeat his title. While neither gross negligence, nor knowledge of suspicious circumstances, of itself constitutes bad faith as matter of law, it is evidence from which bad faith may be inferred, and such facts, when proven, may be considered by a jury in arriving at the ultimate fact of good or bad faith. What constitutes this actual knowledge of bad faith, under the statute, has been the subject of judicial discussion. Bad faith in taking commercial paper, it has been said, does not necessarily involve furtive motives. It may be shown by a willful disregard and refusal to learn the facts when available and at hand, and if a purchaser of a note for value before maturity has notice of facts tending to show defenses to the same, he cannot purposely refrain from making inquiries as to the inception of the paper, and at the same time claim to be a bona fide purchaser." 1 Daniel, Nego. Ins. (6th ed.) § 776.

Appellant cites a multitude of cases upon the general doctrine that there must be either actual notice, or bad faith to defeat a holder of commercial paper. A few of them only will be cited. Murray v. Lardner, 2 Wall. 121, 17 U. S. (L. ed.) 857; Swift v. Tyson, 16 Pet. 1, 10 U. S. (L. ed.) 865; Goodman v. Simonds, 20 How. 343, 15 U. S. (L. ed.) 934; Pittsburgh Bank v. Neal, 22 How. 96, 16 U. S. (L. ed.) 323; Cromwell v. Sac County, 96 U. S. 58, 24 U. S. (L. ed.) 681; Shaw v. North Pennsylvania R. Co. 101 U. S. 564, 25 U. S. (L. ed.) 892; Swift v. Smith, 102 U. S. 442, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 193; Second Nat. Bank v. Morgan, 165 Pa. St. 199, 30 Atl. 957, 44 Am. St. Rep. 653; Cheever v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 150 N. Y. 65, 44 N. E. 701, 34 L.R.A. 69, 55 Am. St. Rep. 649; Kitchen v. Loudenback, 48 Ohio St. 177, 26 N. E. 979, 29 Am. St. Rep. 544; Jennings v. Todd, 118 Mo. 303, 24 S. W. 148, 40 Am. St. Rep. 377; Wilson v. Denton 82 Tex. 531, 18 S. W. 620, 27 Am. St. Rep. 912; Breckenridge v. Lewis, 84 Me. 349, 24 Atl. 864, 30 Am. St. Rep. 357; Youle v. Fosha, 76 Kan. 20, 90 Pac. 1091; Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873; Matlock v. Scheuerman, 51 Ore. 49, 93 Pac. 826, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 747; McPherrin v. Tittle, 36 Okla. 510, 129 Pac. 722, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 395; [478] Scandinavian American Bank v. Johnston, 63 Wash. 187, 115 Pac. 102; Reilly v. McKinnon, 159 Fed. 78, 96 C. C. A. 268. He also cites 7 Cyc. 945, and Crawford's Am. Neg. Ins. Law (3d ed.) 68. These authorities all establish the uniform doctrine that a holder of commercial paper may be a holder in due course, notwithstanding that he may have knowledge of suspicious circumstances, or may be guilty of even gross negligence in taking the paper; the question always being in such cases whether he took the paper in good faith or bad faith.

It is apparent, however, from what has been heretofore seen in the original opinion and herein, that this fundamental, underlying proposition is not quite the proposition involved in this case. The question in this case is whether there was sufficient evidence before the trial court to authorize a finding that the plaintiff bank took the note in bad faith. In other words, the question is, Had the trial court or the jury made a specific finding that the plaintiff bank did not take the note in good faith, is there any substantial evidence in the record upon which such a finding could be based? We do not think that there is any such evidence. As has been before pointed out, this transaction was the ordinary business transaction dealing with commercial paper. There was nothing about the note itself to call attention of the plaintiff bank to any infirmity in the same. There was nothing about the circumstances or the relations of the parties which called for explanation on the part of the payee, or which even was calculated to arouse suspicion on the part of the bank. The witness Flournoy testified that he treated the transaction exactly as he would treat any other of the same character, and that he knew nothing irregular or defective about the note. Owing to the condition of the record, we are put in the position of sitting as a jury or a trial court, and passing upon these facts. After careful examination of the testimony, and a thorough consideration of all legitimate inferences which could be drawn therefrom, we are compelled to say that there is no substantial evidence in the record authorizing a finding of bad faith on [479] the part of the bank. A fine discussion of this same question is to be found in 3 R. C. L. p. 1071, § 277, et seq. It is there said: "It is a general principle, running through all branches and subjects of the law, that one will be charged with notice of a fact who has information which should have put him upon inquiry, if, by following up such information with diligence and understanding, the truth could have been ascertained. . . . It is now well settled, however, that the doctrine of notice, as it affects good faith of transactions generally, does not apply to negotiable instruments."

Detroit Nat. Bank v. Union Trust Co. 145 Mich. 656, 108 N. W. 1092, 116 Am. St. Rep. 319, is cited, wherein it is said: "It is a general rule, applicable to transactions not involving commercial paper, that where one has notice of facts which would put an ordinarily prudent man upon inquiry, he cannot be considered a bona fide purchaser, if he neglect to take such care of his own interests as an ordinarily prudent man would do, but that rule has not been applied to commercial paper."

A lengthy quotation from Jones v. Gordon, 2 App. Cas. (Eng.) 627, is inserted in the opinion, from which we quote the following: "But if the facts and circumstances are such that the jury, or whoever has to try the question, came to the conclusion that he was not honestly blundering or careless, but that he must have had a suspicion that there was something wrong, and that he refrained from asking questions, not because he was an honest blunderer or a stupid man, but because he thought in his own secret mind, 'I suspect there is something wrong, and if I ask questions and make further inquiry, it will no longer be my suspecting it, but my knowing it, and then I shall not be able to recover,' I think that is dishonesty. I think, my lords, that this is so not only by good sense and reason, but by the authority of the cases themselves."

In section 278 of 3 R. C. L. p. 1074, it is said: "He cannot be charged with notice by reason of any want of diligence on his part, even when he is in the situation where such facts could be ascertained by inquiry. . . .

Gross negligence even is not sufficient; actual knowledge of the facts which impeach the validity of the note must be [480] brought home to the holder. Knowledge, however, may be shown to have been possessed by the party either by direct proof, or by facts and circumstances that fairly lead to that conclusion, and circumstances that are not of any great probative force in themselves are admissible in connection with other proof to show guilty knowledge or want of good faith."

In section 280, p. 1075, R. C. L. it is said: "Although suspicious circumstances are not notice as a matter of law, yet the jury may find them to be so as a matter of fact, and evidence going to show the existence of such grounds for suspicion is always admissible."

See also Harrington v. Butte, etc. Min. Co. 33 Mont. 330, 83 Pac. 467, 114 Am. St. Rep. 821.

The only suspicious circumstances, if it may be called such, is the fact that this note was dated January 5, 1911, and was negotiated by the payee on January 6, 1912. It appears in the record that this note was made on January 5, 1912, and was accidentally misdated. However at the time the note was negotiated, the fact that the payee had apparently had possession of the note for a year was not mentioned. It might be argued that a man who had a good note like the one in question, and who needed money, would hardly refrain from using it for a year after its date, and that the bank should have taken notice of this fact, under the circumstances. On the other hand, if the matter was considered at all by the bank, which does not appear from the record, it might well have been inferred that the negotiating of the note one year after its date was in accordance with a perfectly honest and lawful arrangement with the maker. No inference of bad faith can be legitimately drawn from this circumstance. The question is, Did the witness, Flournoy, as the agent of the bank, know or believe at the time he took the note from the payee that it was being fraudulently put out by him, and did he willfully refrain from inquiry along that line? We have been unable, after a careful re-examination of the testimony, to put finger upon any fact from which a legitimate inference could be drawn to that effect.

This being the state of the record, we find that there is no substantial evidence upon which the district court [481] could have found that the appellant bank took the note in bad faith. There being no such evidence, it was error to so find, and for that reason the judgment will be reversed. As a matter of fact the record bears internal evidence, but not in direct terms, that the trial court did not so find, but, owing to the form in which the record is presented here, he is made to have so found, as already pointed out.

The judgment of the lower court will be reversed and the cause will be remanded to the district court, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the appellant bank as prayed in the complaint; and it is so ordered. Roberts, C. J., and Hanna, J., concur.

ON SECOND MOTION FOR REHEARING.

(March 4, 1916.)

PARKER, J.—A second motion for rehearing has been filed and is allowable, we assume, for the reason that the question to which it is directed was first considered upon the first motion for rehearing. The motion is directed to a supposed departure in the holding of the court from rules fixed by statute and the previous holdings of this court. The motion calls attention to sections 649 and 653, Code 1915, being a part of the Negotiable Instrument Act, and suggests that the court overlooked those provisions. Section 649 provides that the title of a person who negotiates an instrument is defective "when he negotiates it in breach of faith, or under such circumstances as amount to fraud." Section 653 provides that: "When it is shown that the title of any person who has negotiated the instrument was defective, the burden is on the holder to prove that he or some person under whom he claims acquired the title as holder in due course."

Section 646, Code 1915, defines a holder in due course as follows: "A holder in due course is a holder who has taken the instrument under the following conditions: . . . III. That he took it in good faith and for value; IV. That at the time [482] it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it."

It sufficiently appears, from what has been heretofore said in the two opinions heretofore handed down in this case, that the title of the payee of this note was defective, and that the plaintiff bank took the paper charged with the burden of establishing that it took the same in due course; that is to say, under the facts in this case, that it took it in good faith and for value, and without notice of any infirmity in the instrument or defect in the title of the person negotiating it. While neither of these sections of the statute were noticed in the opinion, none of the principles or rules therein mentioned were overlooked by the court. In the discussion of the matter, the exact situation herein outlined was assumed.

The question, then, before the court is whether that burden of proof resting upon the plaintiff bank has been successfully met by the proofs. In our former discussion of the evidence, we pointed out that there was no evidence in the case tending directly to show notice or lack of good faith on the part of the bank when it took the paper. We further pointed out that there was no evidence in the case from which any legitimate inference of notice or lack of good faith could be drawn. The evidence was all one way, and pointed unequivocally to lack of notice and to good faith on the part of the plaintiff bank.

Counsel for appellee, however, points out the fact that one of the important considerations before the trial court was the demeanor and character of the witness Flournoy, whose conduct and honesty in taking the paper for the bank were directly involved. The verdict of the jury was in the following form: "We, the jury, by direction of the court, find the issues in this cause for the defendant."

The answer interposed by the defendant below tendered the proposition that the plaintiff bank—[483] "had full knowledge and notice of all the facts, . . . and took the said note charged and chargeable with full knowledge and notice thereof and of each of said facts."

The reply put this allegation in issue. When the jury returned the verdict, by direction of the court, finding the issues for the defendant, it consequently found this issue as to notice against the plaintiff bank. Counsel for appellee would have the court hold, if we understand the motion, that because the character and demeanor of the witness Flournoy was one of the considerations before the court and jury, therefore there is substantial evidence in the case to support the finding of the issue of notice to the bank, as found by the jury. They say in their motion that: "His testimony alone, especially under the circumstances surrounding the transaction, was insufficient to compel the court, as a matter of law, to find the fact in accordance with his evidence."

We appreciate fully the great difference in the effect of the evidence of a witness when he appears before a trial court, where he is seen and heard, where his demeanor while testifying may be observed, and the sum total of his credibility may be ascertained, and its effect when reduced to writing and submitted to an appellate court. Untruthful witnesses seldom escape discovery, especially where their evidence is submitted to a trained man for consideration. It nevertheless remains true that this personality, demeanor while testifying, and apparent carefulness and fairness on the stand is something which cannot be committed to paper, and which is not present before a reviewing court. Here we must judge of the witness' testimony by what he is reported to have said, without the aid of this personal element in his testimony. Here in the examination of the testimony of the witness, if he stands unimpeached, either by direct evidence of his lack of veracity, or of his bad moral character, or if unimpeached by some equivocal character of his testimony or inherent improbability therein, or by some other legal method of impeachment, we must assume that his evidence is true. [484] To hold otherwise would bring us to absurd results. For example, can it be said that a finding by a trial court, or a verdict found by direction of the court against a plaintiff, where all of the evidence in the case is in his favor, and, where there is none against him, cannot be disturbed in this court because, possibly, the court did not believe the witnesses for the plaintiff, and consequently refused him the relief which he sought? Such cannot be the law. If there was a single fact in this record pointing to bad faith, or knowledge on the part of the bank, or if there were equivocation or inherent improbability in the testimony of the witness Flournoy, or if he had been impeached in some way, we might say that the court correctly found the issue as to the notice and good faith against the plaintiff bank, because he did not believe the witness Flournoy, the one witness who testified on the subject. There being no such infirmities in the testimony, there is no foundation upon which to base a finding of knowledge or bad faith on the part of the bank.

Counsel in the motion suggest that the court in its holding has departed from the established doctrine in this jurisdiction that a verdict of a jury or the finding of the trial court will not be disturbed in this court if it is supported by any substantial evidence. This has been the established doctrine of this court ever since the case of Candelaria v. Miera, 13 N. M. 360, 84 Pac. 1020, and we do not desire to depart from or modify the doctrine there stated. But, as we have pointed out in this case, there is no substantial evidence, and no legitimate inferences can be drawn from any of the evidence, to support the finding of the court and the jury under his direction that the bank had notice of the infirmities in this paper or took it in bad faith.

For the reasons stated, the motion for rehearing will be denied; and it is so ordered.

Right to Extension.

IN GENERAL.

In construing an agreement providing that the parties to a note agree to any extensions of the time of payment of the note, the courts have generally held that such a provision does not authorize the maker of the note to extend arbitrarily the time of its payment without the consent of the holder or payee, and vice versa, but merely grants an option to extend the time of payment. Uniontown Bank v. Mackey, 140 U. S. 220, 11 S. Ct. 844, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 485; Anniston Loan, etc. Co. v. Stickney, 108 Ala. 146, 19 So. 63, 31 L.R.A. 264; Navajo County Bank v. Dolson, 163 Cal. 485, 126 Pac. 153, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 787; Longmont Nat. Bank v. Loukonen, 53 Colo. 489, Ann. Cas. 1914B 208, 127 Pac. 947; Oyler v. McMurray, 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004; City Nat. Bank v. Goodloe-McClelland Commission Co. 93 Mo. App. 123; Missouri-Lincoln Trust Co. v. Long, 31 Okla. 1, 120 Pac. 291; DeGroat v. Focht, 37 Okla. 267, 131 Pac. 172; National Bank of Commerce v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 83 S. W. 368, 101 Tex. 1, 94 S. W. 328, reversing 35 Tex. Civ. 434, 80 S. W. 555. And see the reported case.

In Longmont Nat. Bank v. Loukonen 53 Colo. 489, Ann. Cas. 1914B 208, 127 Pac. 947, the promissory note in controversy contained a provision that "the makers and indorsers hereof hereby severally . . . agree to any extensions of time of payment and partial payments before, at or after maturity." The court held that this provision did not mean that the holder could arbitrarily extend the time of payment of the note as he might see fit, over objection by the maker, nor could the latter make an extension without the consent of the holder, saying: "The sole purpose of the stipulation is for the protection of the holder by continuing the liability of both maker and indorser in case of extension."

In National Bank of Commerce v. Kenney, 98 Tex. 293, 83 S. W. 368, 101 Tex. 1, 94 S. W. 328, reversing 35 Tex. Civ. 434, 80 S. W. 555, the note under consideration contained the following provision: "The makers and indorsers hereof hereby . . . agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to holder." The court said: "If as is argued the effect of the stipulation is to give the right to the maker without the consent of the holder, or to the holder without the consent of the maker, to appoint another day of payment and thereby extend the time, it may be, that it would render the instrument not negotiable. But we do not think it capable of that construction. It does not say that either the holder or the maker may extend the note. It merely makes a provision in case the time of payment may be extended. How extended? It seems to us the extension meant is that which takes place when the debtor and creditor make an agreement upon a valuable consideration for the payment of the debt on some day subsequent to that previously stipulated. The obvious purpose of the provision taken as a whole was merely to relieve the holder of the paper from the burdens made necessary by the rigid requirements of the mercantile law in order to secure the continued liability of the indorsers and sureties upon the paper. Therefore what was meant by the stipulation as to the extension of time was simply that in case the holder and the maker should agree upon an extension, the sureties and indorsers should not be discharged."

In Pomeroy First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 N. D. 326, 17 Ann. Cas. 52, 116 N. W. 341, 16 L.R.A. (N.S.) 878, the note in controversy contained a provision that "the makers and indorsers herein . . . consent that the time of payment may be extended without notice." The court said: "We are of the opinion that this provision does not extend the time of payment indefinitely or render it uncertain. The time of payment is already fixed. It is strenuously argued that the use of the word 'makers' in the waiver admits of an extension being made at any time on the part of the holder, by a mere secret mental process, unknown to any other party. This may be true as a psychological fact, but we do not deem it so as a matter of practice in commerce and banking. To us it is clear that it has the same effect as though the note read 'on the 1st day of October, 1903, or thereafter on demand,' in which case there would be no question of its negotiability. Holders of notes do not by a secret mental process make an extension of the time of payment, but such extension, if made at all, is made by an agreement between the principal debtor and the holder of the paper, either with or without the consent of the indorsers. This provision seems to us to have been inserted to protect the holder against any release of indorsers or others, by an extension without their assent, and the word 'makers' is evidently included to prevent any misunderstanding or misconstruction of the contract or failure to distinguish between makers, indorsers, sureties, and any other parties who might be or become liable thereon under certain contingencies as makers. . . . This phrase does not express an agreement to extend time, but leaves the matter of extension optional with the holder, and not obligatory upon him, and the note on its face fixes the time when it becomes due." To the same effect see Missouri-Lincoln Trust Co. v. Long, 31 Okla. 1, 120 Pac. 291, and De Groat v.

Focht, 37 Okla. 267, 131 Pac. 172, wherein the foregoing opinion is quoted with approval as decisive of the questions therein involved.

In Uniontown Bank v. Mackey, 140 U. S. 220, 11 S. Ct. 844, 35 U. S. (L. ed.) 485, it appeared that two promissory notes were made and signed by a corporation and an individual, one as principal and the other as surety, and were indorsed by the defendant for the accommodation of the principal. The company desiring to renew the notes procured the defendant to sign and deliver to the holder of the note a written agreement, whereby he consented "that the payment thereof may be extended until he gives written notice to the contrary." The court held that the agreement evidently contemplated and authorized only an extension of time which should neither discharge nor increase the liability of any party to the note. It looked to an extension consented to by both the makers of the note and leaving them both liable to pay it at the end of the extended time; and not to an extension of time by agreement between the holder and the principal maker only, which would discharge the second maker, who was only a surety, and prevent the indorser, on paying the amount of the note, from having recourse to him, as well as to the principal.

In Oyler v. McMurray, 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004, the court said: "The stipulation in this note is in these words: 'The drawers and indorsers severally waive presentment for payment, protest and notice of protest, and nonpayment of this note, and all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders to them or either of them.' This language evidently means that 'the holder or holders of this note may, before or after January 1, 1888, extend the time of its payment so as to make it payable at a later date, and the drawers and indorsers severally waive . . . all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders to them or either of them.' . . . The holder was not bound, by the stipulation, to extend the time of payment. The material and controlling fact is that the holder had the option, at any time before, as well as after, the time of payment stated in the note, to extend to the drawers and indorsers, or either of them, the time of payment."

In City Nat. Bank v. Goodloe-McClelland Commission Co. 93 Mo. App. 123, it was held that a provision in a note that "the makers and indorsers agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity without prejudice to the holder," amounted to no more than an agreement that in the event of an extension of time the holder should not be prejudiced thereby. It was held that under this agreement the holder was given the option to extend the time of payment without thereby creating a right to defend on that ground, and that, in the exercise of that option, the holder would still retain the right to fix a time when the note should become due.

In Navajo County Bank v. Dolson, 163 Cal. 485, 126 Pac. 153, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 787, the note under consideration provided as follows: "We agree that after maturity this note may be extended from time to time by any one or more of us without the knowledge or consent of any of the others of us, and after such extension the liability of all parties shall remain as if no such extension had been made." The court said: "There is nothing uncertain in this note about the date of maturity. The provision refers only to something that may be done by the maker, if the holder agrees thereto, 'after maturity.' Clearly the provision referred to is in no way binding upon the holder of the note. No one can reasonably claim that the effect thereof is to give the maker the right to extend the time of payment, without the consent of the holder. The note was dated April 23, 1908, and by its terms, unaffected by anything in the provision referred to, was to mature 'nine months after date,' at which time the holder, so far as anything contained therein is concerned, had the absolute right to insist on payment. There was no provision under which the time so specified could be changed, or the right of the holder to insist on payment at such time be held to be affected. Where the time is thus definitely and irrevocably fixed at which the note shall mature and the holder shall be at liberty to compel payment, we are unable to see how a provision looking to a possible agreement between the parties, after maturity, for an extension, renders the executed note at all indefinite or uncertain as to the time when it is payable."

In Sawyers v. Campbell, 107 Ia. 397, 78 N. W. 56, it appeared that across the face of the note in suit had been written the following: "Upon the written request of all the makers of this note, made on or before" the date of its maturity, "the payee agrees that the time of payment shall be extended six months from the maturity thereof, or note renewed for that time." The court said: "It will be observed that the provision, by its terms, was not to be effective unless 'upon the written request of all the makers' of the note, made on or before June 15, 1896. It is said that the word 'makers' did not include sureties, but the principals alone, and that the provision therefore gave to the principals the right to an extension or renewal of the note without the consent of the sureties. The argument in support of the claim that the word 'makers' was not designed to include sureties is ingenious, but not convincing. Notes may be made by both principals and sureties, as was done in this case, and the fair and reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the words 'all the makers of this note' is that they were intended to refer to all persons who had signed the note. If the meaning could be regarded as ambiguous, undisputed evidence shows that the words were intended to include the sureties. . . . The provision in question did not purport to affect the terms of the note, nor the liabilities of its signers. It was in the nature of an offer to extend the time for the payment of the note, or to renew it, on condition, however, that all the signers should unite in a written request for the extension or renewal. Until that should be done, the provision was, as to the liability of the signers, wholly without effect, and it could not have affected them in any manner without a request in writing by them. The right of the sureties to enforce payment by the principals as the maturity of the note remained intact."

In Anniston Loan etc. Co. v. Stickney, 108 Ala. 146, 19 So. 63, 31 L.R.A. 264, the note in suit contained the following indorsement: "It is hereby agreed that this indebtedness is to be extended for six months from the maturity of this note, if so desired by the makers and indorsers, upon their giving a new note similar to this." It was held that it was not payment and satisfaction of the obligation resting on the makers and indorsers which the indorsement contemplated, or which, on any just construction, could be deduced from its words. But that all that was contemplated was that the maker and indorser should have the option or privilege of extending the debt, not of paying it, by giving a new note similar to the existing note. The court said: "It was not payment of the debt, the indorsement contemplates—it was but an extension of the day or time of payment. Not a vague, indefinite extension, the time of which rested in the future negotiation or agreement of the parties, but an extension the duration of which is precisely fixed and declared. If there was not renewal, the note was payable at its maturity; if there was renewal, the time of payment was fixed and certain. Renewal, or the failure to renew, was an event which must inevitably happen. There is no force in the suggestion, that whoever might acquire the note after maturity, could not know or ascertain without inquiry, whether there had or not been a renewal. It is not contemplated that negotiable paper shall pass current after maturity, and whoever might take the note after maturity, would take it at his own peril. But whoever acquires it before maturity, would read on its face in connection with the indorsement, that there was no contingency about its payment; no uncertain event, which might or might not happen, on which duty and obligation to pay depended. That the renewal, or failure to renew, an event which must happen at the day of payment fixed by the note, and would determine no more, than whether the day of payment should be extended to a future day and time certain. . . . The time of payment is precise—the money is demandable six months after the date, or twelve months thereafter. By the terms of the note and indorsement, which are inseparable, it was to be the one or the other; and the means of ascertaining or determining whether it was to mature at the one day or the other were definitely and conclusively provided; no holder could ever be involved in doubt or uncertainty as to the happening of any contingency on which payment depended, or as to the time of payment."

But where there are no parties to the note whose consent is required before the time of payment may be extended, then a clause in the note waiving such consent as to the parties signing the note is without effect. Smith v. Nelson Land, etc. Co. 212 Fed. 56, 128 C. C. A. 512; Iowa State Sav. Bank v. Wignall (Okla.) 157 Pac. 725. Thus, in the case first cited, it appeared that the note in suit provided that "sureties consent that time of payment may be extended without notice thereof." The court said: "The time of payment of any promissory note may be extended, and no one has ever thought of urging that fact to destroy its negotiability. So the contention must come to this: That it is the extension without the consent of a party to the note which would make the time of payment as to him uncertain. If, however, there are no parties to the notes whose consent is not required before the time of payment may be extended, then the clause waiving such consent as to the parties not signing the notes cannot affect the time of payment, and we are of the opinion that the present is such a case. In other words, we are of the opinion that the language hereinbefore quoted could not, in law, have applied to any party signing the note, and that therefore it did not operate in any way to render the time of payment of the note uncertain."

In Iowa State Sav. Bank v. Wignall (Okla.) 157 Pac. 725, the note in suit provided as follows: "We, the makers, sureties, indorsers, guarantors of this note, hereby severally waive presentment for payment, notice of nonpayment, protest and notice of protest and diligence of bringing suit against any party thereto and consent that time of payment may be extended without notice thereof to any of the sureties of this note." The court held that the obvious purpose of the provision concerning waiver and consent was to relieve the holder of the notes from the burden made necessary by the rigid requirements of the law merchant, in order to secure the continued liability of the indorsers, sureties, and guarantors. It also held that all of the makers being principals, primarily obligated to the payee or indorsee of the note as well as inter sese, and there being no sureties, guarantors, or indorsers, the provisions with respect to waiver and consent were intended for, and so could be construed to include, those whose relations entitled them to the rights of those secondarily, as distinguishable from those primarily, liable. And there being among the obligors none who were secondarily liable, the provisions with reference to waiver and consent were without field for operation, and without effect on the negotiability of the note.

However, in Union Stock Yards Nat. Bank v. Bolan, 14 Idaho 87, 93 Pac. 508, 125 Am. St. Rep. 146, the note in suit provided as follows: "The sureties, guarantors, and indorsers of this note severally waive presentation for payment, protest and notice of protest. No extension of time of payment with or without our knowledge by the receipt of interest or otherwise shall release us or either of us from the obligation of payment." It was held that this was an express contract to the effect that the time of payment might be extended to any one or all of the sureties, guarantors, indorsers, or makers of the note without notice to all or any one of them.

In Houston v. Newsome, 82 Tex. 75, 17 S. W. 603, the note sued on provided as follows: "At the maturity of this note, as above specified, I shall have the privilege of extending the time for its payment for the term of an additional two years, the interest to be due and payable as above specified, by giving the holder hereof written notice of my intention." The court held that the language of the agreement would not permit any other construction which would be fair and reasonable, than that the parties intended that the notice should be given at the time stated, and that this notice was vital to the existence of the agreement. The court held that it was left entirely at the option of the maker whether, at the maturity of the note, he would demand the extension or not, but that notice given by the filing of a petition in injunction to restrain a sale under a deed of trust given to secure the note, months after the maturity of the obligation and after failure to pay even the interest due, was not a sufficient compliance with his agreement to give the notice which he undertook to give.

Likewise in Davis v. Weaver (Tex.) 27 S. W. 902, wherein it appeared that the time of payment of a note was "one year after date, with privilege of one or two years longer," it was held that under the terms of the note, the money became due and payable at the termination of one year after the date thereof; and that if the makers desired to take advantage of the stipulation in the note for an extension of "one or two years longer," it devolved on them to notify the holders of that fact on or before the end of one year after its date.

The negotiability of a note containing a provision for an extension of the time of payment, is discussed in the notes to Pomeroy First Nat. Bank v. Buttery, 17 Ann. Cas. 52, and Longmont Nat. Bank v. Loukonen, Ann. Cas. 1914B 208.

WITH RESPECT TO TIME OF MATURITY OF NOTE.

In Coffin v. Spencer, 39 Fed. 262, the stipulation for renewal or extension of time of payment of the note in controversy was as follows: "And the payee or holder of this note may renew or extend the time of payment of the same from time to time, as often as required, without notice, and without prejudice to the rights of such payee or holder to enforce payment against the makers, sureties, and indorsers, and each of them, parties hereto, at any time, when the same may be due and payable." The court held that by the transposition of the last clause two interpretations, quite different in effect, were possible, as follows: (1) "And the payee or holder of this note, when the same may be due and payable, may renew or extend the time of payment 'from time to time,' etc.; or (2) "And the payee or holder of this note may renew or extend the time of payment, etc. without prejudice to the rights of such payee or holder, when the same is due and payable, to enforce judgment against the makers, sureties, and indorsers, and each of them, parties hereto." The latter reading the court held to be the true one, meaning that at any time before or after the maturity of the note by its terms or by the terms of any agreement for renewal or extension, the holder, whether the payee or any assignee, might by agreement with the maker, or with an indorser or other party liable on the paper, renew or extend the date of payment, "from time to time," that was to say, indefinitely, without any prejudice ultimately to his remedies against any of the parties. The court also held that every successive taker of the paper was bound to take notice of the stipulation, and, instead of looking only to the face of the instrument for the time of its maturity, as in the case of commercial paper he must, was put on inquiry whether or not any agreement for a renewal or extension of time had been made by his proposed assignor or by any previous holder.

In Whitehouse Bank v. White, 136 Tenn. 634, 191 S. W. 332, the note in suit contained a provision on the part of the obligors as follows: "We authorize the holder thereof to extend the payment of the same, or any part thereof, without impairing our joint and several liabilities, and the sureties agree to waive notice of any extension of time." The court said: "We construe the clause in the note, quoted above, to relate and give assent to extensions that may be granted at or after maturity, the date of which is set forth with certainty in the note; or to an extension which, if made prior to maturity, has operative effect as from the time the note falls due according to tenor. . . . Principle: As already observed, the note as executed is stipulated to mature on a date fixed and certain. The provision for extension does not put it in the power of the holder to extend the note without the concurrence of the maker, and the latter may not force an extension on the holder. When they concur, a new date of maturity is fixed, and one no less certain than the original date. The sureties merely assent in advance thereto and bind themselves to waive the right of defense that might otherwise accrue; or to be bound by the supplemental contract which fixes the later maturity date. There is no agreement embodied in the note operating to bind the holder to extend. There is incorporated no promise to do anything that would, of its force, affect the unconditional promise to pay on the date named in instrument. There is nothing in the note that looks towards an indefinite extension of time of payment. . . . Policy: Such a provision for extension not infrequently operates to the advantage of a surety in permitting the holder, at his option, safely to give grace to the maker, on the latter's application; when otherwise, pressure for payment might come inconveniently upon both maker and surety."

In Rossville State Bank v. Heslet, 84 Kan. 315, 113 Pac. 1052, 33 L.R.A. (N.S.) 738, the note in suit provided that "each signer and indorser makes the other an agent to extend the time of this note." It was held that interpreting "signer" to mean maker, and the agency of each maker and indorser to act for the other as equivalent to a consent to the action of either to an agreement for extension made by another, the precise inquiry was whether the authority to extend there might be exercised only after maturity. The court said: "If so, the time is fixed for payment, for the promise, apart from this clause, is to pay on January 1, 1909, and an authority to extend afterward would only amount to a waiver of the right to be relieved from liability for an extension without such authority. If, however, the clause is to be construed as giving the parties named the right to extend the time before maturity, its effect would be precisely the same as though the words 'on or before' had been inserted. . . . Counsel for the bank say: 'At most the clause in question can only be construed to give authority to the parties named to "extend" the time of payment at or after maturity by an agreement to be then made. That is what the word "extend" means.' To extend is to stretch, or stretch out. (Webster's New Inter. Dict.) As here used, it means that the time of payment may be lengthened to a date beyond that stated in the instrument. Extension of time of payment rests in contract, and the contract may be made before as well as after maturity, unless some restriction is expressed or is to be implied from the terms used. Thus the parties to a lease for one year may agree before the end of the term that it shall be extended for another year, and this may be done ordinarily in any contract or transaction involving a fixed period of time. The general authority given in this instrument is to extend the time for payment, each signer and indorser being made an agent of every other to do this. It is not stated that this shall be done only at maturity or after maturity, and it is not perceived why such a restriction should be implied, and precedent is cited for such a rule. Indeed, it would seem that extensions in such cases would ordinarily be made before the note falls due, in order to prevent the impairment of credit, and to avoid inconveniences that might arise from disappointed expectations of receiving payment. . . . If, however, extensions could be made only after maturity, the objection that it might never fall due would have no foundation, for it would necessarily fall due before an extension could be made. The vice of the stipulation in question is that the day of payment cannot be determined. The signer (maker) or any indorser may, at any time he sees fit to do so, as agent one for another, extend the time for payment by agreement with the holder. The payee, in transferring the note, may become an indorser, and therefore an agent for the maker, and his indorsee may in turn become an indorser, with like power, so that the time of maturity must be indefinite, and not determinable from the instrument."

NUMBER OF EXTENSIONS.

In several cases it has been held that a provision waiving all defenses on the ground of "any extension" of the time of payment of a note should be construed as a consent to at least one extension of the time of payment. Hodge v. Farmers' Bank, 7 Ind. App. 94, 34 N. E. 123; Oyler v. McMurray, 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004; Matchett v. Anderson Foundry, etc. Works, 29 Ind. App. 207, 64

N. E. 229, 94 Am. St. Rep. 272. Thus in the case first cited the note in suit provided as follows: "The drawers and indorsers severally waive . . . all defenses on the ground of any extension of the time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders to them, or either of them." The court held that the terms of the note must necessarily be construed to be a consent to at least one extension of time. Of a like provision in the note in suit in Matchett v. Anderson Foundry, etc. Works, 29 Ind. App. 207, 64 N. E. 229, the court said: "The indefinite extension of the time of payment, or more than one extension, and that for a definite time, is not justified by the language employed. Likewise, in Oyler v. McMurray, 7 Ind. App. 645, 34 N. E. 1004, the court said: "The term, 'any extension,' is used in the singular sense. It was not intended for an indefinite number of extensions of the time of payment. When the appellee, at the end of one year from the date of the note, extended the time of payment until January 1, 1889, such extension was in accordance with the agreement of the parties, as we have before stated, and all the parties, including appellant Oyler, were bound by it, and he was not thereby discharged. The agreement, however, contained in the stipulation in the note was met and satisfied by that extension. The other extensions, or any of them, if made as alleged, had the effect of discharging him."

It has also been held that the use of the word "any" before "extension," in such a provision, meant that one or more extensions of the time of payment were contemplated by the parties to the note. Winnabago County State Bank v. Hustel, 119 Ia. 115, 93 N. W. 70; Bonart v. Rabito, 141 La. 970, 76 So. 166 (set out at length infra in the subdivision Effect on Rights of Indorser or Surety); Pioneer Constr. Co. v. Oklahoma City First State Bank (Okla.) 158 Pac. 894. Thus, in the case first cited, the court said, with respect to a clause in the note there in suit which clause was identical with those in the foregoing cases: "There is nothing in the contention that but one extension of time was intended. The use of 'any' before 'extension' indicates that any one of an indefinite number was intended. . . . If so, then more than one extension might be allowed, and the defenses to each were waived. In the connection found the word is analogous to 'every.'"

In Pioneer Constr. Co. v. Oklahoma City First State Bank (Okla.) 158 Pac. 894, the note therein sued on contained the following clause: "The indorsers, guarantors, and assignors severally waive presentment for payment, protest, and notice of protest for non-payment of this note, and all defense on the ground of any extension of time of its payment that may be given by the holder or holders, them or either of them, or to the makers thereof." The court said: "Under this clause the bank made several extensions of the time of payment without the consent of N. S. Sherman, who claimed to have signed the note as surety, and the sole question presented for our consideration arises upon that issue. It is contended that the words 'any extension,' mean only one extension. In this we cannot agree. The use of the word 'any' before 'extension' indicates that one or more extensions of the time of payment was contemplated by the parties. The word 'any' was defined in re McNeal, 35 Okla. 17, 128 Pac. 285, wherein this court in doing so adopted the definition given by Webster's New International Dictionary, 'one indifferently out of a number,' and, as explained by that authority, 'as applied to individuals, "any" was formerly (and in dialect English is still) used pronominally for one of two, but in educated usage any and any one are now applied only to one of three or more; either and neither being used in referring to one of two.' Applying this definition to the facts in the case at bar, we find that the word 'any' preceding 'extension' would mean that N. S. Sherman waived all defenses to the note on the grounds of any number of extensions of the time of payment. . . . We therefore conclude that more than one extension might be allowed, and the defense to each extension was by the terms of the note waived."

In Rochester Sav. Bank v. Chick, 64 N. H. 410, 13 Atl. 872, the note therein sued on stipulated that "all the signers agree to be holden should the time of payment be extended." The court said: "That agreement could not have been intended for an indefinite extension of the time of payment, nor for a series of extensions from time to time, indefinitely, so that the creditors and principal makers could, at their pleasure, always keep the surety liable, and forever prevent his enforcing payment against the principal, or using the statute of limitations as a defense. Such a construction of the agreement in the note with such consequences cannot be adopted without a clearly expressed intention to that effect in the agreement itself. The time of payment fixed upon in the note is six months, and the agreement, 'to be holden should the time of payment be extended,' naturally and by the ordinary force of language, and taken in connection with the first part of the note, means a reasonable extension for a definite time, and not a series of extensions indefinite in number and endless in repetition. When the plaintiffs at the end of six months from the date of the note extended the time of payment for a definite period of time, the extension was in accordance with the agreement of all parties, all parties were bound by it, and the defendant Clark was not thereby discharged. But the agreement in the note was met and satisfied by such an extension. Any further extension upon a valid consideration and binding upon the plaintiffs, made without the consent of the surety, had the effect of discharging him."

In Smith v. Van Blarcom, 45 Mich. 371, 8 N. W. 90, the note in suit contained the following clause: "The makers and indorsers of this note expressly agree that the payee, or his assigns, may extend the time of payment thereof indefinitely, as he or they may see fit." It was held that the note was not payable absolutely at the date of maturity specified therein, or at any other one time, but that the time of payment could be postponed not merely once but as often as either the payee or his assigns might think desirable; and that there was nothing on the face of the note whereby anyone could tell either directly or by reference to any particular court, at what period the paper would become absolutely payable.

Effect on Original Terms of Note.

The principal question arising with respect to the effect of an extension or agreement for the extension of the time of payment of a note on the original terms of the note, is the rate of interest to be borne by the principal at the expiration of the extension period where a different rate is provided for that period. It is generally held that the rate specified in the agreement for the extension of the time of payment controls merely during the existence of that agreement and that at the end of that period the principal bears interest at the rate provided for in the note. Thus in Mutual Ben. L. Ins. Co. v. Daniels, 67 Neb. 91, 93 N. W. 134, the note in suit bore interest from its date at six per cent, but there was an agreement in the note that the principal sum should bear interest after maturity of the note at ten per cent per annum. It appeared that an extension agreement was entered into between the makers and the holder of the note, in which the makers agreed to pay the principal sum on a date specified therein "and also the interest thereon at the rate of six per cent per annum, . . . during said period of extension." The court said: "The agreement was for 'interest thereon [the principal sum] at the rate of six per cent per annum in semiannual payments during said term of extension.' The intention of the parties to this contract is plain, namely, that during the period of extension, granted under agreement, the provision in the antecedent agreement for ten per cent upon principal after default should be inoperative; and it must be assumed that it was intended that after default occurring upon the expiration of the extension period, the principal should draw interest at ten per cent. In other words, the extension agreement had for its sole purpose the postponement of the date of maturity of the original contract. . . . It does not appear from the agreement under consideration that the parties understood or intended that the rate of six per cent during the extension should extend beyond that period, when construed in connection with the subsisting contract when the extension was granted."

In Mueller v. McGregor, 28 Ohio St. 265, the following facts appeared: A mortgagor sold real estate to certain purchasers, they assuming to pay certain notes, made by the mortgagor to the mortgagee and secured by the mortgage, all of which were due, and amounted at that date with unpaid interest, to $11,340.05. In consideration of an extension of time by the mortgagee for one year, the purchasers agreed in writing with the mortgagee and the mortgagor, by a tripartite agreement, that they would pay interest on the amount due ($11,340.05) for that year at ten per cent, semiannually, and gave their two notes to the mortgagee for the amount of that interest, the notes being afterwards paid. It was expressly agreed that, on payment of the interest notes for that year, there would be due on the mortgage notes, at the end of the extended time, the said sum of $11,340.05, "and no more." The question was, did the debt, after the expiration of the extension, bear six or ten per cent interest? In construing the tripartite agreement, it was held that, though it was a separate instrument from the notes and mortgage, it was, according to its manifest meaning, to be limited to the extended time of one year and no longer; and that, after the expiration of that year, the only stipulation as to interest was that contained in the notes themselves, and that the agreement did not change the obligation of the notes after that time from six to ten per cent. The court said: "It is claimed by defendant in error that the tripartite agreement is substantially a contract for forbearance generally. On the other hand, plaintiffs in error urge that it is a limited forbearance, for one year only. On this point our view coincides with plaintiffs in error. To give the contract, on this question, a broader meaning, would be destructive of its plainly expressed purpose. It secured forbearance on the part of Dunlop to bring suit on his claim for one year, and provided for the payment of ten per cent interest for one year on a sum of money then agreed by the parties to be due, which sum was not to be increased or diminished for one year. They,

the parties, could have extended the forbearance for a longer time at the same rate of interest, but, as they failed to do so, it is the province of the court to declare the contract as the parties made it. . . . We are of opinion the tripartite agreement under consideration was sufficient in form and substance to impart the quality of bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent to the sum of money named as due upon the promissory notes of Fortman for one year, and for no longer time."

In North v. Walker, 66 Mo. 453, it appeared that an agreement for the extension of the time of payment of a note bearing interest after maturity at ten per cent provided that the rate should be reduced to nine per cent during the period of extension. The court held that this agreement operated only as a temporary suspension of the rate specified in the note, and that when that time expired, the rate named in the body of the note furnished the true rule for computing the interest.

In Sedgwick v. Sanborn, 63 Kan. 884 mem. 65 Pac. 661, it appeared that a note bearing interest at the rate of ten per cent was extended by agreement for three years, and the interest reduced during that period to seven per cent. In an action for the amount thereof, brought after the expiration of the extension, it was held that the holder of the note was entitled to a judgment for interest at ten per cent; that the contract reduced the rate of interest from ten per cent to seven per cent for three years only.

In Hibernia Sav. etc. Soc. v. Wackenreuder, 111 Cal. 471, 44 Pac. 168, it appeared that the contract for a loan called for interest at the rate of eight per cent compounded monthly. The defendant applied for a renewal of the loan at six per cent, which the bank rejected, but stated that the loan would be "allowed to run at six per cent." The court said: "We think the only fair construction to be placed upon the bank's agreement, or proposition to reduce the interest to six per cent, is the one placed upon it by the trial court. Before this time the note was drawing interest at the rate of eight per cent, compounded monthly. The statement of the bank to the mortgagor only proposed to modify a single term of the note, and that was the annual rate of interest. No modification of the clause of the note pertaining to the compounding of the interest was mentioned in the bank's proposition, and we are bound to conclude that no modification as to that clause was contemplated, and that the original contract in that regard remained in statu quo."

In Moffatt v. Blake, 145 Fed. 40, 75 C. C. A. 263, the facts relating to the question of interest were as follows: The note called for interest at eight per cent per annum after maturity. On March 27, 1902, which was after maturity, the interest to that time was paid and also part of the principal, and the parties entered into an arrangement evidenced by the following indorsement on the note: "Extended on or before October 1, 1902, at 6 per cent interest from March 27, 1902." The position of the holder of the note was that the reduced rate of interest was operative only between March 27, 1902, and October 1, 1902, and that after that date the interest was to be computed at the original rate. The circuit court of appeals overruling that contention concurred in the district judge's statement of the legal effect of the indorsement, viz.: "In effect, it took the place of a renewal note, due October 1, 1902, at six per cent interest. The extension was not at six per cent interest until October 1, 1902, but it was six per cent interest from March 27, 1902, and impliedly until paid, the presumption being, as in all such promissory contracts, that the debt would be paid at maturity, and if not paid the interest specified as a part of the extension agreement would continue until payment was made." The court further held that the case of North v. Walker, 66 Mo. 453 (set out supra) relied on by the holder of the note, was distinguishable in that by the terms of the extension agreement there under consideration the reduced rate of interest was to be operative only during the period of the extension.

In Rowland v. Watson, 4 Cal. App. 476, 88 Pac. 405, it appeared that at the time of the execution of a promissory note, drawing interest at seven per cent per annum from maturity, the maker and the payee entered into a written agreement to the effect that if the maker should desire an extension of time to pay the note, the payee would extend the time of payment for two months after the date of its maturity, and if the time of payment should be so extended, the maker should pay for that extension, "an additional bonus of $50 per month for each month or fractional part of a month which said note shall be extended," together with interest on the principal sum and on the bonus at the rate of seven per cent per annum. The court said: "It seems to be conceded by all parties that said contract extended the time for payment of said note for at least two months and attached a penalty or charge of $50 for each of said two months or fraction of months in addition to the regular seven per cent interest named in the note. But it is contended by appellant that a proper construction of said contract required the plaintiff to pay, in addition to the seven per cent interest, the sum of $50 for each and every month that the note remained unpaid after it fell due according to its terms; and it seems to have been upon this theory that the payment of $1,500 in satisfaction of the note was compelled by him. We cannot agree with this contention. On reading the contract it will be noticed that there was no agreement on the part of Watson to extend the time of payment for any period in excess of two months after August 1, 1903. It must be understood, then, that the agreement related only to those two months, and it was for each of those two months, or for one of those months and a fraction of the other only that this $50 monthly charge was contemplated by the parties. Immediately at the conclusion of said two months' period the defendant Watson, by the very terms of the agreement, was in a position to bring suit and enforce payment of the promissory note. The time during which he subsequently let the matter rest without beginning suit was voluntary on his part. It was not done in pursuance of the agreement and did not carry with it any right to collect any bonus of $50 for each of the months subsequent to the two months mentioned. This, we think, is a fair construction of the contract, and is strictly in accord with the very letter of its terms."

In Citizens' Nat. Bank v. Piollet, 126 Pa. St. 194, 17 Atl. 603, 12 Am. St. Rep. 860, 4 L.R.A. 190, it appeared that the following words were written across the end of a note, and on the face of it in immediate proximity to the words of the note: "This note is given for advancements, and it is the understanding it will be renewed at maturity." The court said: "The statement that it is given for advancements does not affect the certainty of the note and it could easily be regarded as a mere memorandum, not changing the contract and therefore not material. But the remainder of the writing is an agreement that the note will be renewed at maturity. As the bank is the holder and discounted the note when it was given, it is undoubtedly affected by the terms of the memorandum, and must be considered as having agreed to renew the note at its maturity. This being so, the obligation of the note is not an absolute, unconditional contract to pay the money at maturity. It is a qualified obligation to pay, with a condition that, instead of paying, the holder may give another note in its place which the bank would be bound to accept instead of money. . . . It is manifest from the foregoing that the only inquiry necessary to determine the question of negotiability is the effect of the memorandum upon the terms of the note. As we have seen, it makes an important change in the note, in that, instead of the note being a distinct contract to pay a fixed sum of money at a day certain, the holder has agreed to accept, instead of payment in money, another note payable at another time which is not fixed. The obligation of the note, therefore, is uncertain, depending on whether the maker chooses to pay it or give a new note in place of it. This uncertainty destroys its negotiability, and for that reason relieves the indorser."

In Post v. Losey, 111 Ind. 74, 12 N. E. 121, 60 Am. Rep. 677, it appeared that after the discharge in bankruptcy of the maker of a note, he and the payee without the consent or knowledge of the surety, entered into the following agreement, which they indorsed on the back of the note. "In consideration of the extension of time for three years from September 2d, 1878, and the reduction of the rate of interest from ten per cent to six per cent per annum, I hereby assume to pay promptly the interest at six per cent semiannually, and the principal of the within note on or before September 2d, 1881." The court said: "Here, Losey, the principal debtor, and the payee, not only agreed that the time of payment should be extended beyond the time as originally agreed upon and named in the note, but also agreed upon a rate of interest for the future different from that originally agreed upon and named in the note. Not only that, but they indorsed the agreement upon the note. The agreement thus indorsed upon the note operated as a modification and change of the original agreement. In other words, after the consummation of the latter agreement, indorsed upon the back of the note, Losey and the payee were no longer bound by the agreement as written upon the face of the note, but by that agreement as modified and changed by the subsequent agreement indorsed upon the back of the note. After that indorsement, their agreement was to be ascertained by an examination of the face of the note and the indorsement. The two writings are to be construed together. Together they constitute the contract between Losey and the payee. To hold otherwise, would be to hold that the latter agreement was and is of no validity whatever. The latter agreement, by its terms, is to pay the note as written, with a change in time and rate of interest. That there was a sufficient consideration for that agreement there can be no doubt. In consideration of the change of time and rate of interest, Losey exchanged a moral obligation only for a legal liability. . . . The contract between Losey and the payee, as evidenced by the face of the note and the indorsement upon the back of it, is not the contract between them as it existed at time Emma J. executed the mortgage, and to secure the performance of which on the part of Losey she mortgaged her separate property. Losey and the payee changed that contract without her consent or knowledge by agreeing upon a different rate of interest and a different time for payment. The contract to secure which she mortgaged her property can be enforced by no one, and for the contract as changed neither she nor her property is liable. To hold her property liable upon the original contract as evidenced by the note, would be to hold it liable for the default in payment by Losey, three years before he could be in default under the contract as changed; and to hold her property liable upon the changed contract, would be to hold it liable for a contract different in time of payment and rate of interest from that which entered into and formed a part of the contract as evidenced by the mortgage. To hold her property liable upon the original contract, would be to measure the liability of the principal by one standard, and the liability of the surety by another and different standard. But it is said, that because Losey had been discharged in bankruptcy from all his debts, he became a stranger to the note, and that, therefore, the change in the contract agreed to by him cannot affect Emma J. or the mortgage given by her. . . . The only difference was, that by reason of his discharge, he was no longer legally liable upon the contract. He might, however, waive the immunity afforded by his discharge, and pay the debt according to the terms of the note. To secure the performance of the contract according to the terms of the note, and in no other way, the separate property of Emma J. was mortgaged. In order that Losey might again become liable for the payment of the principal sum, the payee consented that the contract might be changed as to the time of payment and the rate of interest. The contract, as evidenced by the face of the note and the indorsement upon the back of it, thus became the contract between Losey and the payee. By the change, the contract as originally executed ceased to exist, both as a legal and moral obligation on the part of Losey. And this is so, whether the new promise be regarded as a revival of the original contract, so far as consistent with it, or whether it be regarded as an entirely new contract." To the same effect see Rosenthal v. Rambo, 28 Ind. App. 265, 62 N. E. 637.

Where the parties to a promissory note agreed that the time for the payment of the note should be extended for two years, the effect of this agreement was to waive any past default in the payment of the principal, and to postpone the maturity of the note until the date to which the extension had been made. Bell v. San Francisco Sav. Union, 153 Cal. 64, 94 Pac. 225.

Period of Extension.

In Minor v. Carpenter, 28 Cal. App. 368, 152 Pac. 737, the question was whether a certain agreement in writing between the parties subsequent to the execution of the prom-issory notes in suit and to the time they fell due, amounted to an extension of the time of payment of the notes beyond the date of the commencement of that action, so as to support the claim that the action was prematurely brought. The court said: "We have read this agreement carefully to determine whether it will bear this construction, but there is not a word or sentence in it which, either expressly or by fair-intendment, refers to any extension in the time of payment of the notes in question; and while it is true that said agreement purports to provide a way in which the defendant may be able to pay his full indebtedness to the plaintiff, amounting to a sum greatly in excess of the sum due on these notes, still the plaintiff nowhere therein stipulates to await the out-working of the plan provided for in such agreement before suing upon these over-due notes. A particular vice in the argument of the appellant as to the scope and effect of this agreement is that no time is fixed to which the payment of these notes is to be extended. The authorities seem to hold with considerable uniformity that extensions in the time of payment of promissory notes must be for a definite time in order to be valid; and such appears to be the rule in this state."

In Glidden v. Henry, 104 Ind. 278, 1 N. E. 369, 54 Am. Rep. 316, it appeared that the note under consideration contained a provision that "the payee, or his assigns, may extend the time of payment thereof from time to time indefinitely, as he or they may see fit." The court said: "From an inspection of the note, it is impossible to tell when it may mature, because it is impossible to know what extension may have been, or may hereafter be, agreed upon. No definite time is fixed, nor is the maturity of the note dependent upon an event that must inevitably happen. The condition is not that something may happen, or be done, that will mature the note before the time named, thus leaving that time as fixed and certain, if the thing do not happen, or be not done; but the condition is that the time named may be displaced by another, uncertain and indefinite time, as the parties may agree." In passing on a similar provision in the note in controversy in Woodbury v. Roberts, 59 Ia. 348, 13 N. W. 312, 44 Am. Rep. 685, the court said: "By the terms of the condition of the note in suit it would never fall due, but could be indefinitely extended at the will of the maker and indorser, who, it will be observed, is the same party. When the instrument was executed the time of its maturity was contingent upon the option of the maker of the note. It was impossible to determine when it would become due by the assent of the maker. The time of payment was uncertain and was not capable of being made certain: Nothing happened after its execution to remove this uncertainty. Notes, which by their terms are payable on or before a fixed time or a specified event, are, it is true, uncertain as to the time at which they are payable. But there is no uncertainty as to the time when they become absolutely due. Paper of this character is regarded by the courts as negotiable. But the note before us may never fall due, for payment may be extended indefinitely."

In Lanum v. Harrington, 267 Ill. 57, 107 N. E. 826, it was held that an agreement that the time of payment of certain promissory notes should be extended until the makers were able to pay, or until they were able to make it out of their stock and crops, or until the death of the payee when the same could be paid out of the share of the wife, one of the makers, in the estate of the payee in case he should leave any estate and she should be entitled to any share therein, did not constitute a valid and binding extension of the time of payment. It was also held that an indefinite promise that the payee would not crowd the makers for the principal and interest, did not constitute a valid extension of time, being at most but a promise to extend the time of payment without defining the period to which it would be extended.

An agreement for the extension of a note for three years from the date when it matured, signed by the makers of the note, but not by the then holder or the subsequent holder of the note, is not complete and being invalid does not have any effect. Hass v. Lobstein, 108 Ill. App. 217. But when accepted and acted on by the holder, it becomes valid. Abraham Lincoln Building, etc. Assoc. v. Zuelk, 124 Ill. App. 109.

In Workman v. Ray (Tex.) 180 S. W. 291, it appeared that the holder of certain notes and one who had assumed the payment thereof as part consideration for the conveyance of certain land agreed to "extend the notes a reasonable length of time" and to give a reasonable length of time to sell the land if the debtor would pay all interest up to a certain specified date and the debtor "agreed not to have said notes paid off and taken up." It was held that this agreement was not binding, being an extension for an indefinite time, if the agreement was that the interest was to be paid at the expiration of a reasonable length of time.

The words "this note to be extended if desired by makers," as indorsed on a note, have been held to contain no definite agreement and to be without significance. Krouskop v. Shontz, 51 Wis. 204, 8 N. W. 241, 37 Am. Rep. 817.

An indefinite extension of the time of the payment of a note does not render it void as between the parties thereto, though it may be invalid as far as it affects the rights of third persons. Drake v. Pueblo Nat. Bank, 44 Colo. 49, 96 Pac. 999.

Where it appeared that the holder of a note due December first agreed to extend the time of payment until the fall of the year, it was held that this extension was sufficiently definite as an extension to at least the first of September following. Robson v. Brown (Tex.) 57 S. W. 83, rehearing denied 57 S. W. 686.

In Maupin v. McCormick, 2 Bush (Ky.) 206, it appeared that as part of the consideration for the purchase of certain lands, the purchaser executed a note containing the following covenant: "I am to have the privilege of extending the time of payment as long as I choose by paying interest thereon annually at the rate of six per cent." The court said: "It is a stipulation that Maupin shall, on certain conditions, run the notes at his own option. Of course this could extend no longer than Maupin himself shall be capable of exercising his own volition; therefore, when by disease or death, he shall no longer be capable of 'choosing,' the notes must be paid, even if all the other conditions be strictly complied with. The notes were made payable November 17, 1857, with the privilege, at Maupin's choosing, to extend the time by the annual payment of interest. This, at most, could only be a privilege to extend the time during his life, and is not a perpetuity. It may, so far as the interest is concerned, be called an annuity to be paid by Maupin during his life."

Effect on Rights of Indorser or Surety.

In Bonart v. Rabito, 141 La. 970, 76 So. 166, the note in suit provided that "the makers, indorsers, guarantors, and sureties of this note hereby severally . . . consent that time of payment may be extended without notice thereof." The court said: "We cannot conceive of any reasonable theory on which to hold that the indorser's consent, as expressed in the note sued on, authorized the payee to grant the maker only one extension of the time of payment, however long, and did not authorize two extensions, however short. To maintain such a doctrine would lead to the anomalous conclusion that the indorser would not have been released if the payee had granted to the maker of the note, without notice to the indorser, one extension of the time of payment for one year, but that she would have been released by the granting of two extensions, for one month, or one week, or one day each. Our interpretation of the indorser's consent that time of payment might be extended without notice thereof is that the payee and the maker of the note could agree to extend the payment from time to time without notice to the indorser and without releasing her from liability, unless and until at any time after maturity she saw fit to pay the note and become immediately subrogated to a right of action against the maker."

In School Trustees v. King, 85 Ill. App. 220, it appeared that each of certain notes contained the following clause: "And we further agree . . . that no extension of the time of payment, with or without knowledge, by the receipt of interest or otherwise, shall release us, or either of us, from the obligation of payment." The court held that it was clear that when the maker and sureties executed these notes, they contracted to be bound by an extension of the time of payment, though made with the principal debtor without their knowledge.

Miscellaneous.

In Sykes v. Citizens' Nat. Bank, 78 Kan. 688, 98 Pac. 206, 19 L.R.A. (N.S.) 665, it was held that the language of the note in that case, viz., "the makers and indorsers hereof hereby severally . . . agree to all extensions and partial payments before or after maturity, without prejudice to the holder," would not bear an interpretation making it, in effect, a demand note.

In Corbett v. Clough, 8 S. D. 176, 65 N. W. 1074, it was held that the words, "Extended to December 1st, 1891," written on the face of a note by the payees thereof at the request of the maker, pursuant to an agreement between them, was a written extension of time.

In Niblack v. Champeny, 10 S. D. 165, 72 N. W. 402, the following indorsement on the back of a note by the maker after an agreement with the payee for the extension of the note, was held to be a written extension of the time of payment: "4-24. Int. paid and extended 60 days,—consent of both parties."

But in Brenneke v. Smallman, 2 Cal. App. 306, 83 Pac. 302, it appeared that on the fifth day of January the payee of a note indorsed on the back thereof the words, "Renewed July 6," followed by her signature. It was held that while the word "renewed" might properly be used to express an agreement on the part of the maker of a note, it could not express an agreement on the part of the payee extending the time of payment. The court said: "'July 6' does not indicate with any certainty the period to which the note was 'renewed,' or to which payment was extended, if we should construe 'renewed' as meaning 'extended.' We may conjecture that it was intended by the words written to extend the time for payment of the note to July 6, 1901, but it would be but a conjecture, which is not sufficient upon which to base judicial action. The original agreement was to pay at a certain time. . . . We do not think that the words 'Renewed July 6' can be construed as expressing an agreement to extend the time of payment of a note upon which they are written to July 6, 1901."

In Wellington Nat. Bank v. Thomson, 9 Kan. App. 667, 59 Pac. 178, the note in suit contained the following provision: "We, the makers, sureties, guarantors, and indorsers hereon, agree to extensions of this note without notice, hereby ratifying such extensions, and binding ourselves for payment hereof as if no extension of time for or forbearance of payment has been granted or made." The court held that the word "extension," as used therein, must be understood as meaning an actual extension of the time of payment, resting on a definite basis; that is, on a contract to that effect, supported by a sufficient consideration; and that without such a contract, an extension of time of payment or a forbearance to sue would not bind the holder of the note. The court said that the construction contended for, that by reason of the payments of interest on the note the operation of the statute of limitations was suspended, and that under the terms of the note the defendant was bound by those payments, would make the words of the note an agreement to waive the defense of the statute of limitations, and therefore void.

In Miller v. Poage, 56 Ia. 96, 8 N. W. 799, 41 Am. Rep. 82, the promissory note in suit, while in the ordinary form, contained the following provision: "If this agent does not sell enough in one year, one more is granted." The court said: "We think the true construction is that the maker was the agent of the payee for the sale of something, and if he realized sufficient funds from such sales, the amount specified was to be paid within one year. Payment during such time was to be made only on condition that the necessary funds were realized. This clearly implies the instrument was to be paid out of a particular fund."

In Jewett Lumber Co. v. Martin Conroy, 171 Ia. 513, 152 N. W. 493, the note in litigation provided as follows: "This note is given for lumber used in the improvements and if the case of Lair v. Martin Conroy Co. now pending in the district court of Polk county, Ia., is not settled or tried in said court by the time this note becomes due, we Jewett Lumber Co. agree to extend the time until said suit is determined, said extension in no event to exceed one year. Recovery on this note is not dependent upon the outcome of said suit." The court held that the only condition attached to the note and the giving thereof was the one mentioned in the note itself, and that the plaintiffs' right to recover did not depend on the outcome of the suit therein named.

In Wilcox v. McCain Land, etc. Co. (S. D.) 159 N. W. 49, it appeared that the receipt for the delivery of a certain promissory note given by the holder of the note, provided as follows: "The note given may be renewed, providing the interest is paid in full and the McCain Land and Live Stock Company are solvent at time of renewal." It was contended that the receipt constituted an agreement for an extension which released the sureties from liability. The court said: "A renewal of a note is the giving of a new note in the place of the former one, and a contract for renewal contemplates a new note, to which the parties are the same. Plaintiff could not, under his receipt, have been required to have accepted a note as a renewal note, except under the conditions named in such receipt, and then only in case such note, offered as a renewal, was executed by all those who executed the first note. An agreement for a renewal is not an agreement for an extension."

In Stitzel v. Miller, 250 Ill. 72, Ann. Cas. 1912B 412, 95 N. E. 53, 34 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1004, the note in controversy contained the following provision: "We also agree that in case said note is not paid at maturity, that it is at the option of the holder hereof to extend, as he deems proper, the payment of the above note, and that said extension shall not in any manner release one or either of us from the payment hereof." The court said: "The quoted words do not affect the character of the note, before or up to its maturity, either in its certainty, amount to be paid, the date of payment, or the person to whom the payment is to be made." To the same effect see Farmer v. Graettinger Bank, 130 Ia. 469, 107 N. W. 170, wherein the note provided that "sureties hereby consent that time of payment may be extended from time to time without notice hereof."

DETROIT, BELLE ISLE AND WINDSOR FERRY COMPANY.

Michigan Supreme Court—July 23, 1915.

187 Mich. 177; 153 N. W. 799.

Municipal Corporations — Smoke Ordinance — Reasonableness.

Where the evidence of expert marine engineers showed that there was no known appliance which could be used upon marine boilers to prevent the emission of smoke, an ordinance, declaring that the emission of dense, black or gray smoke from any smoke-stack used in connection with any steam boiler in any boat, etc., within the city limits should be a public nuisance per se, and that the owners of any steamboat and the general manager, fireman or other employee having charge of any steamboat within the city permitting it to emit such smoke should be guilty of creating a public nuisance and of a violation of the ordinance, is unreasonable and invalid; though its invalidity is not a bar to a future prosecution thereunder if practical and efficient appliances may be had, or to liability for a common-law nuisance.

Res Judicata — Finding of Facts — Effect of Future Developments.

An opinion of the recorder's court, in a prosecution for a ferry company's violation of the smoke ordinance, that there is then no known appliance which can be used upon marine boilers to prevent the emission of dense smoke, is not res judicata as to whether subsequently known appliances to prevent such smoke are practical.

Certiorari to Recorder's Court of Detroit: CONNOLLY, Judge.

Proceeding against Detroit, Belle Isle and Windsor Ferry Company for violation of ordinance of city of Detroit. Defendant convicted and brings certiorari. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Thomas P. Penniman and Richard I. Lawson for People.

Gray & Gray and A. W. Sempliner for respondent.

[178] STEERE, J.—This case involves the validity of an ordinance of the city of Detroit relative to the so-called smoke nuisance as applied to marine practice. Section 1 of the ordinance provides:

"That the emission of dense black or gray smoke from any smokestack or chimney used in connection with any steam boiler, locomotive or furnace of any description, in any apartment house, building, boat or any other structure, or in any building used as a factory, or for any purpose of trade, or for any other purpose whatever, within the corporate limits of the city of Detroit shall be a public nuisance per se."

Section 6 of said ordinance is as follows:

"The owner or owners of any locomotive, engine, steamboat, tug, dredge, or pile driver, and the general manager, superintendent, yardmaster, engineer, fireman or other officer or employee having in charge or control the operation of any locomotive, engine, steamboat, tug, dredge, or pile driver, within the corporate limits of the city of Detroit, who shall cause, [179] permit or allow such dense black or gray smoke to be emitted therefrom within said corporate limits, shall be deemed guilty of creating a public nuisance and of violating the provisions of this ordinance."

Under this ordinance complaint was filed against defendant and appellant in the recorder's court on the 18th day of August, 1908. A motion to quash and dismiss the complaint was made by the defendant on several grounds:

(1) That in a former case in the same court the ordinance was held to be impossible of observance in marine practice and therefore invalid, and that decision was a bar to this prosecution. (2) That the ordinance was unreasonable and invalid because there was no known appliance which could be used upon marine boilers to prevent the issuance of smoke.

(3) Because it would destroy the value of defendant's property, it being a practical impossibility to rearrange the equipment of the boats so as to prevent the issuance of smoke.

(4) Because the ordinance destroys the value of defendant's property without making adequate compensation therefor, and deprives the defendant of its property without due process of law.

(5) That the Federal courts had exclusive jurisdiction to regulate the navigation of these vessels.

(6) That the ordinance and complaint declare smoke a nuisance per se, and there is no charge that defendant created or maintained a common-law nuisance.

The motion to quash being denied, proofs were taken at intervals from November 27, 1908, until February 16, 1911. This testimony related to the reasonableness or unreasonableness of the ordinance as applied to marine practice; as to what devices to prevent the issuance of smoke had been able to accomplish on boats; and the experiments of this defendant and others with devices to prevent smoke emission and their impracticability in the operation of boats. On February 16, 1911, at the close of the case, the motion [180] to quash was again renewed for the same reasons, and for the further reasons:

(1) That the ordinance was invalid and unreasonable, because it made no allowance for smoke that must be emitted when fires were being started, cleaned, or pricked; (2) because it appeared from the testimony that there were no devices known in marine practice that would successfully prevent the emission of smoke.

This motion was denied, the defendant found guilty, and a fine was imposed.

The case is reviewed in this court by writ of error. It appears from the record that in October, 1906, a similar complaint had been lodged against the same defendant, and that on May 27, 1907, the same judge who heard the case at bar delivered an opinion, in part, as follows:

"I find, as charged in respondent's fourth objection, that this ordinance is impossible of observance in marine practice. The overwhelming preponderance of evidence in this case compels me to this conclusion. Indeed, after the fiasco in the Lansdowne case, the people seem unable to suggest any device which has even a fair record for preventing smoke in marine practice. I do not believe it would be just or reasonable to compel marine interests to experiment with every quack nostrum for smoke prevention which is exploited by promoters. In land practice, approved and successful devices are known to the engineering profession; I am convinced that none such is known in marine practice. If there was, I am confident that Frank E. Kirby would know, and tell, about it."

Nevertheless the court on the second hearing reached a contrary conclusion. A portion of the opinion follows:

"The whole subject of the unreasonableness of this ordinance and of the possibility of complying with its mandate in the present state of the marine engineering art has been exhaustively investigated and studied for a long period of time. Witnesses of noted scientific attainment have been produced, and their testimony is in the record. In addition to the taking of testimony, [181] the court and counsel went to the city of Chicago in June, 1910, and personally investigated the operation of the marine plant in the dredge 'Francis J. Simmons,' operating off Lincoln Park in Chicago, and of the tug 'Keystone,' operating in conjunction with the dredge 'Simmons.' These marine plants were equipped with what is known as the Jones underfeed stoker. The 'Simmons' is engaged in sucking dirt from the bottom of Lake Michigan and pumping it through possibly a mile of pipe to the shore, where an addition is being built to Lincoln Park. The work is irregular; frequent stops being necessary.

"The personal inspection of the court was conclusive, beyond all cavil or question, that the marine plant of the 'Francis J. Simmons' did not emit any objectionable smoke when the underfeed stoker system was in operation; but that, when the underfeed stoker system was shut off, dense black or gray smoke was forthwith emitted from the stack, and almost immediately ceased when the underfeed stoker system was put back in operation.

"The personal observation of the court as to the tug 'Keystone' was to the effect that, although the Jones underfeed stoker was installed in cramped quarters, it rendered satisfactory service in preventing the emission of smoke.

"In June, 1911, counsel for the city invited the court and counsel for the defendant to inspect a similar equipment on an excursion steamer known as the 'City of Benton Harbor,' plying between Chicago, Ill., and Benton Harbor, Mich. Through some misunderstanding, counsel for the defendant did not participate in this inspection, but counsel for the city and the court journeyed from Chicago to Benton Harbor on the 'City of Benton Harbor,' and personally observed the effect of the operation of the Jones underfeed stoker in that marine plant. For several miles of the journey another ship, called the 'City of South Haven,' which was not equipped with the Jones underfeed stoker, journeyed on a parallel course to that of the 'City of Benton Harbor,' and the contrast in the smoke emitted was most marked. The 'City of South Haven' left an enormous trail of black smoke in its wake across the lake; the 'Benton Harbor,' maintaining as good a rate [182] of speed as the 'South Haven,' left practically no trail of smoke in its wake.

"A review of the whole record in this case, including the testimony taken in court, the depositions taken in Chicago with reference to the dredge 'Simmons,' and the personal observations of the court as to the operation of marine plants equipped with Jones underfeed stokers convinces the court that the present state of marine engineering art is not such as to render impossible the prevention of objectionable smoke in marine practice.

"A similar complaint to the one now under consideration was made against this defendant some years ago, when I first came upon the bench of this court. At that time, there was no smoke-preventing equipment in marine practice that had a demonstrated efficiency, and I dismissed the complaint, believing that the ordinance was unreasonable and void at that time, in that it required an impossibility of the defendant. But I am satisfied that the development of the art since that time has been such as to make it possible so to equip a marine boiler as to prevent the emission of objectionable smoke.

"The objection that there is not sufficient room on these ferryboats to equip them with smoke-preventing devices, in my judgment, falls to the ground upon an inspection of the equipment in the cramped quarters of the tug 'Keystone.'

"The claim that the Houden hot-air draft prevents smoke is confuted by the fact that these ferryboats, although so equipped, have flagrantly offended against the smoke ordinance in this case.

"These objections could have no weight at all in the case of People v. White Star Line Company, because their steamer 'The Tashmoo' is overboilered, and has plenty of room in which to make the proper equipment.

"The court has been at great pains, with the aid of counsel, to consider exhaustively this whole subject so that no hardship might be inflicted upon the defendants by requiring them to expend large sums of money in uncertain or experimental devices. The net result of this investigation, as I said before, is to the effect and purport that smoke prevention in marine practice has passed the experimental stage, and is now [183] such a reasonable certainty, both as to smoke prevention and increase of plant efficiency, that this ordinance cannot fairly be considered to be unreasonable in its mandate.

"I do not consider it necessary to discuss the other objections raised by counsel as to the enforcement of this ordinance in this case, being content to rule, generally, that they are not, in my judgment, well founded. The principal objection is to the reasonableness of the ordinance, and I am constrained to hold that it is reasonable and practicable and therefore valid, and that it is the defendant's duty to comply with it."

Recognizing the importance of this case not alone to the owners of vessels plying upon the Detroit river within the corporate limits of the city of Detroit, but to the city of Detroit itself, we have given careful attention to the testimony introduced relative to the practicability and efficiency of the appliances used for the prevention of smoke in marine equipment in the present state of the art. We think it fair to assume that the conclusion reached by the learned judge who tried the case below was based upon his belief that the Jones underfeed stoker had reached such a state of perfection as to make its installation in marine practice feasible and reasonable, and the results to be obtained therefrom satisfactory. That testimony related to five boats, only, where such installation had been made. It would be of no avail to set out the voluminous testimony upon this question. It is sufficient to say that to our minds it is far from convincing. In some instances it is clear that the appliance, after its installation, has been removed, and in all instances the results obtained are not left entirely free from doubt.

The expert testimony introduced upon the question, while not conclusive, strongly persuades us to the view that up to the present time no device has been invented which within the confined space available for installation in marine practice is adequate for the [184] elimination of smoke so long as the consumption of bituminous coal is permitted. Mr. Frank E. Kirby, whose opinion seemed to have controlled—or at least largely influenced—the judgment of the court below upon the former trial, testified in the case at bar as follows:

"There is no efficient device that is known to me for the prevention of smoke in marine practice."

Mr. Kirby is known as perhaps the most experienced designer of vessels for use on inland waters in the State of Michigan.

Prof. Frederick C. Sadler of the University of Michigan, an expert of distinction, testified as follows:

"I do not know of any device with which a marine plant can be equipped at the present time that would operate successfully under marine conditions and eliminate the emission of smoke in the operation of the vessels on the Detroit river here and the ferry service. . . .

"Q. Will you state whether in your judgment, from the investigation and studies you have made, it is possible to construct a steamer for passenger service on the Detroit river and equip it with any device—the Jones underfeed or any other—that when so equipped will be efficient for operation and service and comply with all the government requirements for operation?

"A. I do not know of any such device."

Testimony to the same effect was given by the following persons: Peter McLaren, chief engineer for 20 years of the Walkerville ferry line; Frank W. Stogell, superintendent of Hiram Walker & Sons, Ltd., an engineer for 15 years; Edward A. Dustin, manager of the Ashley & Dustin Steamer Line; Arthur J. Fox, of the same line, a master and pilot since 1874; J. P. Wells, of the Detroit & Cleveland Navigation Company, a marine engineer for 25 years; Winfield Dubois, a marine engineer for 35 years, with the White Star Line; James D. Stewart, a marine engineer [185] for 20 years, and for 3 years operating a Jones underfeed stoker; Minton Sickstele, a marine engineer for 10 years with the Detroit & Cleveland Navigation Company; George F. Moore, an employee of the city of Detroit, and marine engineer for 15 years and engineer of the fire tug James F. Battle; and A. G. Mattason, chief engineer of the Great Lakes Engineering Works.

It is perhaps worthy of note that the fire tugs James F. Battle and James R. Elliott, belonging to the city of Detroit, and operating upon the Detroit river, are not equipped with either the Jones underfeed or any other smoke consuming device.

Taken in its entirety, we are convinced that the testimony as to the impracticability of the Jones underfeed in marine practice fairly sustained the position of defendant.

We do not think it can be said that the earlier opinion of the recorder's court is res judicata of the question; nor should the conclusion reached in the case at bar be regarded as a bar to a future action under the ordinance, if, in the advance of the art, appliances are invented which in marine practice are efficient and practical. Nor is it to be deduced from this opinion that the defendant or other offenders may not be held liable as for the creation of a common-law nuisance if their acts warrant prosecution therefor.

Having reached this conclusion upon a point controlling of the issue, it is unnecessary to consider the other questions raised by the appellant.

The judgment is reversed.

Brooke, C. J., and Kuhn, Stone, Ostrander, Bird, and Moore, JJ., concurred.

The late Justice McAlvay took no part in this decision.

Regulations Held to Be Valid, 173.

Regulations Held to Be Invalid, 175.

Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to discuss the recent cases passing on the validity of a smoke ordinance or statute. The earlier decisions on the subject are considered in the notes to St. Paul v. Haugbro, as reported in 2 Ann. Cas. 580, and 106 Am. St. Rep. 427, and Bowers v. Indianapolis, 13 Ann. Cas. 1198.

Regulations Held to Be Valid.

A state, or, under a proper delegation of power, a municipality, has the power to make reasonable regulations to prevent the emission of dense or excessive smoke from chimneys. Thus where the legislature expressly conferred on a city the power to pass a smoke ordinance, the following provision in a city ordinance was sustained: "The emission of dense smoke within the city from the smokestack of any locomotive, steam boat, steam tug, . . . excepting for a period of six minutes in any one hour, during which the fire box is being cleaned out or a new fire being built therein, is hereby declared to be a nuisance and may be summarily abated. . . . Any person . . . deemed guilty of a violation of this ordinance, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not less than ten dollars nor more than one hundred dollars for each offense." Chicago v. Dunham Towing, etc. Co. 161 Ill. App. 307, affirmed in 175 Ill. App. 549.

An ordinance prohibiting the emission by yard and switch engines of dense smoke caused by the use of soft coal has been held to be a valid exercise of the power to abate nuisances in populous cities, as the emission of such smoke interferes with the comfort of the people, is destructive of property, and under some conditions is injurious to health. State v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 114 Minn. 122, Ann. Cas. 1912B 1030, 130 N. W. 545, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 494, wherein the court said: "The ordinance is not an interference with the property rights of the defendant, or an abridgment of its privileges protected by the federal and state constitutions. If the use of soft coal tends directly to cause a nuisance, a prohibition of such use by the legislature is not forbidden by the constitutional provisions referred to. Such being the case, the ordinance is a legitimate exercise of the police power of the state for the promotion of the comfort and welfare of the people, and the defendant cannot complain of the resulting restrictions in the use of its property. Property rights and privileges are subject to reasonable regulations to promote the general welfare, and the defendant holds its property under the implied obligation that its use of it shall not be injurious to the community. The regulation and abatement of nuisances is one of the ordinary functions of the police power of the state."

In Buffalo v. George P. Ray Mfg. Co. 124 N. Y. S. 913, it was held that in an action for a penalty for the violation of an ordinance making the emission of smoke unlawful it was not necessary to establish that the emission of smoke in fact constituted a nuisance. Referring to the constitutional right to adopt such an ordinance the court said: "The right to pass ordinances in reference to matters of police presupposes that there may be conditions which would not constitute a common-law nuisance, but which are, nevertheless, inconsistent with the rights of individuals and the public, and the test of an ordinance is not whether there is, in fact, a nuisance, but whether the ordinance is reasonable. If it were necessary to establish the fact of a nuisance to convict one of a violation of an ordinance, then there would be no need of the ordinance, for the maintenance of a nuisance is unlawful at all times, and may be reached without the aid of municipal ordinances. The right to adopt ordinances is limited only by the constitution and the statutes, and the reasonableness of the same, and if an ordinance regulating a matter of this kind is reasonable, then it does not matter whether it deals with a condition constituting a common-law nuisance or not, and no citation of authority is necessary upon the point."

Under the general welfare clause in a charter it was held in Rochester v. Macauley-Fien Milling Co. 199 N. Y. 207, 92 N. E. 641, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 554, that a city had the power to prohibit the emission of dark smoke from chimneys during certain hours of the day and to provide a penalty for the violation thereof. Quoting from Moses v. U. S. 16 App. Cas. (D. C.) 428, the court said: "Now, whilst the emission of the ordinary smoke from the chimneys of houses does not amount to a nuisance per se, it is nevertheless a matter of common knowledge, not to be ignored by the courts, that the emission of a volume of dense, black smoke from a single smokestack or chimney of a large furnace, may, under some circumstances, work physical discomfort to the general public coming within its circle of distribution upon public thoroughfares, and may possibly also work injury to public interests in other respects. Whenever it may become a special source of legal injury to an individual he will have an action of damages therefor, and, in cases of continuation, equity will afford complete relief by process of injunction."

It has been held that it is within the police power of the state to declare that the burning of soft coal within certain prescribed limits of a city is detrimental to the public welfare, a statute prohibiting the burning of soft coal in the city of Brooklyn being sustained. Brooklyn v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 44 App. Div. 462, 61 N. Y. S. 33.

It has been held that where the regulation of smoke is within the police power of a city and very broad authority is given to the local officials to legislate on subjects relating to the public health, convenience, and comfort, an ordinance regulating the discharge of smoke will be upheld, unless by the evidence it becomes clear beyond any reasonable doubt that it is not authorized by the legislature or that it unnecessarily and unreasonably interferes with private property rights, and imposes an unreasonable burden, considered in the light of the benefit to the public. People v. New York Edison Co. 159 App. Div. 786, 144 N. Y. S. 707.

It was held in Cincinnati v. Burkhardt, 30 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 350, that an ordinance prescribing a certain scale for measuring the density of smoke and declaring anything in excess of that scale to be a public nuisance was not an unreasonable measure to prevent an annoyance or injury to the public. The court said: "We are of the opinion that the ordinary mind would be in doubt whether the prohibition is unreasonable, the difficulty lying in the manner of fixing and declaring the density of the smoke prohibited; but it will be presumed, in the absence of proof to the contrary, that council duly investigated the subject and adopted this particular scale upon the ground of accuracy and precision; and unless it is clearly unreasonable or in restraint of trade the ordinance should not be declared void."

Where a state constitution authorized any city to make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as were not in conflict with general laws, the following ordinance was sustained: "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to permit any soot to escape from the smokestack or from the chimney of any furnace within the city of Sacramento in which distillate or crude oil is consumed as fuel." In re Junqua, 10 Cal. App. 602, 103 Pac. 159, wherein the court said: "But, as has been said, the subject-matter of the ordinance before us is within the jurisdiction of the legislative authority of the city of Sacramento to regulate, in the exercise of its police power, by direct grant from the constitution as well as by express authority from the legislature expressed in the charter of said city, and, as the ordinance, upon its face is, apparently, unobjectionable for any reason here urged against its validity, and there being nothing presented here de hors the measure to disclose that the enforcement of its provisions in the case of the petitioner involves an invasion of his constitutional or fundamental rights, it follows that the judgment imposed against and upon the petitioner was within the jurisdiction of the court imposing it, and that, therefore, his restraint by the chief of police of the city of Sacramento is not unlawful."

Where a city was given authority to regulate and control the construction of buildings and chimneys, and to prevent nuisances, an ordinance forbidding the construction of smokestacks less than fifty feet high was held to be valid. State v. Shannon, 130 Mo. App. 90, 108 S. W. 1097.

Regulations Held to Be Invalid.

The regulation of the emission of smoke being an exercise of the police power, a regulation which is under all the circumstances unreasonable is invalid. Thus it was held in Cleveland v. Malm, 7 Ohio Dec. 124, that an ordinance making the emission of dense smoke from any chimney, stack, etc., within the city limits, a public nuisance was unconstitutional and void. Following the ruling in Sigler v. Cleveland, 4 Ohio Dec. 166, the court said: "The emission of smoke at common law was not in and of itself a nuisance, neither has any statute of this state made the emission of smoke per se a nuisance. The emission of smoke becomes only then a nuisance when it is a nuisance in fact and to be a nuisance in fact would depend entirely upon whether it was injurious to health, damaging to property or annoying to the inhabitants of a locality, and that in turn would depend upon the character of the smoke, the quantity of smoke, the locality in which the same is emitted and the surrounding circumstances. . . . The legislature gave the council the power to regulate the consumption of smoke, but did not give them the power to prohibit the same under any and under all circumstances and at any and all times. Thus then the council has again exceeded its powers and thereby rendered the ordinance void and invalid. The city of Cleveland is now the metropolis of Ohio, having a population of nearly 400,000 inhabitants. It has become so prosperous and so populous by reason of its diversified manufacturing interests, and no doubt in the districts containing most of our manufacturing establishments there is a vast emission of smoke emitted by the burning of the vast quantities of coal consumed in the furnaces of the various manufactories. And the court has no doubt in the least that the emission of this smoke is injurious and annoying to the health and comfort of the people living in those districts and elsewhere. I have furthermore no doubt that it is damaging to the property both real and personal, of the same individuals and to the goods, wares and merchandise of a great many merchants; but in order that those individuals may be free, to a certain extent, from this injury, annoyance or damage, the council must pass an ordinance which will stand the test and not be open to the objections cited. The ordinance must therefore be held void and invalid in view of these defects, to wit: First: That the ordinance is indefinite, uncertain and vague. Secondly: That the city council transcended its power, granted to it by the legislature, in declaring the emission of smoke per se a nuisance. Thirdly: That the city council exceeded its grant of power in that it prohibits the emission of smoke under any and all circumstances and at any time instead of regulating the same."

In Erie R. Co. v. Jersey City, 83 N. J. L. 92, 84 Atl. 697, the court held to be unreasonable the following ordinance: "It shall be unlawful to permit the emission of dense smoke from any stack connected with any engine or locomotive within the limits of Jersey City, which smoke contains soot or other substance in sufficient quantity to cause injury to health or damage to property within the corporate limits of said city." In that case it was said: "The question is whether the present ordinance will be sustained, so as to support these convictions of a railroad company by reason of discharge of smoke from its locomotive engines. Counsel for the city do not seem to justify it as an exercise of police power in protection of the public health, but concede that this jurisdiction, under later legislation, has been transferred from the board of aldermen to the board of health. Consequently the clause 'injury to health' must be treated as surplusage, and the ordinance be read as aimed solely at damage to property. And it may be noted that, while the complaints are in the alternative, the convictions are all based on the 'damage to property' clause. It is doubtful if the distinction is material; for whether the protection be to health or property, or both, we are met with the fundamental proposition that the chartered right of a railroad to operate its line includes the right to make such noise, smoke, and smells as are reasonably unavoidable in the careful and proper conduct of its business, even if some injury to health or some damage to property be caused thereby. . . . Whatever might be said of an ordinance forbidding smoke from railroad engines needlessly and negligently emitted, we think it plain that the breadth of scope of that under consideration, in prohibiting all smoke containing soot, etc., sufficient to cause injury to property, is in derogation of the charter rights of the railroad, and as to it unreasonable." In Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Jersey City, 84 N. J. L. 716, 87 Atl. 465, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 715, the court passing on the validity of the same ordinance held that unless a municipality has express power delegated to it by the state it cannot prohibit the emission of dense smoke from the smokestacks of a railroad company where the legislature has conferred the right on the railroad company to consume fuel and emit the smoke arising therefrom in order to operate its road, unless it can be shown that the escape of the smoke results from the negligence on the part of the railroad company. The court said: "The proposition presented is, Has the city the power to enforce this ordinance against this defendant when the emission of dense smoke from its engines is caused by the consumption of fuel necessary in the exercising of its legislative grant to operate a railroad? All negligence or want of care on the part of the railroad company in the conduct of its authorized business is eliminated, for the ordinance applies to the emission of dense smoke from defendant's engines, whether it be the result of negligence or not. The defendant is authorized by the legislature to use engines in carrying on its business, and that cannot be done without the consumption of fuel and the consequent emission of smoke, which at times must fall within the description of dense, and so long as the conduct of defendant is not negligent, it has the right to allow smoke to escape from its engines. To sustain the contention of the city we should have to assume that, notwithstanding its grant to the defendant, the legislature has delegated to the city a power, which practically amounts to a repeal of its former grant, for no railroad can be operated without creating smoke, and if the city can forbid the escape of dense smoke, it can also prevent the emission of all smoke, and thus deprive the railroad company of the right to burn fuel in the prosecution of its business, because the burning of fuel is not only necessary to operate a railroad, but must produce smoke. We are of opinion that no such power is vested in the city, and therefore the ordinance, so far as it attempts to make unlawful the emission of smoke from defendant's engines affords no lawful basis for the conviction of the defendant under the proofs in this case, and that as to it the ordinance is void and the convictions must be set aside."

The reported case holds that an ordinance making the emission of dense black smoke from the smokestack or chimney used in connection with any steam boiler, locomotive or furnace, building, boat, or any other structure within the city limits a "public nuisance per se" is unreasonable and invalid, as against the owners of a steamboat where the evidence shows that the latest mechanical appliances are inefficient to comply with the requirements of the ordinance. The court says however that the decision is not to be regarded as a bar to a future action under the ordinance, if in the advance of the art, appliances are invented which in maritime practice are efficient and practical.

In Rex v. Canadian Pac. R. Co. 33 Ont. L. Rep. 248, 8 Ont. W. N. 60, it was held that a municipal by-law relating to the emission of smoke does not apply to a railway company which is subject to the regulations of the dominion railway board. The court said: "The Dominion authorities having undertaken to pass regulations dealing with this question, the jurisdiction of the municipality, if it ever had any, is, I think, ousted. So long as the railway company complies with the direction of the board, the municipality cannot interfere. For a violation of the board's directions, the appropriate prosecution must follow. This is, I think, something incident to the operation of the railway, and forms part of the railway legislation over which the Dominion alone has control, and it cannot be regarded as mere municipal legislation, within the jurisdiction of the Province."

LITTLEFIELD

v.

BOWEN ET AL.

Washington Supreme Court—March 15, 1916.

90 Wash. 286; 155 Pac. 1053.

Actions — Joinder of Causes — Rights Arising from Same Transactions.

Under Rem. & Bal. Code, § 296, subd. 8, permitting plaintiff to unite several causes of action in the same complaint when they arise out of the same transaction, a complaint alleging a cause of action upon a breach of contract and upon defendants' wrong in rendering performance by another party impossible, so as to prevent the earning of a commission, from that party, is not demurrable on the ground that two causes of action are improperly joined.

Brokers — Contract for Commissions from Both Parties — Sale Prevented by One Party.

A complaint, in a broker's action for commission, alleging that defendants and certain other owners entered into a written contract to exchange certain properties at stipulated values and that each of the parties was to pay plaintiff a commission upon the execution of the instrument effecting the exchange, that the other contracting parties had been ready, able, and willing to execute their instruments of conveyance, but that defendants refused to perform their contract, and rendered performance by the other parties impossible, states a cause of action against the defendants for the agreed compensation to be paid by both parties.

[See note at end of this case.]

Recording of Contract by Broker — Liability to Principal.

The fact that plaintiff, a real estate broker, who had caused defendants to enter into a written contract to exchange certain properties with other parties, recorded such contract, which record did not colorably establish any right, claim, or lien in the broker, does not render him liable to damages for the recording of the contract.

Performance by Broker — Refusal of Principal to Accept Trade — Necessity of Tender.

In a broker's action for commission under a contract for the exchange of properties, the fact that the transfer by the other parties to the plaintiff was refused made it immaterial whether such other parties made any tender of a deed or not.

Evidence — Proof of Title — Best and Secondary Evidence.

When the title to real estate is directly in issue, the best evidence of title consists in the muniments of title such as deeds, mortgages, patents, wills, etc.

Same.

In a broker's action against defendants for a commission due under their contract

Ann. Cas. 1918B.—12.

with plaintiff and with other parties for an exchange of properties, where it is only incumbent upon plaintiff to make a prima facie case, showing that the other parties were willing and able to comply with the contract, and that defendants refused to perform, the other party's ownership is provable by parol.

Brokers — Contract for Commission from Both Parties — Sale Prevented by One Party.

A real estate broker, who, as agent for all of the parties, procured a contract between himself, defendants, and other parties for an exchange of their properties, entitling him to a commission from each, payable on the execution of the instruments effecting the exchange, may, upon defendants' failure to carry out their contract, maintain an action against them for the loss of the commissions agreed to be paid by the other party.

[See note at end of this case.]

Exchange of Property — Contract — Termination — Lapse of Reasonable Time for Completion.

Where a contract for an exchange of properties does not, in itself, provide a time for its termination, a reasonable time is implied.

Brokers — Right to Commission — Refusal by Principal to Convey — Sufficiency of Evidence.

The evidence, in an action for a commission, payable under a contract for the exchange of properties whereby each of the exchanging parties was to pay plaintiff a commission, to recover a commission directly payable by defendants, and the commission due from the other party lost by defendants' breach, is held to support a finding that defendants refused to perform the contract, and rendered it impossible for the other party to perform, though ready and able to do so.

Appeal from Superior Court, King county: MACKINTOSH, Judge.

Action by E. E. Littlefield, plaintiff, against F. A. Bowen et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Byers & Byers for appellants.

Edgar S. Hadley for respondent.

[287] HOLCOMB, J.—Respondent, a real estate broker, as first party, one Thorniley and wife as second parties, and appellants as third parties, on September 23, 1914, entered into a written contract whereby the Thornileys and Bowens agreed to exchange certain properties at certain stipulated valuations, and each of the exchanging parties pay to respondent a certain stipulated commission, the same "being payable upon the execution of the instruments effecting the exchange." The "instruments effecting the exchange" were never executed by both parties to the exchange. The Thornileys claim to have been "ready, able and willing to perform and to have tendered performance to the Bowens, but that performance by them was refused by the Bowens, who also refused performance themselves."

Respondent brought his suit against appellants in two separate causes of action, upon the theory that they breached [288] the contract and rendered performance impossible by the Thornileys, and that appellants were therefore liable to him, both for the commission earned by him from appellants directly upon the agreed promise to pay, and for the commission earned from the Thornileys under the contract, because of appellants' breach of the contract. The contest is chiefly over the questions of whether in fact the Thornileys were ready, able and willing to perform their contract so as to bind appellants, and whether in fact the Thornileys, rather than appellants, breached the contract. Incidentally, the rulings of the court upon appellants' demurrer to the complaint and upon respondent's demurrer to the affirmative answer of appellants are urged as erroneous.

The tripartite contract, among other things, provided that each of the parties of the second part and of the third part were to furnish to the other an abstract of title covering their respective properties described in the contract, certified to date, allow five days for examination thereof, and to convey, each to the other, the properties so contracted, by good and sufficient warranty deed free and clear of incumbrances of every nature, except certain incumbrances against each which it was agreed the other would assume.

I. Appellants complain of the overruling of their demurrer to the complaint on the ground that two causes of action were improperly joined, one upon contract, and one upon tort; and that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

"The plaintiff may unite several causes of action in the same complaint, when they all arise out of . . . the same transaction." Rem. & Bal. Code, § 296, subd. 8 (P. C. 81, § 281).

See also Harding v. Ostrander Ry. etc. Co. 64 Wash. 224, 116 Pac. 635. The first ground of demurrer was not good.

It is further urged that, because the contract stipulated that "such amounts being payable upon the execution of the [289] instruments effecting the exchange" and the instruments of exchange were not alleged to have been executed, the respondent could not recover, and that therefore the complaint was insufficient.

Respondent could not compel appellants to execute the instruments, but alleged that the other contracting parties, the Thornileys, had been, and then stood, ready, able, and willing to execute their instruments of conveyance, and stood ready to complete the transfer of their properties in accordance with the contract, but that appellants refused such performance and refused to perform their (appellants') contract. In such posture of affairs, under such a contract, the respondent was entitled to recover his agreed compensation, to be paid by both parties, from whichever party refused to perform and rendered performance by the other party to the exchange impossible. The complaint, therefore, was sufficient and the demurrer was properly overruled.

II. Appellants attempted, by affirmative answer and cross-complaint, to claim damages against respondent for the recording of the contract involved herein, alleging that such recording cast a cloud upon their title, to their damage in the sum of $500. Demurrer thereto was sustained, and this is alleged as error. There could be no such recovery. No right, claim, lien, or estate in the real estate of appellants described in the recorded contract became actually or colorably established in respondent thereby. That one of the parties to a written contract voluntarily made by another party to it sees fit for some reason to procure its recordation in the public records violates no legal rights of the other party. There was no fraud, overreaching, or undue influence alleged or existing to avoid the contract. The demurrer to the affirmative answer and cross-complaint was properly sustained.

III. A deed was offered in evidence, executed by Thorniley and wife to appellant, of the real estate to be transferred [290] by the Thornileys as a tender under the contract. It appears that this deed had no revenue stamps as provided by the emergency revenue act of Congress of October 29, 1914. Objection was made to the introduction thereof for the reason that it was not competent evidence. We cannot find that the revenue act of Congress cited contains any provision that a deed or other such instrument not bearing the revenue stamp is inadmissible as evidence. The act provides only for a penalty for failure to attach such stamps. In any event, the evidence tends to show that the transfer by the Thornileys had been theretofore refused, and it was immaterial whether the Thornileys made any tender of a deed or not under such evidence.

Thorniley, a witness for respondent, while on the witness stand, after reciting a description of the property to be conveyed by him, was asked by counsel for respondent: "Was that your property?" To this appellants objected and the court sustained their objection, saying: "It is incumbent on you, Mr. Hadley, to prove your contention that you were able to convey it. If you had no title, and were not able to convey, you could not recover, so you will have to prove it." The witness was then withdrawn from the stand, and it is contended that there was no other evidence or offer of evidence tending to prove that Thorniley had title to the property in question. It is contended, also, that a witness cannot be permitted to prove ownership by simply stating the fact that he owns property, over the objection of the opposite party.

The first contention does not seem to be sustained by the record. While there were some complications concerning the title of Thorniley, there is evidence to the effect that these matters were all matters of adjustment, and that there had been transactions looking to the adjustment of all the matters which had been objected to by counsel for appellants, whereby it was testified by Thorniley and other witnesses that the title was rendered good. A peculiarity of the contract was [291] that, while the contract provided that abstracts should be delivered to and examined by each party, there was no provision in the contract that the property conveyed should be of perfect title or good and marketable title. The only provision relating thereto was that each party should give a good and sufficient warranty deed free and clear of incumbrances of every nature except those specified. There is evidence, however, although disputed, to the effect that the title was passed upon favorably by Mr. Byers, acting as attorney for Mr. Bowen, and that the defects pointed out were in the process of adjustment and curing; that, upon the curing of such objections, the title would be satisfactory. There is further evidence that these objections were met and the defects cured. There is further evidence that everything was satisfactory.

As to the other ground of the objection, it is, of course, a general rule that, when the title to real estate is directly in issue, the best evidence of title consists in the muniments of title such as deeds, mortgages, patents, wills, etc.; but when the title to real property is not directly in issue, or where only a prima facie showing of title is necessary, the rule as to best evidence does not apply and ownership may be proven by parol. 12 Ency. Evidence, 544. This action was not a suit to try the title of the property, and it was at best only incumbent upon respondent to make a prima facie case showing that Thorniley was willing and also able to comply with the contract entered into, and that appellants refused to comply therewith.

IV. What we have said applies also largely to appellants' fifth assignment of error, that the court erred in denying their motion for a nonsuit. As to that, it is argued that one of two things must be true: either the respondent did all the acts necessary to bring the parties together and was, therefore, entitled to a commission from each of them, or he failed to do the acts called for by the contract and was not entitled to a commission from either of them; that, in the [292] latter case, the motion for a nonsuit should have been sustained as to both causes of action, and in the former case, it should have been sustained as to the second cause of action. Authorities are cited to the effect that the duty of a broker employed to sell property is to bring the buyer and seller to an agreement. While it is not essential that he should be present and an active participant in the agreement or sale when it is actually concluded to entitle him to his commission, he must produce a purchaser ready and willing to enter into a contract on his employer's terms. He is not entitled to a commission for unsuccessful efforts to effect a sale, unless the failure is caused by fault of the principal. And further, that the burden was on the broker, in order to establish a prima facie case, to prove not only that the purchaser found was willing, but able to consummate the sale; citing: Colburn v. Seymour, 32 Colo. 430, 2 Ann. Cas. 182, 76 Pac. 1058; Chaffee v. Widman, 48 Colo. 34, 108 Pac. 995, 139 Am. St. Rep. 220; Sibbald v. Bethlehem Iron Co. 83 N. Y. 378, 38 Am. Rep. 441; Gilliland v. Jaynes, 36 Okla. 563, 129 Pac. 8, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 129; Reynolds v. Anderson, 37 Okla. 368, 132 Pac. 322, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 144; Carter v. Owens, 58 Fla. 204, 50 So. 641, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 736; Riggs v. Turnbull, 105 Md. 135, 11 Ann. Cas. 783, 66 Atl. 13, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 824.

There is no doubt these cases in general correctly state the law. But, on the other hand, these purchasers had already agreed upon their sale or exchange. They had entered into a written contract agreeing to make the exchange. The respondent was employed by, and was the agent for, both of them. His compensation had been adjusted. All that was required of him to do he had done. He could not compel either of the parties to make their title perfect or to convey when perfect. It has been held by this court that:

"A real estate broker who has procured a contract of sale to be entered into between the owner of land and a prospective purchaser may maintain an action for damages for the loss of his commissions against the purchaser for failure to [293] carry out such contract, although the broker had agreed to look to the vendor for his commissions." [Syllabus.] Livermore v. Crane, 26 Wash. 529, 67 Pac. 221, 57 L.R.A. 401.

This, then, supports respondent's action against appellants for their failure to carry out their contract, although, as to the commissions of the other party to the contract, he had agreed to look to the other party.

The commissions payable by appellants were due under the terms of the contract directly if respondent had done all that was required by him, and without his fault the contract fell through. If the preponderance of evidence was with respondent on those questions, he was entitled to recover. The court so found, and we cannot say that the preponderance is the other way.

V. It is further urged that appellants took the initiative and, on November 10, 1914, fixed a time for the termination of the contract, to wit, November 16, 1914. The contract did not itself provide a time for its termination. In such case a reasonable time was implied. Appellants wrote a letter on November 10, 1914, notifying the Thornileys and respondent that, unless the contract of September 23, 1914, was fulfilled on or before November 16, they would consider it terminated. The evidence shows, however, notwithstanding that fact, that many negotiations were had between the Thornileys and appellants and respondent after November 16. If it had been abandoned, these subsequent transactions were inconsistent. They resumed or continued negotiations with the other parties, thereby leading them into the belief that the contract had not been abandoned and that it would probably be performed. On November 24, there was some negotiation between the parties looking toward the preparation of papers to be deposited in escrow until all the matters should be concluded. On December 12, a conference was had in which a modification of the exchange agreement was considered.

The testimony of Mr. Bowen himself tended very strongly to contradict the abandonment of the contract by their letter [294] of November 10. He testified that, two or three days after the expiration of the time specified in his letter, he talked with Mr. Thorniley again about it; that they were then and there arranging for the necessary papers to be placed in escrow, if such was thought advisable by Mr. Fullen (Thorniley's attorney) and Mr. Byers; that he knew then that there had been an arrangement for a loan whereby everything against the Thornileys' property would be cleaned up; that he objected to the form of a mortgage and note that had been prepared for him to sign; that he was advised not to give that mortgage; that he then decided he would not go through with the deal; that he saw Mr. Thorniley and told him he would not give that mortgage, and that they agreed if they could get the money somewhere else, giving a different form of mortgage, he would complete the deal; that Mr. Thorniley informed him about that time of an arrangement with a Mr. Keating whereby Keating would finance the matters against the Thorniley property, and that Thorniley was in position to convey the property with only the $12,000 incumbrance against it, according to the original agreement, but that he then told Thorniley that he considered the trade was all off; that his ground of objection was the form of the mortgage proposed for him and his wife to execute.

This and other evidence tends very strongly to support the finding of the trial court that appellants refused to perform the contract entered into, thereby rendering it impossible for the other parties to the contract to perform it, although ready and able. Other matters are argued incidentally by the briefs of counsel, but we think this is sufficient to justify the affirmance of the judgment.

Introductory.

The basis of the distinctions made by the courts with respect to the right of a broker to recover on a contract of the buyer and the seller to pay commissions jointly is the rule of public policy which forbids secret dual agencies whereby the agent is placed in the position of endeavoring to serve inconsistent interests. It is well settled that a broker employed by one party to bring about a sale may not contract secretly for compensation from the other party. See the notes to Howard v. Murphy, 1 Ann. Cas. 571; Leno v. Stewart, Ann. Cas. 1917A 509, and Chaffee v. Widman, 139 Am. St. Rep. 257. Looking to the reason of that rule, the cases discussed in the present note differentiate sharply between brokers charged with the duty of negotiating the terms of sale and middlemen whose duty is performed when the parties are brought together to conduct their own negotiations, and it is with respect to brokers of the former class that the right to rely on a contract to pay joint commissions is limited. But with respect to brokers of that class it is recognized that the rule against dual agency is designed for the protection of the principal and is accordingly subject to waiver by him. Therefore, the majority of the cases reviewed in this note hold that if a broker with the knowledge of his principal contracts for additional compensation from the other party, there is in effect an agreement of the parties to pay commissions jointly, and the broker is entitled to recover. A few jurisdictions, however, maintain that only by an express agreement may the rule forbidding dual agency be waived.

Broker Negotiating Contract.

MAJORITY RULE.

Rule Stated.

By the weight of authority, where a broker is empowered to negotiate with respect to the term of sale, if both the parties have knowledge that he is acting for them both, they thereby assent to his acting in a double capacity and are each liable to pay the broker's commission which they have respectively agreed to pay.

In Leekins v. Mordyke, etc. Co. 66 Ia. 471, 24 N. W. 1, it was said: "When defendant entered into the contract it had full knowledge of the relation which existed between plaintiff and the Grundy County Company. It knew that he was acting as the agent of that company in making the purchase of the machinery, yet it contracted to pay him a commission for effecting the sale. The jury have found, at least, that it made such contract. The evidence shows without any conflict that plaintiff's principal is not only satisfied with the contract, but that it authorized him in advance to contract, in the purchase of the machinery, for the payment by the seller of such a commission on the sale as would compensate him for his services in transacting the business. As the contract was entered into by plaintiff by the authority of his principal, and as defendant contracted with him with knowledge of his relation to his principal, it is very clear, we think, that it cannot now avoid its undertaking. Plaintiff in the transaction acted to some extent as the agent of both defendant and the Grundy County Company, but each consented that he might act in that capacity for the other, and what was done in the transaction was done with the consent of both principals."

In Lindt v. Schlitz Brewing Co. 113 Ia. 200, 84 N. W. 1059, the court said: "It is against public policy for an agent to represent both buyer and seller. Each has the right to rely on his skill, knowledge, and influence, and, as the interests of buyer and seller usually conflict, the law does not ordinarily allow one to assume this double relation. If, however, the buyer has full knowledge that the agent is acting for the seller, he may still employ him to purchase; and, if he does so, the agent is entitled to compensation for his services. There need not be an express agreement to pay in such a case, but there must be full knowledge of the prior relation, and such facts and circumstances shown as will raise an implied contract to pay for the services."

In Minster v. Benoliel, 32 Misc. 630, 66 N. Y. S. 493, it appeared that the defendant engaged the plaintiff, a real estate broker, to procure a tenant for his vacant premises. The plaintiff introduced a tenant to the defendant and the premises were finally rented. In an action for the commissions the defendant contended that the plaintiff could not recover because he agreed to accept a commission from the tenant. The tenant never paid the plaintiff and could not be made to pay. It was held under these circumstances that the defendant was liable to the broker according to the original agreement.

In Franck v. Blazier, 66 Ore. 377, 133 Pac. 800, it was held that a broker has a right to act for both parties in the deal, provided the business is open, fair and honest, and each party is aware of the employment by the other. If a party is fully informed in regard to the facts and consents to the termination of the deal with an understanding of the true conditions, he is liable for the broker's commission.

The broker is not bound to give express notice to his principal that he is acting for the other side. It is sufficient if from the nature of the circumstances the principal must be aware of the fact, and if no active objection is made at the time of the employment of the broker, the objection cannot be raised after the negotiation is completed.

Culverwell v. Birney, 11 Ont. 265, appeal allowed 14 Ont. App. 286.

In Shropshire v. Adams, 40 Tex. Civ. App. 339, 89 S. W. 448, it appeared that the plaintiff and the defendant entered into a contract whereby the defendant agreed to buy a herd of cattle to be taken care of by the plaintiff, the defendant to furnish the pasture; the profits of the increase to be divided at the end of five years, one-fourth to the plaintiff. In consideration of this promise the plaintiff agreed to bring about a sale of a tract of land owned by the defendant. The plaintiff procured a purchaser for the land who promised to pay the plaintiff $5,000 in cash in case he should bring about the purchase. This fact the plaintiff reported to the defendant who assented to the joint employment by the plaintiff and said he would be glad to see him make that sum. It was held that there was no inconsistent employment and that the plaintiff could recover in an action for damages for a breach of contract for a failure to buy the stock as agreed.

It has been held that knowledge of the dual agency on the part of the defendant may be inferred from the circumstances of the case. Thus in Goldsberry v. Thomas, 178 Mo. App. 334, 165 S. W. 1179, it was held that where the defendant refused to admit that he had knowledge of the double employment but admitted that he surmised it, it was a question for the jury whether there was a consent.

In Kinsland v. Grimshawe, 146 N. C. 397, 59 S. E. 1000, it appeared that the defendant employed the plaintiff to find a purchaser for his land at a fixed price per acre. The plaintiff introduced a purchaser to the defendant, and after some negotiation the defendant gave the purchaser an option on the land for thirty days. The purchaser was a dealer in real estate and employed the plaintiff to procure a person to take the lands out of his hands at a profit for which services the plaintiff was to receive a commission. It was held that the broker under those circumstances did not represent adverse interests and could recover a commission from both the buyer and seller.

Where one has an option on a parcel of land and puts it in the hands of a broker to trade and he trades with one who agrees to pay him a commission, the parties both knowing that the broker is to receive a commission from both, the fact that the owner of the record title does not know of the agreements as to the commission is no bar to a recovery of the commission as agreed. Cook v. Piatt, 126 Mo. App. 553, 104 S. W. 1131.

If the agent procures a buyer who pays a price which is satisfactory to the seller and after the transaction is completed the buyer pays the agent $100 for his services though he did not employ the broker previous to the transaction, the seller is liable to the broker for a reasonable compensation as commission, there being no charge of bad faith. Campbell v. Yager, 32 Neb. 266, 49 N. W. 181.

A provision in a contract of sale that "this to be in full settlement of my part of the commission on the deal or trade between myself and C. T. Gregory" has been held to be sufficient to indicate that the principal knew that the broker was acting for both parties in the deal. Fraser v. McCarty (Tex.) 168 S. W. 44, wherein the court said: "Who was to pay the other half of the commission? It could not have been any other person than Gregory; for he alone, besides appellant, was interested in the trade. It is inconceivable that appellant did not know the exchange, and he must have known that if $125 was 'my part of the commission on the deal or trade, between myself and C. T. Gregory,' that Gregory was to pay the other part. No other reasonable inference can be drawn from the facts."

Knowledge of Dual Agency.

Many authorities hold that in order that the broker may recover a commission from both buyer and seller, he must prove not only that the seller was aware of the double agency, but that the purchaser of the property also had knowledge of the double employment.

Texas.—Armstrong v. O'Brien, 83 Tex. 635, 19 S. W. 268.

The court in Glenn v. Rice (Cal.) 162 Pac. 1020, said: "The authorities with practical unanimity declare that, if an agent is engaged by both parties to effect a sale of property from one to the other, or an exchange between them, not as a mere middleman to bring them together, but actively in inducing each to make the trade, he cannot recover compensation from either party, unless both parties knew of the double agency at the time of the transaction. The reason for the rule is that he thereby puts himself in a position where his duty to one conflicts with his duty to the other, where his own interests tempt him to be unfaithful to both principals, a position which is against sound public policy and good morals. His contract for compensation being thus tainted, the law will not permit him to enforce it against either party. It is no answer to this objection to say that he did, in the particular case, act fairly and honorably to both. The infirmity of his contract does not arise from his actual conduct in the given case, but from the policy of the law, which will not allow a man to gain anything from a relation so conducive to bad faith and double dealing. And the fact that the party whom he sues was aware of the double agency and of the payment, or agreement to pay, compensation by the other party, and consented thereto, does not entitle him to recover. He must show knowledge by both parties. One party might willingly consent, believing that the advantage would accrue to him, to the detriment of the other. The law will not tolerate such an arrangement, except with the knowledge and consent of both, and will enter into no inquiry to determine whether or not the particular negotiation was fairly conducted by the agent. It leaves him as it finds him, affording him no relief."

In Armstrong v. O'Brien, 83 Tex. 635, 19 S. W. 268, the court said: "It is well settled that a person cannot act in the capacity of agent for both the buyer and seller, and receive commissions from both; and from principles of public policy such an agent would not be allowed to recover compensation from either party, unless he should so act with the full knowledge and consent of both principals; and about this exception there is a conflict of authority. It makes no difference that the principal was not in fact injured, or that the agent intended no wrong, or that the other party acted in good faith."

When the duality of the agency is relied on as a defense to an action for commissions it is necessary for the defendant to prove not only the fact of such agency but also, that the same was not known to both parties. Red Cypress Lumber Co. v. Perry, 118 Ga. 876, 45 S. E. 674; Ballew v. Ware, 16 Ga. App. 149, 84 S. E. 597. The court in Red Cypress Lumber Co. v. Perry, supra, said: "Dual agency was not absolutely contrary to public policy, but only so if the principals did not know thereof. And as it required two elements to defeat the agent's right to recover, both should have been proved by the party asserting the invalidity of the contract. 'When a contract is valid in the absence or existence of certain facts, but otherwise void, it is, in the absence of evidence, presumed to be valid; and the burden of proving the absence or existence of such facts lies upon him who asserts its invalidity.' Greenhood on Pub. Pol. 118, Rule cxxx."

Where a double employment exists but it is not known to one of the parties no recovery can be had against the party kept in ignorance; and it does not matter that there is no fraud meditated on the part of the broker. Kronenberger v. Fricke, 22 Ill. App. 550; Jones v. Veeck, 197 Ill. App. 119; Walker v. Osgood, 98 Mass. 348, 93 Am. Dec. 168; De Steiger v. Hollington, 17 Mo. App. 382; Frankel v. Wathen, 58 Hun 543, 12 N. Y. S. 591; Norman v. Reuther, 25 Misc. 161, 54 N. Y. S. 152; Bellin v. Wein, 104 N. Y. S. 360; Jensen v. Bowen (N. D.) 164 N. W. 4; Meyer v. Hanchett, 43 Wis. 246.

In Frankel v. Wathen, supra, it appeared that the plaintiff was the general agent of the defendants in the sale of whisky and that while so employed he was requested by others to negotiate an exchange of their farm for whisky. An exchange was effected with the defendants through the plaintiff on which exchange the plaintiff received a commission from the owners of the farm. The defendants were not aware that the plaintiff represented the other parties to the transaction, beyond a mere suggestion that they relied on the plaintiff's judgment as to the selection of whisky to be given for the farm. It was held that the plaintiff could not recover a commission on the whisky given in exchange for the farm, the court saying: "The rule governing the subject suggested is therefore so strict and so vigorous, so sensible and so just, that when the person is acting in the double capacity of representing two persons, for each of whom he is expected to do his best, a knowledge of the duplicate character should be established, not upon mere inference, but upon a full disclosure or positive proof of knowledge, so that the seller or the buyer, as the case may be, may be advised of the exact relation of the agent to the parties conducting the negotiation. There is no such evidence in this case."

Where a broker was allowed to show that a principal was aware of the double agency it was held to be error to exclude testimony offered by the principal to prove that he was ignorant of the double employment. Condit v. Sill, 18 N. Y. S. 97, 44 N. Y. St. Rep. 284.

Sale Prevented by One Party.

Where a broker has lawfully contracted for commissions from both parties, of course a party who wrongfully prevents the consummation of the sale is liable for the commission which he agreed to pay. Vinton v. Baldwin, 88 Ind. 104, 45 Am. Rep. 447.

And where a binding and enforceable contract has been entered into, the fact that one party refuses to perform does not relieve the other party from his agreement to pay a commission. Hutton v. Stewart, 90 Kan. 602, 135 Pac. 681; Tieck v. McKenna, 115 App. Div. 701, 101 N. Y. S. 317. And see Collins v. Fowler, 8 Mo. App. 588.

If a broker has a valid contract for commissions from both parties, and has fully performed on his part, a party who wrongfully prevents a sale before a binding contract has been entered into is liable not only for the commission which he agreed to pay, but for that which would have been payable by the other party had a contract been entered into. James v. Home of Sons, etc. of Israel, 153 N. Y. S. 169; Hunter v. Lyons (Tex.) 144 S. W. 353. In the case last cited the court said: "We are of opinion, also, that in this instance, if the jury believed that both principals knew that a commission was to be paid to Hunter by each of them, and assented thereto, and if, in fact, he was the efficient cause of an agreed trade, and if, in fact, Lyons, without legal excuse, failed to carry out such trade, he could, in law, be liable, not only for the commission which he had contracted to pay Hunter, but also for the commission which Hunter thereby lost and which he would otherwise have received from Westbrook." In James v. Home of Sons, etc. of Israel, 153 N. Y. S. 169, it was said: "The learned judge below seems to have decided this case on a question of law of which I think that he has taken an erroneous view. The defendant agreed with plaintiff that, if plaintiff would procure the sale to it of the property named at an agreed price, it would purchase the same, and it was aware that plaintiff would receive a commission from the owner. When it broke this contract with plaintiff by refusing to complete the transaction without valid reason, plaintiff was entitled to his damage, and the measure thereof was the amount of the commission which he would have received. This follows from the nature of a contract and the result of its breach." See also the reported case.

MINORITY RULE.

In at least two jurisdictions it is held that in order to entitle a broker to commissions from both the buyer and the seller there must be an express contract by which the buyer and seller bind themselves to pay and that knowledge of the double employment is not in itself sufficient to create a contract. Raisin v. Clark, 41 Md. 158, 20 Am. Rep. 66; Rice v. Davis, 136 Pa. St. 441, 20 Atl. 513, 20 Am. St. Rep. 931; Addison v. Wanamaker, 185 Pa. St. 536, 39 Atl. 1111; Maxwell v. West, 23 Pa. Co. Ct. 302; Moore v. Grow, 1 Pa. Super. Ct. 125; Evans v. Rockett, 32 Pa. Super. Ct. 365; Mitchell v. Schreiner, 43 Pa. Super. Ct. 633. See also Fulton v. Walters, 28 Pa. Super. Ct. 269.

The court in Mitchell v. Schreiner, supra, said: "It is a rule of public policy, subject to such exception as we are about to notice, that an agent for the sale of property cannot at the same time act as agent for the purchaser thereof and become entitled to compensation from both vendor and purchaser or from either: Everhart v. Searle, 71 Pa. St. 256. Whilst this rule may be waived by an express agreement between the parties, yet it is well settled that such agreement cannot be inferred either from knowledge of the fact that the rule has been violated or from mere silence or failure to dissent at the time, or from all these combined. Nothing short of 'clear and satisfactory proof of an agreement' to waive the rule can be regarded as sufficient for this purpose."

Broker Bringing Parties Together.

GENERAL RULE.

It is held generally that if the extent of a broker's agency is to bring the contracting parties together and does not involve the duty of negotiating for either, the agent is termed a middleman and may contract for and recover commissions from both buyer and seller. In such a case knowledge by either party of the dual agency is not necessary.

In Friar v. Smith, 120 Mich. 411, 79 N. W. 633, 46 L.R.A. 229, the court stated the rule and gave the reason for it as follows: "The rules of law applicable to this class of cases are briefly stated: An agent to sell may not become the agent of the purchaser, nor may an agent to buy become the agent of the seller, unless the principals are duly acquainted with the fact that the agent is acting in such dual capacity. Mechem, Ag. § 943; Scribner v. Collar, 40 Mich. 375, 29 Am. Rep. 541; Leathers v. Canfield, 117 Mich. 277. If, however, both principals, with full knowledge, consent that the agent act on behalf of both, the agreement for compensation is binding. See cases cited above. Defendant, who knows that his agent expects a commission, may defeat recovery by showing that the other principal of the agent is unaware of the fact of such double agency, and this on the ground that the parties have engaged in a transaction against public policy. The law will not enforce their contracts, but will leave them where it finds them. Rice v. Wood, 113 Mass. 133, 18 Am. Rep. 459; Rice v. Davis, 136 Pa. St. 439, 20 Am. St. Rep. 931; Everhart v. Searle, 71 Pa. St. 256. But there is another class of cases, in which the broker is not employed to negotiate a sale or purchase, but simply to bring two parties together, and permit them to make their own bargain. In such case he is a mere middleman, and may recover an agreed compensation from either or both, though neither may know that compensation from the other is expected. This is on the ground that such an employment does not place the broker in a position where he can sacrifice the interests of his principal, and because he is not, as agent of the owner, bound to secure the best price obtainable, or, as agent of the buyer, to purchase at the least price at which the property can be bought, as in such case he has nothing to do with fixing the price. Neither party has contracted for his skill, knowledge, or influence, and he stands entirely indifferent between them."

The court in Siegel v. Gould, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 177, said: "According to the finding of the referee, the nature of the defendant's employment of the plaintiffs was that of mere brokers, in the strict signification of that term, and not that of agents to make a sale on his behalf. The evidence sustains this view of the relations between the parties. The defendant agreed to pay the plaintiffs for that service. The service having been rendered pursuant to the agreement, we are unable to perceive any legal objection to a recovery by the plaintiffs. The fact that Martin, the purchaser of the defendant's property, also agreed to pay the plaintiffs for their services to him, creates no such obstacle. Both contracts being founded on a legal consideration, each is valid. The case would have been quite different if the plaintiffs had been employed as agents of the defendant to buy or sell. They would then have been incapacitated from acting for Martin in the transaction without the assent of the defendant. Such conflicting relations are repugnant to the fundamental principle on which the law of agency rests, and are forbidden by law. But the plaintiffs were not such agents. They were employed as middlemen only, to bring the parties together to enable them to make their own contracts. They so acted with the knowledge of both parties. In such a case a broker is not an agent for either party to buy or sell, but stands indifferent between them. There is no conflict of duty in the case. He does not make himself an adverse party to either principal, nor does either of them repose any special trust or confidence in him."

In Rupp v. Sampson, 16 Gray (Mass.) 398, 77 Am. Dec. 416, it was said: "We can see nothing in the conduct of the plaintiff which was fraudulent, or which operated to deceive the defendants in making the agreement to pay him for his services. He made no false representations to them. They knew the nature and value of his services, and the extent to which they were beneficial to them. It was wholly immaterial that he was also to receive compensation from the other party. It might well be that the services of the plaintiff were of value to both parties, and that each might be willing to pay according to the benefit received by each. We know of no principle of law, on which an agreement to pay for services rendered, honestly entered into, can be avoided on the ground that another person, having interests wholly distinct and independent, has stipulated by a separate contract to pay for the same services. Both contracts are valid; they are made upon good consideration; and each agrees to make compensation for a benefit which he expects to receive from the bargain."

The court in Langford v. Issenhuth, 28 S. D. 451, 134 N. W. 889, defined the term "middleman" and pointed out when the term "broker" may be used instead, saying: "In the application of this rule appellant attempts to draw a distinction between the duties and obligations of one who acts as a broker, and one who acts as a 'middleman.' The contention is that plaintiff in the complaint alleges himself to be, and brings this action as, a broker, and for that reason the court erred in submitting to the jury any question as to his right to recover as a 'middleman.' The contention is that plaintiff in the complaint alleges himself to be, and brings this action as, a broker, and for that reason the court erred in submitting to the jury any question as to his right to recover as a 'middleman.' In 19 Cyc. 116 (4) it is said: 'The broker is, strictly speaking, a middleman or intermediate negotiator between the parties, and is not in the fiduciary relation of an agent to his principal, but must favor neither the one nor the other of the parties between whom he effects a transaction.' Hence there was no inconsistency between plaintiff's allegation that he was engaged in business as a broker and proof of his right to recover commissions as a middleman. A middleman is defined to be 'a person employed to bring two or more parties together, the parties when they meet to do their own negotiating and make their own bargain; an agent who merely brings the parties to the sale together, and upon whom does not devolve the duty of negotiating for either, and who may contract for and receive commissions from both.' 27 Cyc. 487. A middleman, therefore, is a broker whose duties are limited by his contract to finding and producing a purchaser able, ready, and willing to accept his client's terms, or to effect a transaction with his client upon any terms satisfactory to both. The term 'middleman' is merely descriptive of the nature of the contract of employment."

If nothing is left to the broker's discretion but to find a willing purchaser at a price fixed by the seller, it is of no importance to the seller whether the purchaser also pays the broker for any services he may render. Montross v. Eddy, 94 Mich. 100, 53 N. W. 916, 34 Am. St. Rep. 323.

Where a broker was employed by a prospective purchaser to see if he could not obtain some persons who would sell their breweries on terms to be agreed on by the principals themselves, and he was also employed by a corporation to introduce its president to some one who wished to purchase, but the terms and all else regarding the contract were to be agreed on between the buyer and the seller, it was held that the broker was a mere middleman and might recover from both parties the commissions agreed on if the transaction was concluded wholly by negotiations between the parties after he had brought them together. Knauss v. Gottfried Krueger Brewing Co. 142 N. Y. 70, 38 N. E. 867, reversing 62 Hun 46, 16 N. Y. S. 357.

A broker who is given an option to buy land at a fixed price and on stated terms may, on assigning his option to a third person, receive a commission from both the buyer and the seller since his relation to the parties is that of a middleman, and no more. Runnion v. Morrison, 71 W. Va. 254, 76 S. E. 457.

If the language of the contract creating the agency calls on the broker to bring about a condition which will enable the principal to make a deal satisfactory to himself, the broker is a mere middleman and it is of no consequence to the seller that the agent is at the same time the agent for the person with whom he deals. Kilpinski v. Bishop, 143 Wis. 390, 127 N. W. 974.

In Tasse v. Kindt, 145 Wis. 115, 128 N. W. 972, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1222, it appeared that the defendant agreed to pay the plaintiff a commission if the plaintiff would procure a purchaser for the defendant's land who would pay the highest price obtainable. The contract was later modified, the defendant fixing the price at which the property should be offered. Prior to the modification the plaintiff had a contract with prospective purchasers whereby he was to be paid a commission by them. It was held that the plaintiff could recover from the seller notwithstanding this arrangement.

Where an agent brings about an exchange of parcels of real estate, having nothing to do with the prices and details, his functions terminating with the bringing of the parties together, he may recover a commission from both parties if both have agreed to pay. Manders v. Craft, 3 Colo. App. 236, 32 Pac. 836.

It has been held that where one is employed merely to secure the acceptance of a proposition and is paid therefor by the principal, he cannot be required to account for money received by him from the broker for the other party who divided his commission with him. Law v. Ware, 238 Ill. 360, 87 N. E. 308, wherein the court said: "In this case, however, the complainant, who was a real estate dealer, fixed his own price on the property, and did not employ the defendant to secure the best price he could obtain but only to secure the acceptance of his proposition. Ordinarily an owner who lists property for sale with a real estate broker and who fixes a minimum price understands, and has a right to expect, that the broker will obtain as large a price as possible, and the broker expects and is entitled to commissions on the price that he may obtain. But here the complainant fixed his own price, and, assuming that his version of the agreement was the correct one, the amount was much less than the usual commission, with no increase or further compensation in any event. We do not see how it can be said that the defendant placed himself in the transaction in a position where he owed a duty to the church board inconsistent with his duty to the complainant."

It has been held that the evidence must clearly show that the broker acted only as a middleman in bringing the parties together. If the broker actively participated in the negotiations he cannot recover commissions as a middleman unless he disclosed to the seller that he expected a commission from the buyer. Leathers v. Canfield, 117 Mich. 277, 75 N. W. 612, 45 L.R.A. 33; Pinch v. Morford, 142 Mich. 63, 105 N. W. 22.

When a double agency is shown the burden of proving that he acted as a middleman merely is on the broker. Jensen v. Bowen (N. D.) 164 N. W. 4, wherein the court said: "Unless, indeed, he was a mere middleman, each party who employed him was entitled to the exercise of his discretion, skill, and judgment, and the mere fact that the price was fixed by one would not absolve him from the use of such skill and discretion in regard to the interest of the other. But was he employed to act and to negotiate, or did he negotiate, for both parties? The question being one of burden of proof, when the double agency was shown, did he overcome the presumption of bad faith occasioned thereby by proof that he was merely a middleman, and this not merely at the inception, but throughout the whole transaction? We believe he did not, and we believe that it was incumbent upon him to do so."

Where an agent acts merely as a middleman he can claim commission from both parties even though he has kept each party in ignorance of his employment by the other, and the question whether the employment involves discretion or is purely ministerial is one of fact. Siegel v. Gould, 7 Lans. (N. Y.) 177; Knauss v. Gottfried Krueger Brewing Co. 142 N. Y. 70, 36 N. E. 867; Norton v. Genesee Nat. Sav. etc. Assoc. 57 App. Div. 520, 68 N. Y. S. 32; Siegel v. Rosenzweig, 129 App. Div. 547, 114 N. Y. S. 179.

It has been held that where a local custom obtains to the effect that a broker in bringing the parties together for the exchange of land may recover a commission from both parties, the law will presume that the parties are aware of the custom and will allow the agent to recover for the customary commission. Ramey v. Sturgeon, 17 Ga. App. 292, 86 S. E. 660; Mullen v. Keetzieb, 7 Bush (Ky.) 253; Haviland v. Price, 6 Misc. 372, 26 N. Y. S. 757.

But it has been held that in order for such a custom to have effect with respect to the matter of compensation it is necessary that the broker should act as a middleman in negotiating the exchange in the mutual interest of both parties and without his being the particular agent of either. The principle underlying this is, that a custom will not be allowed to subvert a rule of law. Inman v. Brown (Tex.) 147 S. W. 652.

Proof of a custom to charge both parties will not be admitted where the broker acts for both parties without informing either that he was acting for the other. Farnsworth v. Hemmer, 1 Allen (Mass.) 494, 79 Am. Dec. 756.

MODIFICATION OF RULE.

If it can be shown that a broker without the knowledge of his principal was at the same time working for the other party in an attempt to secure the property for the lowest possible price, he cannot recover commissions from the seller as a middleman, although the seller and purchaser finally agreed on the price without the assistance of the broker. Southack v. Lane, 23 Misc. 515, 52 N. Y. S. 687, reversed 32 Misc. 141, 66 N. Y. S. 629.

If a broker effects a sale of property by first taking a contract to himself, refusing to tell the principal who the purchaser is until he secures a written contract, he cannot recover a commission from the seller after assigning his contract to the real purchaser from whom he receives a commission. Having negotiated the trade himself, the broker does not act as a middleman merely. Horwitz v. Pepper, 128 Mich. 688, 87 N. W. 1034, 8 Detroit Leg. N. 834.

If a broker exerts himself to the utmost to bring about a sale, advising each party that the trade is a desirable one to make, he is more than a middleman, since he attempts to aid each in effecting the exchange for which he is instrumental in bringing them together. No compensation can therefore be had under such circumstances without the consent of both to the dual agency. Casady v. Carraher, 119 Ia. 500, 93 N. W. 386.

Where a broker is employed to bring about an exchange of real property and is to get all the property he can for his principal in exchange he cannot recover compensation from either party without the knowledge and consent of the other. Robinson v. Clock, 38 App. Div. 67, 55 N. Y. S. 976. Under such an employment the employer has a right to assume that the agent is acting solely in his interest unless he is apprised to the contrary. Hannan v. Prentiss, 124 Mich. 417, 83 N. W. 102.

Where the seller of property placed it with an agent for sale or exchange for farm property at the broker's option, agreeing to render all the assistance he could in making the sale or exchange, it was held that the contract conferred authority to negotiate, and did not constitute the broker a mere middleman to bring the parties together. Scribner v. Collar, 40 Mich. 375, 29 Am. Rep. 541, wherein the court said: "The writing placed the property for sale or exchange in plaintiffs' hands and then reserved an option as to whether the final disposition should be a sale or an exchange and expressly required defendant to afford the plaintiffs all the assistance he could in making such sale or exchange. The contract had large scope and went much further than to constitute the plaintiffs mere middlemen to bring some particular third person, or even any one in general, into a position to negotiate with the defendant. It conferred authority to negotiate and reposed trust and confidence and contemplated that the plaintiffs should act in defendant's interest and should exert their judgment and their influence in his behalf."

Where a broker actually participates in the negotiations leading up to the transaction he cannot be considered a middleman merely, although he is employed by both parties. Stapp v. Godfrey, 158 Ia. 376, 139 N. W. 893, wherein the court said: "No definite value was put on their property by either defendant or Coombs in listing with plaintiff, and he was not authorized by either to negotiate the trade. But his compensation, as he claims, was dependent on any exchange, and he admits having exerted himself to the utmost to bring about the deal; advising each, apart from the other, that the trade was a desirable one to make. Under these circumstances, he was more than a middleman, for he attempted to aid each in effecting the exchange for which he was instrumental in bringing them together. Loyalty to either principal required him to disclose his relations to the other. The agent cannot serve two principals without the intelligent consent of both, and, if he undertakes to do so, compensation cannot be recovered for services rendered."

v.

ALTMAN ET AL.

Alabama Supreme Court—May 20, 1915.

193 Ala. 160; 69 So. 543.

Public Officers — Liability — Tax Sale under Void Statute.

An officer, who sells property for taxes acting under a void statute, is not liable to the purchaser of such property at the tax sale, since the rule of caveat emptor applies.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Birmingham City Court:
PUGH, Judge.

Action by A. E. Fields, plaintiff, against J. W. Altman et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Harsh & Fitts for appellant.

Stallings, Nesmith & Judge for appellees.

[160] MAYFIELD, J.—The question in this case, upon which all others depend, is this: Is an officer who sells property for taxes, acting under a void statute, liable to a purchaser of the property sold at the tax sale? We are of the opinion that this question should be answered in the negative. The trial court so answered it, to which ruling we agree.

There are several valid reasons why the purchaser cannot recover in such case. One is that the rule of caveat emptor applies with all its vigor in such cases. Where two persons are equally at fault, the law will leave them as it finds them. The officer did not sell the property as his own, or by virtue of individual right or will. He sold it, as he and the purchaser thought, [161] by virtue of law and for a public purpose, but by a mistake of law only he had no right or authority to sell, and by virtue of the same mistake the plaintiff purchased. The latter could not take his chances of getting a title to the property purchased, and, if he failed in that, recover back his money paid from the officer making the sale. Ignorance or mistake of the law will not excuse a man, nor relieve from the consequences of crime, or from liability for torts or on contracts, much less confer a right of action upon him which he would not have had but for the ignorance or mistake. There are exceptions to, limitations upon, and qualifications of, the above rule; but this case does not fall within any of the exceptions, limitations, or qualifications.

What was said in the case of Southern R. Co. v. Florence, 141 Ala. 495, 37 So. 844, 3 Ann. Cas. 106, is applicable here, and that decision supports the ruling of the lower court in this case. It is there said: "This action was brought to recover back money paid by plaintiff to defendant for a license to operate a toll bridge as required by an ordinance, because illegally collected. Plaintiff bases its right of recovery upon the proposition that the ordinance under which the exaction was made and the money paid was and is void, and upon the further proposition that, because only a portion of the bridge operated by it was within the city limits, therefore the action was illegal. It is clear from this statement that plaintiff predicates his right of recovery upon a mistake of law. It is not insisted that there was any fraud or imposition, or that plaintiff did not have full knowledge of all the facts."

It is needless to say that this action is not brought under any of our statutes providing that a taxpayer may [162] recover back money which he paid under void statutes, void assessments, etc. No such contention is made by appellant, who is not a taxpayer, but a purchaser at tax sale. Careful research by us fails to disclose a single case in which a purchaser at a tax sale was allowed to recover back his money, the purchase price, because either the statute or the sale was void—not even to the extent of the taxes legally due, unless such action was expressly provided for by the statute. There are in some of the other states statutes which authorize a recovery by the purchaser to the extent of the taxes due, but we have no such statute in Alabama.

There is a radical difference between the right of a person to recover back money which he was required to pay by the taxing power under a void law or assessment and the claim of one who purchase property at a tax sale which is void. The latter is a mere volunteer in making the payment; he has the same means of knowing whether or not the sale is authorized, valid, or void, that the officer making the sale has. He buys a title without warranty. His speculation may prove profitable or unprofitable; and no one has, in either case, taken his money without his consent, or with any contract, express or implied, to reimburse him if his bargain proves a bad one for him. Lynde v. Melrose, 10 Allen (Mass.) 49. The above has been well stated by the Texas court as follows: "In McCormick v. Edwards, 69 Tex. 108, 6 S. W. 33, it was said: 'After a careful research we have found no case in which a purchaser at a void tax sale has, without the aid of a statute, been permitted to recover even the taxes lawfully assessed upon the land and paid by his purchase. It would seem equitable that he should at least recover the taxes which the landowner ought to have paid, and which he failed [163] to pay. Many states have, accordingly, passed statutes in regulation of this subject, and giving the relief indicated; and, so far as we have been able to discover, whenever this relief has been given or sanctioned by a court of last resort, it has been by virtue of statutory law.'"

In the case of Lisso v. Police Jury, 127 La. 283, 53 So. 566, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1141, and notes thereto, the authorities are all reviewed, and the law seems to be as we have decided it above.

The purchaser at a tax sale is provided for in certain cases mentioned in section 2304 et seq. of the Code, but no claim is made that this case is brought within these statutes. In no event, and under no phase of the pleadings or the evidence, was the plaintiff entitled to recover in this action. No possible injury could or did result by any adverse ruling complained of.

Affirmed.

NOTE.

Personal Liability of Officer for Sale of Property for Taxes under Void Statute.

There appear to be no decisions other than the reported case dealing with the personal liability of an officer for the sale of property for taxes under a void statute; and it would seem from the authorities cited in the notes to Foster v. Malberg, Ann. Cas. 1914A 1116, and Pennock v. Douglas County, 42 Am. St. Rep. 579, which treat of analogous propositions, that there is a general acquiescence in the rule laid down in the reported case, that an officer who sells property for taxes under a void statute is not personally liable to a purchaser of the property. The basis of the rule is that the purchaser has the same means of knowing whether the sale is authorized, valid or void, that the officer making the sale has, and that the purchaser at a tax sale comes strictly and rigidly within the rule of caveat emptor. Thus it is said in Desty on Taxation p. 850 that "except as limited and qualified by express statutory provisions, the rule (caveat emptor) applies to all purchasers at tax sales; and, if the public has nothing to sell, the purchaser gets nothing." So in the case of Hamilton v. Valiant, 30 Md. 139, wherein the purchaser at a tax sale which was invalid for want of proper notice brought an action for damages against the officer whose omission invalidated the sale, it was held that no liability existed. The court said: "The purchaser's title mainly depends upon the regularity of the proceedings of the officer who makes the sale, he is however bound to inquire whether he has acted in conformity with the law from which his power is derived; and if he acted without proper inquiry and care, it was his own fault, and buying upon the faith of his own judgment he must abide the consequences."

STATE EX REL. GASS

v.

GORDON.

Missouri Supreme Court—December 22, 1915.

266 Mo. 394; 181 S. W. 1016.

"Revenue" — Meaning of Term.

In view of Const. art. 11, §§ 6, 7, providing that the school fund shall consist of certain funds together with so much of the ordinary revenue of the state as may be by law set apart for that purpose, and that, in case the public school fund shall be insufficient to sustain a free school four months in each year, the general assembly may provide for such deficiency, but in no case shall there be set apart less than twenty-five per cent of the state revenue, the word "revenue" used in Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third of the ordinary revenue paid into the state treasury for school purposes, means the annual and current income of the state, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses in contradistinction to sums which are required to be paid into the state fund; the word "revenue" in its ordinary sense meaning the annual yield of taxes, etc., collected by the state.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such case, the word "ordinary" is to be given its usual meaning as "according to settled order," and the school fund is entitled to one-third of the regular and usual annual income of the state subject to appropriation for public uses.

[See note at end of this case.]

Statutes — Construction — Effectuating Legislative Intent.

Statutes should be construed so as to give effect to legislative intent and avoid meaningless and absurd results.

Words Given Ordinary Meaning.

In construing a statute, words should be given their ordinary meaning.

Practical Construction.

The construction of executive officers entrusted with the duty of carrying out statutes is entitled to great weight.

"Revenue" — Meaning of Term — Particular Items Included.

Under Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating for schools one-third of the ordinary revenue of the state, gross earnings of and fees collected by various state departments are revenue only when paid directly into the state treasury without deduction for the expenses of the departments and salaries of the officers thereof, but when such deduction is made only the surplus is revenue.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

In such case, as Laws 1913, p. 367, providing for inspections of hay and grain by warehouse commissioners, provides, in section 41, that fees shall be regulated so as to produce only sufficient funds to defray the expenses of the department, and Rev. St. 1909, § 10955, provides for payments to local commissioners out of the textbook filing fund, only the surplus remaining after payment of such charges is revenue.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Interest on ordinary state deposits, other than special funds, governed by Laws 1911, p. 114, § 10, requiring expenditure of the interest for the purpose of the fund, is "ordinary revenue" within Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third thereof for schools.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Fines assessed against lumber companies are not "ordinary revenue," within Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third of annual revenue for schools, as such fines are wholly adventitious and are in no way annual.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Moneys intermittently transferred from the insurance department fund to the general revenue fund are not ordinary annual revenue within Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third thereof for schools, particularly as Rev. St. 1909, § 6884, requires payment into the special fund, and as transfers are not binding on the legislature and are made biennially.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Under Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third of annual ordinary revenue for schools, neither the gross nor net income from the factory inspection fund is ordinary revenue, for such income goes into a special fund for expenses of inspection which cannot be made up from the general revenue, and the transfer to the general revenue fund is made biennially by Rev. St. 1909, § 7826.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Only the net earnings of examiners appointed by the state auditor is "ordinary revenue" within Laws 1915, p. 89, § 1, appropriating one-third for schools, for Laws 1913, p. 767, § 5, provides for payment of salaries of examiners out of the per diem received from counties and payment of surplus into the treasury.

A. G. Young for School District of Webb City.

Arthur B. Chamier for School District of Chamier.

[399] FARIS, J.—This is an original proceeding by mandamus, brought by relator as State Superintendent of Public Schools, to compel respondent, as State Auditor, to set apart and certify for payment to the relator for the use of the public schools of the State, the sum of $496,587.34, under the Act of February 12, 1915 (Laws 1915, p. 89), which required the State Auditor to ascertain and set apart one-third of the ordinary revenue for the support of the public schools.

The case is here upon the pleadings and an agreed statement of facts. The pleadings are conventional, and since no point is made touching them, we need not cumber the books with them. The agreed statement of facts, which we apprehend will be found sufficient to convey an understanding of the conditions and issues, runs thus:

"It is agreed that during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, there were paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the General Revenue Fund, the following sums from the different sources mentioned:

1. From county collectors (tax on real and personal property)	$3,851,174 61
2. County foreign insurance tax	365,449 17
3. Private car tax	9,870 90
4. Express companies' tax	44,737 68
5. Notaries' commissions	12,336 00
6. Land Department fees	556 23
7. Fees earned in office of State Auditor	8,380 88
8. Fees earned by office of Secretary of State	9,719 30
[400] 9. Incorporation tax (fees paid by corporations upon their incorporation and upon their increase of capital stock)	87,017 50

10. Fees from Excise Commissioner of city of St. Louis	42,462 00
11. Proceeds of sale of beer stamps ..	460,858 27
12. Interest received from State depositaries	147,223 35
13. Sale of oil stamps (being fees from oil inspections)	150,466 80
14. Interest on deposit of fees by St. Louis Excise Commissioner	47 17
15. Interest on deposit of Fish Commission	18 74
16. Excess fees from clerk of Supreme Court, clerk of St. Louis Court of Appeals, clerk of Springfield Court of Appeals, clerk of Kansas City Court of Appeals	3,573 62
17. Fees collected by Excise Commissioners of St. Louis county	3,713 02
18. Receipts from sale of laws	2,018 50
19. Receipts from old bond and coupon account	15,270 43
20. Receipts from amounts refunded ..	36,032 06
21. Receipts from fines assessed against lumber companies for violation of Anti-Trust Act	252,728 65
22. Receipts from fees of Poultry Experiment Station	5,280 96
23. Receipts from fees of Warehouse and Grain Department	127,123 37
24. Moneys earned by State Auditors' Examiners	6,702 08
25. Receipts from insurance on Federal Soldiers' Home	2,308 92
26. Receipts from sale of old furniture ..	165 00
27. Receipts for Itinerant Vendors Licenses	25 00
28. Receipts from fees of Bureau of Labor	2 07
29. Receipts from fees of Board of Agriculture	25 00
30. Receipts from fees of Fruit Experiment Station	298 72
31. Receipts from Fish Commissioner's refund	301 05
32. Transferred from Insurance Department Fund	125,000 00
33. Transferred from Factory Inspection Fund	6,271 93
34. Transferred from Text-Book Fund ..	990 00
35. Receipts from fees of Public Service Commission	36,946 87

"The aggregate of the items enumerated above, numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4, is $4,271,232.36. The respondent, State Auditor, did on July 3, 1915, set apart and certify to the relator one-third of said sums, that is to say, $1,423,744.12, as the total amount to be apportioned [401] by relator for the benefit of the public schools of the State.

"The respondent, as State Auditor, and his predecessors in said office, have continuously annually for many years prior to the present year, set apart and certified to the relator and the predecessors of the relator in the office of State Superintendent of Public Schools, in addition to one-third of the moneys derived from our first four sources above mentioned, one-third also of the moneys derived from the following sources, to wit:

5. Notaries commissions.
6. Land Department fees.
7. Fees earned in office of State Auditor.
8. Fees earned by office of Secretary of State.
9. Incorporation tax.
10. Fees from Excise Commissioner of city of St. Louis.
11. Proceeds of sale of beer stamps.
12. Interest received from State depositaries.
13. Sale of oil stamps.
14. Interest on deposit of fees by St. Louis Excise Commissioner.
15. Interest on deposit of Fish Commission.
16. Excess fees from clerk of Supreme Court, clerk of St. Louis Court of Appeals, clerk of Springfield Court of Appeals, clerk of Kansas City Court of Appeals.
17. Fees collected by Excise Commissioners of St. Louis county.

"That the moneys derived from said sources, numbered 5 to 17, both inclusive, and paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the General Revenue Fund during the year ending June 30, 1915, amounted in the aggregate to $926,372.87, no portion of which has been set apart and certified by respondent as State Auditor to the relator, for the year ending June 30, 1915.

"Neither the respondent, as State Auditor, nor any of his predecessors in said office, have heretofore set apart or certified to the relator or his predecessors in the office of Superintendent of Public Schools, any portion of the moneys derived and paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the General Revenue Fund from the following sources:

- [402] 18. Receipts from sale of laws.
19. Receipts from old bond and coupon account.
 20. Receipts from amounts refunded.
 21. Receipts from fines assessed against lumber companies for violations of Anti-Trust Act.
 22. Receipts from fees of Poultry Experiment Station.
 23. Receipts from fees of Warehouse and Grain Department.
 24. Moneys earned by State Auditors' Examiners.
 25. Receipts from insurance on Federal Soldiers' Home.
 26. Receipts from sale of old furniture.
 27. Receipts from Itinerant Vendors' Licenses.
 28. Receipts from fees of Bureau of Labor.
 29. Receipts from fees of Board of Agriculture.
 30. Receipts from fees of Fruit Experiment Station.
 31. Receipts from Fish Commissioner's refund.
 32. Transferred from Insurance Department Fund.
 33. Transferred from Factory Inspection Fund.
 34. Transferred from Text-Book Fund.
 35. Receipts from fees of Public Service Commission.

"Some of the laws from which these moneys were derived and paid into the State Treasury are of comparatively recent enactment, as will be pointed out in the briefs to be filed.

"The relator here expressly waives and abandon any claim to a setting apart or a certificate to him by respondent of any part of the moneys derived from the sources now to be mentioned and already referred to in this statement by numbers, as follows:
Ann. Cas. 1918B.—13.

19. Receipts from old bond and coupon account.
20. Receipts from amounts refunded.
26. Receipts from insurance on Federal Soldiers' Home.
26. Receipts from sale of old furniture.
27. Receipts from Itinerant Vendors' Licenses.
31. Receipts from Fish Commissioner's refund.

And it is agreed that the relator's petition be taken and regarded as amended by striking out any claim to a setting apart of moneys derived from any of the sources last mentioned.

"After excluding from consideration the moneys derived from the six sources last mentioned (claim to which is now abandoned), the moneys derived from the other sources mentioned (no part of which has ever [403] been set apart and certified by State Auditors for the benefit of the public schools), and paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the General Revenue Fund, amount to the sum of $563,389.15.

"The moneys paid out for salaries and expenses of the Warehouse and Grain Department during the period mentioned, were $96,491.42. The receipts of said department were $127,123.37.

"The sum paid out of the State Treasury for the support (salaries and expenses) of the Public Service Commission during the year mentioned were largely in excess of the fees paid into the State Treasury and earned by said commission.

"The same is true as to the proceeds of the sale of laws; the expense of publishing the laws being greater than the amount received from the sale.

"The expense of maintaining the Poultry Experiment Station, which is paid out of the State Treasury, is largely in excess of the fees received on that account.

"The same is true of salaries and expenses connected with the Department of Labor; the Board of Agriculture and the Fruit Experiment Station; in each case the expense of maintaining each one of these departments, which is paid out of the State Treasury, is in excess of the fees received from them respectively.

"The amount of the salaries, wages and expenses of the State Auditors' Examiners, which were paid by the State, was substantially the same as the moneys paid into the State Treasury on account of the services of said examiners.

"The one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollar ($125,000) item, numbered 32 in this statement, 'Transferred from Insurance Department Fund,' was so transferred by virtue of section 55a, an act with the heading:

'Appropriations; contingent and incidental [404] expenses for the years 1915 and 1916,' approved April 2, 1915, Laws 1915, p. 20.

"The Attorney-General wrote to the respondent, the State Auditor, the opinions set out in the return of the respondent.

"It is agreed that, prior to the filing of the petition for an alternative writ of mandamus, demand was made by relator upon respondent for the relief herein sought, and the same was refused; and that the petition shall be considered and taken as amended so as to show such demand and refusal.

"In the cases in which the figures shown in the petition as to the amount of moneys received from any source do not correspond with the figures contained in this agreed statement of facts, the petition is to be considered as amended to correspond to the agreed statement of facts.

"If the court shall be of the opinion that as to moneys derived from some of the sources mentioned in the relator's petition and claimed by him therein (and not herein waived and abandoned by him), the relator's claim as made in his petition to a setting apart and certification to him of a part thereof cannot be maintained, and shall be of the opinion that as to some of said moneys no part thereof should be set apart or certified by respondent to relator, it is agreed that as to such moneys and the claim thereof the petition of the relator shall be taken and considered as amended by striking out all claim on account of any said moneys, and the relator hereby asks that his petition be considered and regarded as amended in that respect; so that if the court shall be of the opinion that the relator is entitled to any part of the relief which he asks, he shall not be denied all relief for the reason that he has asked for more than he is entitled to."

[405] OPINION.

I. While we have not had the benefit of respondent's views, since regrettably and to the great increase of our labors, he has not seen fit to furnish us with a brief it is apodeictic that the controversy turns upon the construction to be placed upon section 1 of the Act of February 12, 1915, appropriating money out of the State Revenue Fund for the support of the public schools. [Laws 1915, sec. 1, p. 89.] This section reads thus:

"There is hereby appropriated out of the State Revenue Fund, to be applied to the support of the public schools of the State, one-third of the ordinary revenue paid into the State Treasury for the fiscal years from July 1, 1914, to June 30, 1916, which amount of said fiscal year apportionment shall be ascertained and set apart to said school moneys by the State Auditor, as is or may hereafter be provided by law."

It is likewise apparent that the controversy in its last analysis resolves itself into the single question: What is the meaning of the two words "ordinary revenue," as these words are used in the Legislative act, supra?

It is fairly clear, we think, that the word "revenue" is modified or limited by the use of the word "ordinary." The effect of this limitation we will discuss hereafter. Turning to the lexicons of the language we find that the word "revenue" means: "The annual yield of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a Nation, State, or municipality collects and receives into the treasury for public use." [Webster's Int. Dict.] "The total current income of a government, however derived, subject to appropriation for public uses." [Standard Dict.] "The annual income of a State derived from the taxation, customs, excise, or other sources and appropriated to the payment of the national expenses." [Century Dict.]

[406] These definitions have met the approval of the courts, as will be noted by an examination of the below cases: Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289; Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732; U. S. v. Norton, 91 U. S. 566, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 454; State v. School Fund Com'rs, 4 Kan. 261; Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 330; State v. Ewing, 22 Kan. 708; U. S. v. Bromley, 12 How. 88, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 905; People's U. S. Bank v. Goodwin, 162 Fed. 937; In re Magnes, 32 Colo 527, 77 Pac. 853.

In the case of State v. Ewing, supra, at page 712, the Supreme Court of Kansas, in an opinion by Judge Brewer, sometime judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, said:

"The Act of 1879 is entitled, 'An act to provide revenue,' etc. Now how broad is the term 'revenue,' and what may be included in such a title? Does it mean simply funds raised by taxation, and is the levying of taxes all that may be included? Such would seem to be the views of the counsel for the State, but we cannot think them correct. One of the definitions given by Webster of the term is, 'the annual produce of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a Nation or State collects and receives into the treasury for public use.' The word is broad and general, and includes all public moneys which the State collects and receives, from whatever source and in whatever manner. The general funds in this State are collected from taxes, but the Legislature might, in an act with such a title—at least, so far as any question of the form of the legislation is concerned—enact that they be collected from licenses, or from the sale of lottery tickets, or it might unite and enact that part might be collected from one source and in one manner, and the rest from another source and in a different manner."

In the case of U. S. v. Bromley, supra, at page 96, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

[407] "That the act which prescribes the offense charged is a revenue law, there would seem to be no doubt. In its title, it is declared to be an act to reduce the rates of postage, and for the 'prevention of frauds on the revenue of the Post-Office Department.' In its character and object it is a revenue law, as it acts upon the rates of postage and increases the revenue by prohibiting and punishing fraudulent acts which lessen it. Under the Act of 1836, the revenue of the Post-Office Department is paid into the Treasury. Revenue is the income of a State, and the revenue of the Post-Office Department, being raised by a tax on mailable matter conveyed in the mail, and which is disbursed in the public service, is as much a part of the income of the government as moneys collected for duties on imports."

The various definitions of this word as collated and summarized by Cyc. are as follows:

"The annual product of taxes, excise customs, duties, rents, etc., which a Nation or State collects and receives into the Treasury for public use; the yearly income of a government or a person natural or artificial, from the property belonging to such government or person; the income of the State; the income which a State collects and receives into its Treasury and has appropriated for the payment of its expenses; the product or fruit of taxation; the income of the government arising from taxation, duties and the like; the annual profits of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a Nation or State collects and receives into the Treasury for public use; the income of the State or Nation derived from the duties and taxes and other sources for the payment of the national expenses." [34 Cyc. 1691.]

Clearly the word "revenue" is broader than and includes taxation, as well as all other sources of municipal income. Revenue may be said to be the genus, while taxation is but a species. We are convinced [408] therefore that the word "revenue," as used in the appropriation act under discussion, when standing alone, and when not modified by the word "ordinary" (which we shall later discuss, when we come to sum up our conclusions), means: The annual and current income of the State, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses. This excludes such income as the Constitution, or any permanent existing law, may specifically devote to a special purpose, in contradistinction to a general public use, or which is not required to be paid into the State Revenue Fund, but into a special fund, e. g., the collateral inheritance tax, specifically collected for the support of the State University and its departments (Sec. 312, R. S. 1909); the money derived from license fees on motor vehicles (Laws 1911, p. 331, sec. 13); fees paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the "Insurance Department Fund" (Sec. 6884, R. S. 1909); and others of similar sort. Color is lent to this view not alone by the lexical meaning of the word revenue and by its construction by respectable and high courts, but by the very language of our Constitution, which enjoins upon the Legislature the making of this appropriation for the support of the public schools, and which reads thus:

"In case the public school fund now provided and set apart by law, for the support of free public schools, shall be insufficient to sustain a free school at least four months in every year in each school district in this State, the General Assembly may provide for such deficiency in accordance with section eleven of the article on revenue and taxation; but in no case shall there be set apart less than twenty-five per cent of the State revenue, exclusive of the interest and sinking fund, to be applied annually to the support of the public schools."

Further light is cast upon this view by the provisions of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution, [409] which, after naming divers sources from which funds for the support of the public schools of the State should be derived, couples itself by language in pari materia with section 7, supra, by providing, among other things, that certain named funds from the several sources in the section designated, "together with so much of the ordinary revenue of the State as may be by law set apart for that purpose," shall be faithfully appropriated for establishing and maintaining the free public schools," etc. [Italics ours.] Confessedly, however, when we concede that the expressions used are in pari materia and therefore in a way synonymous, we are met by the doubt whether they each mean "State revenue," or each mean "ordinary revenue of the State." The latter expression is first used in the article; the former merely refers back to the latter logically we may say, for the definition of the words "State revenue" as latterly used. So, no comfortable short-cut can with logical consistency, be found in the Constitution. For the Legislature, in nineteen appropriation acts, out of a total of twenty, has used the words "ordinary State revenue," or "ordinary revenue," as used in said section 6, instead of the language in section 7 of the Constitution; notwithstanding the last-named section is the one which specifically enjoins upon the Legislature the duty of appropriating as much as one-fourth of the State revenue for the support of the public schools.

II. From 1877, when for the first time it became the Legislature's Constitution-enjoined duty to appropriate "at least twenty-five per cent of the State revenue, exclusive of the interest and sinking fund," to the support of the public schools, till 1887, the Legislature of this State biennially set apart "one-fourth of the ordinary State revenue paid into the treasury" for the support of the public schools; using in making such appropriation [410] the language we italicise above. [Laws 1877, p. 12; Laws 1879, p. 3; Laws 1881, p. 3; Laws 1883, p. 4; Laws 1885, p. 4.] In 1887 "one-third of the ordinary State revenue" was for the first time appropriated for the support of the public schools of this State. Biennially since, one-third, instead of one-fourth, of the ordinary revenue has been by the Legislatures of this State so set apart. Likewise in the years 1887, 1889 and 1891, the language of the Appropriation Act was "ordinary State revenue." [Laws 1887, p. 4; Laws 1889, p. 12; Laws 1891, p. 24.] For the first time in 1893, and ever since, barring one exception, that of the Act of 1895, below discussed, the words used in making this appropriation have been simply "ordinary revenue." [Laws 1893, p. 19; Laws 1897, p. 21; Laws 1899, p. 24; Laws 1901, p. 19; Laws 1903, p. 22; Laws 1905, p. 26; Laws 1907, p. 38; Laws 1909, p. 50; Laws 1911, p. 72; Laws 1913, p. 82; Laws 1915, p. 89, already set out verbatim, supra.] In 1895 the Legislature in making this appropriation used the words "one-third of all moneys paid into the State Treasury for the years 1895 and 1896 to the credit of the State Revenue Fund." [Laws 1895, p. 18.] It is urged that the expression used, to wit, "one-third of all the moneys paid . . . to the credit of the State Revenue Fund," is highly significant. We do not so regard it. For the "one-third of all the moneys" is limited by the requirement that such moneys shall be from the "State revenue;" and the question here largely vexing us is, What moneys of the State are included in the expression "State revenue," and what is meant thereby? We would grant the contention if the language of the act had been simply "one-third of all the moneys paid into the State Treasury," and had, as it did not, stopped there. But this is not important. At most it is but a straw in the wind, only infinitesimally meet in determining direction.

[411] III. We conclude then that both lexically and historically the definition given above of the word "revenue" as used in the statute under discussion, is reasonably correct. But as this word appears both in the appropriation act here confronting us and in the Constitution (Sec. 6, art. 11, Constitution 1875), it is clearly limited by the word "ordinary." We are not warranted in casting this word out, but must use it and give a meaning to it, if to do so will not defeat the legislative intent, or render the statute and organic law absurd or meaningless. [Strotzman v. St. Louis, etc. R. Co. 211 Mo. 227, 109 S. W. 769; State v. Harter, 188 Mo. 516, 87 S. W. 941.]

As words when used by the people in their Constitution, and by the Legislatures in their statutes, are ordinarily to be construed to be used in their ordinary sense (Sec. 8057, R. S. 1909), again recourse must be had to the dictionaries. From these we find the word "ordinary" means in its adjectival use as it occurs in the act before us: "According to established order; settled, regular." It is a synonym of "normal, common, customary, usual." Its antonyms are: "Extraordinary, unusual, uncommon." Taking the two words together, then, as they occur both in our Constitution and in the appropriation act before us, and being guided by both their lexical and legal meanings, as well as the construction urged on us by the necessity for formulating a fixed and general rule, we conclude that the words "ordinary revenue," as used in said section 6, article 11, of the Constitution and in the act under discussion (Sec. 1. p. 89, Laws 1915), mean: The regular and usual annual income of the State, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses.

IV. Keeping this construction of the meaning of "ordinary revenue" before us, there is no mountainous [412] difficulty in deciding the concrete facts here vexing us. The controversy for the most part, we think, becomes fairly plain. The trouble lies in steering a legal, logical and sensible course through the bewildering maze of diverse statutes which created departments of the State government, the operating of some of which is carried on at a total or partial loss and others of which produce either gross or net incomes to the State, and of formulating a fixed rule of construction, applicable to all these diverse conditions, which will serve to obviate the thick and excusable uncertainty heretofore and now prevailing.

If we should grant that as a matter of law, the words "ordinary revenue" are ambiguous—a thing we cannot bring ourselves to concede—we could, if the above conditions presented all of the facts and showed all of the difficulties, very readily (if there were not other and additional items in dispute) and speedily settle this case by invoking the well-recognized rule of statutory construction, that the meaning put upon the words of these many similar appropriation acts by the executive officers of the State upon whom the duty of interpretation falls, is of great weight, and absent other qualifying considerations, decisive (Schawacker v. McLaughlin, 139 Mo. 333, 40 S. W. 935; Darling v. Potts, 118 Mo. 506, 24 S. W. 461; Ross v. Kansas City, etc. R. Co. 111 Mo. 18, 19 S. W. 541; Barber Asphalt Paving Co. v. Meservey, 103 Mo. App. 186, 77 S. W. 137); especially when coupled with the passive acquiescence of the Legislature for almost forty years. But other items, to wit, those numbered 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34 and 35, are likewise in dispute here. As to these items we gather from the record and judicially notice from the public biennial reports of the State Auditor there has been no uniform practice in the office of the State Auditor. Some years some of these items last above were included, and in other years they, or some of them formerly taken into account, were omitted, and others of them used. So great was [413] the doubt and uncertainty in this behalf existing that it caused the discrepancy to be pointed out by a special legislative committee having in charge the examination of the various State offices.

In the light of this latter condition we cannot say that executive interpretation, long acquiesced in by the Legislature, aid us; for the very simple reason that there has been no uniformity in interpretation by such executive officers, and conduct seeming to be legislative acquiescence is found to be passive noninterference with changing methods wholly lacking uniformity. It is plain then that we are not aided and cannot be aided by invoking any rule of construction made for us by executive interpretation through a long course of years.

V. It appears from the record that moneys accruing from items numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4, to wit:

1. From county collectors (tax on real and personal property);
2. County foreign insurance tax;
3. Private car tax;
4. Express companies' tax;

aggregating $4,271,232.36, are not in dispute; that in pursuance of a uniform custom, the respondent, as both he and his predecessors in office have always done, set apart and certified on July 3, 1915, for the use of the public schools, the sum of $1,423,744.12. So with these items, since there is no dispute here about them or about this sum, and since we think the course taken as to them is undoubtedly correct, we need not concern ourselves further.

Items numbered 19, 20, 25, 26, 27 and 31, to wit:

19. Receipts from old bond and coupon account;
20. Receipts from amounts refunded;

25. Receipts from insurance on Federal Soldiers' Home;
26. Receipts from sale of old furniture;
27. Receipts from itinerant vendors' licenses;
31. Receipts from Fish Commissioner's Refund;

[414] are abandoned by relator. He concedes that the public schools are not, under the terms of the act under discussion, entitled to one-third of any of the items last above. Therefore we dismiss them from our discussion.

Items numbered 5 to 17, both inclusive, to wit:

5. Notaries' commissions.
6. Land Department fees.
7. Fees earned in office of State Auditor.
8. Fees earned by office of Secretary of State.
9. Incorporation tax.
10. Fees from Excise Commissioner of city of St. Louis.
11. Proceeds of sale of beer stamps.
12. Interest received from State depositaries.
13. Sale of oil stamps.
14. Interest on deposit of fees by St. Louis Excise Commissioner.
15. Interest on deposit of Fish Commission.
16. Excess fees from clerk of Supreme Court, clerk of St. Louis Court of Appeals, clerk of Springfield Court of Appeals, clerk of Kansas City Court of Appeals.
17. Fees collected by Excise Commissioners of St. Louis county.

are, however, in dispute here. The agreed case as to them shows that both respondent and his predecessors in the office of State Auditor have for many years uniformly, until this year, set apart one-third of all State income arising from each of the last above several items, under authority conferred by appropriation acts couched in precisely similar verbiage to that here under discussion.

Items numbered 18, 21, 22, 23, 24, 28, 29, 30, 32, 33, 34 and 35, to wit:

18. Receipts from sale of laws.
21. Receipts from fines assessed against lumber companies for violations of Anti-Trust Act.
22. Receipts from fees of Poultry Experiment Station.
23. Receipts from fees of Warehouse and Grain Department.
24. Moneys earned by State Auditors' Examiners.
28. Receipts from fees of Bureau of Labor.
29. Receipts from fees of Board of Agriculture.
30. Receipts from fees of Fruit Experiment Station.
32. Transferred from Insurance Department fund.
33. Transferred from Factory Inspection fund.
34. Transferred from Text-Book Fund.
35. Receipts from fees of Public Service Commission.

[415] are likewise in dispute. None of said items last above has been uniformly taken into account in setting apart moneys from general revenue for the support of public schools by either respondent or any of his predecessors. Thus stands the controversy, and so we come to consider specific matters and funds in dispute.

VI. The question whether "ordinary revenue" includes the whole of the $127,123.37 of gross earnings of the office of Warehouse Commissioners, or whether it includes only the net earnings (the sum of $30,631.95) of such office after deducting aggregate sums paid out of the State Treasury for salaries and contingent expenses for upkeep, presents much difficulty. No consistent course has been pursued by the Legislature in dealing with this department. This makes it well nigh impossible for us to deduce a consistent rule touching the fees of this department. In 1913 the whole of article 2 of chapter 60, Revised Statutes 1909, which provided theretofore for the inspection of hay and grain, was repealed and a new act in toto was passed (Laws 1913, pp. 354-373), which of course, is now the law. That this department was not intended to be an earner of profits, but merely to pay its own way, appears conclusively from the terms of the act itself, which provides that the charges fixed by the Warehouse Commissioner for services rendered "shall be regulated in such manner as will, in the judgment of the commissioner, produce sufficient revenue to meet the necessary expenses of the service of inspection and no more." [Sec. 41, p. 367, Laws 1913.] This view is accentuated by the language of the section of the act appropriating money for the support of this department for the years 1913 and 1914 (the earning for six months of which latter year are here in controversy). After setting out the amounts appropriated, it is further provided in the act "that no more [money] [416] shall be drawn against the appropriation than has been paid into the treasury by said department, the intention being that the above-named department shall support itself out of its fees made and turned into the treasury." [Laws 1913, p. 9, sec. 12b.] While there is no such condition specifically attached to the appropriation for this department for the years 1915 and 1916, so far as we have been able to find, yet the condition set out in the Act of 1913, in intent, only follows the terms of the act creating the department. [Sec. 41, Laws 1913, p. 367, supra.] Therefore, while conceding that by reason of the inconsistency of treatment of this department by the Legislature, we are unable to bring it strictly within the definition we formulate, we conclude that only the net sum, after deducting operating expenses, should be here taken into account. So much only can we gather of the intent of the Legislature from its acts. If the intent be otherwise, the language next used by the Legislature can clarify the point beyond dispute. Indeed, here for a period of six months, the case falls exactly within our rule. We are unable from the facts before us to segregate the earnings of this period from those of the other six months in controversy. For these reasons we take into account from this item, the sum of $30,631.95 only, same being net revenue left after the payment of all operating expenses.

The general rule by which departments like the above are to be measured, would seem to be that: Whenever a statute creating a department of government of this State provides (or whenever an appropriation for the support of a department of government contains such a proviso) that the cost of operation shall be defrayed wholly from fees earned by such department and not otherwise, then clearly the State is, as to an amount equal to the cost of upkeep, a trustee merely of the moneys paid in, and the State's general [417] revenue fund is entitled only to the surplus paid in to the State Treasury after deducting expenses of the operation of such department. For strictly speaking, in such case the appropriation is not made out of the general revenue of the State, but out of the earnings of the department. By the very terms of the attached condition, the officers would not be paid in full, or at all if no fees were earned. (e. g., Hay and Grain Inspection Department, Laws 1913, p. 367, sec. 41, Laws 1913, p. 9, sec. 12b; Text-Book Filing Fund, sec. 10955, R. S. 1909). So to all such the term "revenue" means net revenue. This in fact is the present rule by statute as to the fees of the clerk of this court and likewise as to the fees of the clerks of the several Courts of Appeals.

As to other departments and the earnings thereof, when payment of operating expenses is in no wise conditioned upon earnings, and which earnings go directly by express statute into the State Treasury, the gross sum of earnings is to be considered ordinary revenue, e. g., earnings of the Public Service Commission; earnings of the Secretary of State (sec. 10718, R. S. 1909); earnings of the State Auditor (sec. 1276, R. S. 1909), etc. This for the reason that the statutes provide for the payment of the expenses of all of these departments whether they earn fees or not, and because all of such fees earned by the former (Laws 1913, p. 567, sec. 21) as well as those earned by the two latter, are by statutes required to be paid into the State Treasury (secs. 10716, 10717, 10718, R. S. 1909) to the credit of the revenue fund.

VII. It is patent that interest accruing to the State from moneys deposited in banks, or other State depositaries, is to be considered as "ordinary revenue" within the purview of the appropriation act under discussion, and in the light [418] of our construction of the words "ordinary revenue," supra, save and except in such cases (if such there be) wherein the interest accrues from a special fund, and by express provision of law is required to be expended for the identical purpose of the special fund, from which it accrued. [Cf. Act of March 24, 1911, sec. 10, p. 114, Laws 1911.]

VIII. From the rules which we are impelled to formulate from our view of the law, we are of opinion that the fines assessed against the Arkansas Lumber Co. and others in the suit of State v. Arkansas Lumber Co. 260 Mo. 212, 169 S. W. 145, are not to be taken into account but wholly excluded. (Such fines have never been taken into account heretofore in this behalf by any State Auditor.) This, for the reason that while it is undoubtedly revenue, it is not ordinary revenue, because it is not annual or current, but wholly adventitious and in the nature of a "windfall," if we may use an horticultural expression.

Likewise item 32, the same being the moneys which have been intermittently, for some years prior, and which were, by act of the last Legislature, transferred from the "Insurance Department Fund" to the general revenue fund, is not to be taken into account. This for the reasons that these moneys are not annual, or current revenue; and because they are required to be paid into a special fund (Sec. 6884, R. S. 1909) and because only the "overflow" from this fund reaches the State revenue fund, and then only pursuant to an express and special act passed, ordinarily, biennially, transferring a portion of such fund to State revenue. [Laws 1915, sec. 55a, p. 20; Laws 1913, sec. 79, p. 30.] We say "ordinarily biennially," for the reason that we have been unable to find any general statute making such transfer mandatory upon each or any Legislature, [419] and note that no such transfer was made in 1905, or in 1895. This item has never been included heretofore.

IX. Neither the gross income, nor the net income, from the Factory Inspection Fund should be taken into account, for the reasons: (a) such income, or fees, go into a special fund, viz.: "the Factory Inspection Fund," and are not annually paid into general revenue; (b) this fund is primarily to be devoted to the payment of the expenses of the Factory Inspection Department, and no excess of expense over income of the department can be made up from general state revenue, and (c) the income to the general revenue fund of the State, if any, is not paid in regular and usual annual payments, but biennially only. [Sec. 7826, R. S. 1909.]

X. The question of whether the earnings of the examiners appointed by the State Auditor and whose duty it is to examine and audit the books of the several counties and of divers state institutions, in the act more specifically set out (Laws 1913, pp. 765 et seq.), presents much of difficulty. Clearly this branch of the Treasury Department is not designed to be an earner of revenue; neither has it earned any, for the agreed facts show that the income therefrom in the biennial period here under discussion was substantially equal to the expense thereof. Pertinent parts of the statute creating this department provide thus:

"The examiner making such examination shall make out his account under oath and forward same in duplicate to the State Auditor, one copy of which shall be filed in the office of the State Auditor and the other forwarded by the State Auditor to the county court of said county or the proper officers of the city of St. Louis, who shall draw a warrant at their first meeting in payment of same and remit said amount to the examiner making the examination, addressed [420] to Jefferson City, Mo., in care of the State Auditor: Provided, that any of the regularly appointed examiners whose time is spent in the auditing of accounts of any county and receives a per diem of $7.50 for same, the amount so received from the county shall be deducted from the $2,000 authorized by this act to be paid to him from the public treasury, in order that in no case shall an examiner's salary be in excess of $2000; and provided further, that whenever the per diem of any regular examiner exceeds the amount of $2000, the salary allowed him by this act, the excess, if there be any, shall be paid into the State Treasury to the credit of the State Revenue Fund." [Laws 1913, p. 767, sec. 5.]

In substantial accordance with the rules of construction which we have reached and laid down, we hold that this item should not be taken into account in this action, but net income therefrom, if any such there may hereafter be, should be included.

XI. It follows, then, that all of the items 5 to 17, to wit:

5. Notaries' commissions;
6. Land department fees;
7. Fees earned in office of State Auditor;
8. Fees earned by office of Secretary of State;
9. Incorporation tax;
10. Fees from Excise Commissioner of city of St. Louis;
11. Proceeds of sale of beer stamps;
12. Interest received from State depositaries;
13. Sale of oil stamps;
14. Interest on deposit of fees by St. Louis Excise Commissioner;
15. Interest on deposit of Fish Commission;
16. Excess fees from clerk of Supreme Court, clerk of St. Louis Court of Appeals, clerk of Springfield Court of Appeals, clerk of Kansas City Court of Appeals;
17. Fees collected by Excise Commissioners of St. Louis county; both inclusive, are to be taken into account and included in "ordinary revenue" within the purview of the statute in dispute; for the reasons that said [421] items 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 16 and 17 are clearly "regular and usual annual income of the State . . . which is subject to appropriation for general public purposes." Moneys are derived from these several items every year. These several sums are paid into the general treasury of the State for the revenue fund, pursuant to general laws, and subject to no restrictions limiting their application; items 12, 14 and 15, supra, because they each represent interest paid upon deposits of State moneys, absent a statute requiring such interest to follow in use a specifically restricted principal.

That items 18, 22, 28, 29, 30 and 35, to wit:

- 18. Receipts from sale of laws;
- 22. Receipts from fees of Poultry Experiment Station;
- 28. Receipts from fees of Bureau of Labor;
- 29. Receipts from fees of Board of Agriculture;
- 30. Receipts from fees of Fruit Experiment Station;
- 35. Receipts from fees of Public Service Commission; and the net income of fees from items 23 and 34, to wit, the Warehouse and Grain Inspection Department, and the Text-Book Filing Fund, are likewise to be so included. What we say last above forms, we think, a sufficient reason for so including items 18, 22, 28, 29, 30 and 35. Our views and reason for excluding the gross income, but for including the net income, of the last above several items numbered 23 and 34 have been herein before set out at length.

All other items in dispute, since they do not fall within the purview of the definitions and conclusions reached by us and discussed either specifically or generally hereinabove, are to be excluded. While on first blush an apparently though not really arbitrary rule may seem to be invoked as to such items as come into the general revenue fund of the State biennially only (e. g., Factory Inspection Fund), or biennially, but intermittently, and by virtue of an express special act (e. g., transfer from Insurance Department Fund), [422] or occasionally and adventitiously (e. g., fines accruing from prosecutions of lumber companies, State v. Arkansas Lumber Co. 260 Mo. 212, 169 S. W. 145), yet upon more careful thought and consideration it will be seen that a crying necessity exists for a general rule to use in setting apart this fund, which will forever dissipate the dark obscurity which has heretofore befogged it, and that no such rule can be logically formulated, which will serve to measure all cases, if these items are to be included. This is the administrative difficulty; if it be wrongly resolved a word from the Legislature can correct it. Besides, it may well be that these rules which we have formulated as the only consistent interpretation of the legislative intent derivable from the language of the appropriation act under discussion, will serve to obviate fat and lean years in public school revenues, and that it was so intended. That those in charge of such schools may confidently rely upon a fairly fixed and stable income, and that they may not be induced to lavish and waste funds this year and be forced to a too lean and scrimping economy next year, is a desideratum to be wished for. The conclusions here reached bring this to pass and are yet, we think, in line with the law both here and elsewhere. The rule allows full latitude for a growth of the State, a condition fully demonstrated by the fact that the amount below set apart from State revenues for the support of the public school system exceeds by many thousands of dollars an appropriation for any one year ever before so devoted, from this source.

Amending the petition (which by stipulation stands as and for the alternative writ, issuance of which was waived), as provided by the agreed facts, we eliminate all items except as last above enumerated and found to be within the purview of the appropriation act and award the writ as to such items.

It is therefore our order that our peremptory writ go for the sum of $334,189.31, being the aggregate of [423] the one-third part of the items aforesaid, and making, with the sum already set apart and certified by respondent for the use of the public schools for the fiscal year 1915, a grand total of $1,757,933.43. Let our peremptory writ so issue. All concur.

"Revenue" Generally.GENERAL DEFINITION.

The definitions of the word "revenue," as found in the various lexicons, though expressed in diverse language, have practically a synonymous meaning. Revenue is defined as "the income of the government arising from taxation, duties, and the like." Bouvier, Law Dictionary, quoted in The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023; State v. School Fund Com'rs, 4 Kan. 261.

"The annual income of a state derived from the taxation, customs, excise, or other sources and appropriated to the payment of the national expenses." Century Dict. quoted in the reported case.

"The total current income of a government, however derived, subject to appropriation for public uses." Standard Dict. quoted in the reported case.

"The annual produce of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a nation or state collects and receives into the treasury for public use." Webster's Dict. quoted in Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289; Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732; Yancey v. New Manchester Mfg. Co. 35 Ga. 622; State v. Ewing, 22 Kan. 708; Pottsville v. Pottsville Gas Co. 15 Pa. Dist. 979, 32 Pa. Co. Ct. 7.

"The annual yield of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a nation, state or municipality collects and receives into the treasury for public use." Webster's Int. Dict. quoted in the reported case.

"The annual or periodical yield of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a nation, state, or municipality collects and receives into the treasury for public use; public income of whatever kind." Webster's New Int. Dict. quoted in State v. Stanton County, 100 Neb. 747, 161 N. W. 264.

"1. Income or annual profit received from lands or other property." Worcester's Dict. quoted in Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732; Curvie v. Trustees of Wabash, etc. Canal, 71 Ind. 208.

"2. The income of a nation or state derived from the duties, taxes, and other sources for the payment of the national expenses." Worcester's Dict. quoted in Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732.

The foregoing definitions are reviewed in the reported case, wherein the word "revenue" as used in an act appropriating money out of the state revenue fund for the support of the public schools (Laws Mo. 1915, § 1, p. 89) is construed. The court says that the word "revenue" is broader than and includes taxation as well as other sources of municipal income; that revenue may be said to be the genus, while taxation is but a species. So the court holds that the word "revenue," as used in the foregoing statute, when standing alone, and when not modified by the word "ordinary," means the annual and current income of the state, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses. In this sense the court holds that it excludes such income as the constitution or any permanent existing law may specifically devote to a special purpose, in contradistinction to a general public use, or which is not required to be paid into the state revenue fund, but into a special fund, e. g., the collateral inheritance tax, specifically collected for the support of the state university; and its dependent (R. S. 1909, § 312); the money derived from license fees in motor vehicles (Laws 1911, § 13, p. 331); fees paid into the state treasury to the credit of the "insurance department fund" (R. S. 1909, § 6884); and others of similar sort. For a construction of the word "revenue" as modified by the word "ordinary," see infra the subdivision Ordinary Revenue.

The term "revenue," when used with reference to funds derived from taxation, is best interpreted, in the absence of qualifying words or circumstances implying a different signification, as confined to the usual public income taxation. Laughlin v. Santa Fé County, 3 N. M. 420, 5 Pac. 817.

The ordinary meaning of the word "revenue" is the total income of the government, derived from all sources, subject to be applied to public purposes. Fergus v. Brady, 277 Ill. 272, 115 N. E. 393.

Revenue, when used as meaning that of individuals, is equivalent to income, which is the true sense generally used to designate the annual receipts, and includes receipts from all sources—at least, all permanent sources of profits or rent. Revenue is more generally used to designate the income of the government, arising from taxation, duties and the like. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 485, affirming 34 Barb. 123. To the same effect see People v. Niagara County, 4 Hill (N. Y.) 20, affirmed 7 Hill 504.

"Revenue" is a return for capital invested or labor bestowed. In a general sense, it is the annual rents, profits, interests or issues of any species of property, real or personal, belonging to an individual or the public. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 485, affirming 34 Barb. 123.

Revenue is the income of a state, and the revenue of the post-office department, being raised by a tax on mailable matter conveyed in the mail, and which is disbursed in the public service, is as much a part of the income of the government as moneys collected for duties on imports. U. S. v. Bromley, 12 How. 88, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 905.

The "revenue" or "income" of a farm is the sum total which its owner receives from it. It is not the money borrowed by the owner, or an annuity which he may own and may have pledged to pay for it, or the money invested in stock, farming utensils, or fertilizers put upon it. People v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 485, affirming 34 Barb. 123.

Moneys raised by a law authorizing the levy of a tax to build bridges and roads, is not revenue, in the sense in which the word revenue is used in the constitution, the revenue there referred to being such as may be used for the support of the state government, and the payment of its ordinary expenses. Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289.

DEFINITION WITH RESPECT TO PARTICULAR CONTEXT.

"The word 'revenue' is used in many senses. It is, like thousands of words in our language, ambiguous in meaning, the significance of which can only properly be determined by the words with which it is connected. Let it be conceded that the usual and ordinary meaning of the word, when used alone, is 'net income'—that which remains of the annual income of property after deducting from gross receipts the expenses incurred in producing the gross income—still we must resort to the context to find the sense in which it is used in the writing presented for interpretation. If the context indicates a meaning different from its ordinary and popular signification, we must adopt the meaning so indicated; that is, indicated by the words of the statute or instrument in which it is used." Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732.

The word "revenue," as used in the Illinois constitution (art. 4, sec. 18), is not limited to moneys raised by direct taxation, but includes moneys derived from all sources required by law to be paid into the state treasury within a specified time. Fergus v. Brady, reported in full, post, this volume, at page 220.

In construing a Kansas statute (Laws 1879, p. 270, c. 149, § 4) entitled "An act to provide revenue," etc., it was held in State v. Ewing, 22 Kan. 708, that the word "revenue" therein was broad and general, and included all public moneys which were collected and received by the state from whatever source and in whatever manner and did not mean simply funds raised by taxation. The court said: "Now, how broad is the term 'revenue,' and what may be included in such a title? Does it mean simply funds raised by taxation, and is the levying of taxes all that may be included? Such would seem to be the views of the counsel for the state; but we cannot think them correct. One of the definitions given by Webster of the term is 'the annual produce of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a nation or state collects and receives into the treasury for public use.' The word is broad and general, and includes all public moneys which the state collects and receives, from whatever source and in whatever manner. The general funds of this state are collected from taxes, but the legislature might, in an act with such a title—at least, so far as any question of the form of the legislation is concerned—enact that they be collected from licenses, or from the sale of lottery tickets, or it might unite and enact that part might be collected from one source and in one manner, and the rest from another source and in a different manner. Now, section 4 simply enacts what revenues shall be provided for the annual school fund, which is a public fund as much as any. Provision for it is a matter of legislative care and duty. It is true the section does not in form enact that moneys be collected; but would there be any doubt of the validity of a section which declared that a tax of one mill on the dollar be levied for the annual school fund? Would it not be conceded that this was simply providing revenue? The form of this section grows out of the constitutional provision concerning the fund and prior legislation. The constitution declares that certain lands, and the proceeds thereof, shall constitute a perpetual school fund, not to be diminished, and that the rents and interest therefrom, 'and such other means as the legislature may provide, by tax or otherwise, shall be inviolably appropriated to the support of common schools.' Prior legislation had been in the form heretofore quoted. Such section, though appearing several times in the statutes of the state, has not been re-enacted each year. The understanding has been that it continued a tax from year to year; and the state must concede this, for otherwise, as there is no express levy of the one-mill tax this year, there would be no pretense of right to enforce its collection. And this section, following the earlier statute, makes provision for the revenue of that fund, simply omitting one source. It may be said that the section is unnecessary, because the constitution already makes the same provision for that fund. Conceding that, yet it would not follow that it might not be re-enacted in a statute, or, if so re-enacted, that it was outside the scope of the title of the act. It may still be a mere provision for revenue; but it is not simply a restatement of the constitution. The constitution may grant that revenue to the annual fund; but this prescribes the limits of that fund. The constitution leaves the matter of other revenues with the legislature, and this section defines what the fund shall consist of. It is thus making provision for the revenues to be paid into the fund."

A Tennessee statute (Code, § 730) provides that "any officer concerned in the collection of revenue who has failed to collect, make returns or settlement, or pay over moneys of the state by him received, at the time and in the manner required by law, may be proceeded against summarily by motion in the circuit court by the proper law officer of the state, pursuant to the instructions of the comptroller." In Donelson v. State, 3 Lea (Tenn.) 692, in holding that this section was broad enough to give jurisdiction to the circuit court, if the money sought to be recovered was "revenue," the court said: "This, however, is denied as to a large part of the recovery. It appears that the larger part of the sum recovered is claimed to be due the state in this way. In a number of prosecutions for felony in the criminal court of Davidson county, where the defendants were in jail, the jail fees were collected from the state monthly in advance, in accordance with section 5435b. c., T. & S. Code. Upon final trial and conviction, these fees were taxed in the bill of costs, which the defendant was sentenced to work out in the workhouse, and was thereupon paid to the clerk by the county. It is argued that if the state is entitled to this money at all, it is not revenue, and the motion given by sec. 730 does not lie; and besides, as the state in its motion specially moves for 'revenue unaccounted for,' proof of the facts indicated does not sustain the motion. It is true this is not one of the sources of revenue defined by the statute. Code, sec. 533. Perhaps in its exact definition it may be confined to money raised by some of the modes of taxation, but in one sense all money belonging to the state is revenue. It is claimed that this should be more properly described as 'costs.' But strictly speaking the state does not render service for which it is entitled to costs. These costs are paid by the state out of its revenues, and the motion is to collect the money for reimbursement. It is a civil proceeding, properly cognizable in a civil court, the circuit court being one of general jurisdiction. We hold, therefore, that the circuit court had jurisdiction."

The word "revenue" is sufficiently broad to include all provisions having that general object in view, not only provisions for securing revenue as the result of a direct tax on property, but revenue derived from the imposition of licenses, duties, excises, and a tax on occupations or on successions. So, in the case of In re Magnes, 32 Colo. 527, 77 Pac. 853, it was held that the word "revenue" included an act imposing a duty on privileges or successions, the direct and avowed object of which was to provide for securing public revenues for governmental purposes.

Likewise, in Parsons v. People, 32 Colo. 221, 76 Pac. 666, it was held that a section of an act passed solely for the purpose of securing revenue for state purposes, and not designed as a regulation of a business, imposing a license fee on persons engaged in the business of selling liquor, was clearly within the title, which was "An act in relation to revenue," etc.

In Omaha v. Hodgskins, 70 Neb. 229, 97 N. W. 346, the court held that the word "revenue" as used in an act entitled "An act to provide a system of revenue," should be construed in its generic sense, to include all the money raised by any form of taxation, and hence to include special assessment, and not in its restricted sense, to apply only to taxes levied for general purposes.

In Com. v. Brown, 91 Va. 762, 21 S. E. 357, 28 L.R.A. 110, in passing on the constitutionality of an act entitled "An act for the preservation of oysters and to obtain revenue for the privilege of taking them within the waters of the commonwealth" (Act of Feb. 25, 1892), the court said: "The object of the tax is concisely but expressly stated. It is 'to obtain revenue.' What is 'revenue?' It is the income which a state collects and receives into its treasury, and is appropriated for the payment of its expenses. The object of the act, then, was to raise money for the support of the government of the state. It is concisely defined by the words to 'obtain revenue,' but by that phrase the object of the tax is as popularly understood as if it had been declared in the title or body of the act that the object was to raise money for the current expenses of the government."

In Bates v. Porter, 74 Cal. 224, 15 Pac. 732, there was involved an act incorporating a city and repealing certain prior acts, providing inter alia that all moneys collected by any officer who had the control, collection, or custody of any money collected for taxes, licenses, water rents, fees of office, or any other account not otherwise provided in the act, were required to be paid into the treasury on the Saturday of each week. (Sec. 28.) It also provided that "the revenue derived from and within the city limits for municipal purposes, viz., taxes, licenses, harbor dues, water rents, and fines collected in the mayor's court, or otherwise, when paid into the treasury shall be set apart and appropriated as follows: Fifty-five per cent to an interest and sinking fund," etc.; "fifteen per cent to a salary fund," etc.; "eight per cent to a school fund," etc.; "twenty-two per cent to a . . . 'contingent fund.'" (Sec. 35.) The court held that the word "revenue" as used therein with respect to the water rents, extended to and embraced within its terms the gross receipts from water rents, and did not only include the net receipts after deducting salaries, expenses, etc.

Under a Louisiana statute (Art. 350, C. C.) providing that under no circumstances may the expenses of a minor for board, clothing, tuition, etc., exceed his revenues, and contemplating that expenses of this character shall be met as they arise either from the minor's revenues or from his capital by authorization of a family meeting, the minor's "revenues" must be taken to be what remains each year, after the payment of the taxes for that year. Sims v. Billington, 50 La. Ann. 968, 24 So. 637.

The Montana constitution (Art. XIII, sec. 6) limits the indebtedness which a city may contract to three per cent of the value of the taxable property therein, but provides that the legislature may authorize an increase over that limit "when such increase is necessary to construct a sewerage system or to procure a supply of water for such municipality which shall own and control said water supply and devote the revenues derived therefrom to the payment of the debt." In Public Service Commission v. Helena, 52 Mont. 527, 159 Pac. 24, it was held that where the legislature had authorized the increase and a city already indebted to the full extent of the three per cent limit had purchased its own water system, the "revenues" from the water plant referred to in the above section, which were to be held inviolate, dedicated to the discharge of the extraordinary indebtedness, were the net revenues or the gross receipts less necessary operating expenses. The court held that if a regulation of the public service commission was a reasonable one, the extra expense involved in carrying it into effect was a proper and necessary charge against the gross revenues derived from the water system, and not an obligation imposed on the city.

A California statute (Pol. Code, § 4070) provides as follows: "The Board [of Supervisors] must not for any purpose contract debts or liabilities, except in pursuance of law, or under ordinances of their own, adopted in accordance with the powers herein conferred; and whenever debts and liabilities have been created, which, added to the salaries of county officers and other estimated liabilities fixed by law for the remainder of the year, equal in the aggregate the revenue of the county for current expenses, no further allowance of any accounts must be made."

In Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488, the court held that the word "revenue" as used in that section did not mean the actual money which should be received in the county treasury, since to give the word this interpretation would render it impossible for the board to comply with the direction of the statute, because the amount could never be ascertained until all the assessments had been collected and paid into the treasury. So, it was held that, in view of the context, it was no forced interpretation to say that it was the estimated revenue which the lawmakers had in mind.

In State v. New Orleans, 40 La. Ann. 299, 3 So. 584, the court held that the term "revenues" as used in the statute (Act 109 of 1886, § 66) providing that "the council shall not, under any pretext whatever, appropriate any funds for the government of the corporation to the full extent of the revenues, but shall reserve twenty per cent of said revenues, which reserve, and all sums, rights, interests and credits received from miscellaneous or contingent sources shall be appropriated by the council for the purpose of permanent public improvement, as herein provided for," meant the revenue fixed in the budget, or the budget estimates of revenues. The court said: "All three sections refer exclusively to the formation of the budget, which is the fixing in advance the modus vivendi of the city for the ensuing year, by a careful estimate of the expenditures and revenues. The council is first required to make an estimate of expenditures, and, but for Sec. 66, it would not be allowed to levy a greater rate of taxation than would be necessary, with other revenues, to provide for said estimated expenditures. But Sec. 66 authorizes the raising of a revenue twenty per cent beyond the estimated expenses, and devotes the surplus as a reserve fund to be appropriated to public works and improvements. Hence, the city is authorized and is bound to estimate and to provide a revenue, eighty per cent of which, no more or no less, is equal to her estimated expenditures, and this eighty per cent is irrevocably appropriated to these expenses. How would the city comply with these mathematical requirements if, as relator contends, she is authorized and required to appropriate eighty per cent, not of her estimated revenues, but of the revenues which shall be thereafter actually collected? How can she tell in advance what deficiency may result in the collection of her revenues? How is she to adjust her estimate of expenses and her corresponding provision of revenue in exact proportion or equality to an unknown quantity? The law did not contemplate or require any such impossibilities. It is plain the city must place on her budget, in exact figures, the liabilities and expenditures, and these must be just eighty per cent of the sum designated in amended Sec. 66 as 'revenues.' Unless some mathematical process can be invented whereby to calculate a percentage of an unascertained sum, relator's construction is impracticable, and we must treat the elision of the word 'estimated' before 'revenues,' as used in previous statutes, as the simple correction of an useless tautology."

In State v. School Fund Com'rs, 4 Kan. 261, it was said that the section of the Kansas constitution (Art. 11, § 3) declaring it the duty of the legislature to provide revenue for the current expenses of the state each year, would be popularly taken to mean that taxes should be levied each year to meet the current expenses; and this is precisely its technical construction, as the word "revenue," in this connection, means the income of the government arising from taxation, excise and the like. And so it was held that an act directing the issue and sale of $30,000 of the bonds of the state, and directing "that the commissioners for the management and investment of the school funds are authorized and directed to invest an amount of the permanent school funds in said bonds, sufficient to satisfy the requirements of this act," the object of which is stated in the title to be for the purpose of paying the officers and members of the state legislature, and current expenses of the state, is unconstitutional.

The word "revenue" as used in the Nebraska constitution (Art. VI., § 2) giving the supreme court original jurisdiction of "cases relating to the revenue, civil cases in which the state shall be a party, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus," etc., has no reference to the revenues of municipal corporations, but to those only which are required for the purpose of general state administration. Aachen, etc. F. Ins. Co. v. Omaha, 72 Neb. 112, 100 N. W. 137.

Under the Illinois Practice act (§ 88) as amended by Act of 1879 (Sess. Laws, p. 222) providing for appeals to the supreme instead of the appellate courts, "in all cases of revenue," it was held that the term "revenue" was not used in its most extended meaning, but embraced public revenue, whether state or municipal, including special assessments for almost every municipal purpose, as well as general taxes, but that it did not embrace fines and forfeitures or sums due on contracts. Webster v. People, 98 Ill. 343; Phoenix Grain, etc. Exch. v. Gleason, 22 Ill. App. 373; Gunning v. People, 76 Ill. App. 574; Claypool Drainage, etc. Dist. v. Chicago, etc. R. Co. 81 Ill. App. 433. So, an assessment for street improvements which was a municipal tax, levied for a special purpose by public authority, clearly falls within the term "revenue" in this statute. Potwin v. Johnson, 106 Ill. 532; Herhold v. Chicago, 106 Ill. 547. See also Schlierbach v. Panna, 13 Ill. App. 382. Likewise, an assessment for public park improvements is embraced within the term "revenue" as used in the statute, being taxes and assessments imposed by public authority. People v. Springer, 106 Ill. 542.

In Louisiana "the tutor may retain as a commission for his care and labor ten per cent on the annual amount of the revenues of the property committed to his charge." (Art. 349, C. C. La. 1898.) In the case of In re Hollingsworth, 45 La. Ann. 134, 12 So. 12, the court said with reference to that statute: "Revenue is an amount accruing to the minor through the care and labor of the tutor. In order that he may secure that commission it must be derived from crops, rent, interest. Certainly not amounts derived from sales or cash inherited." In the case of In re Ratcliffe Minors, 139 La. 996, 72 So. 713, L.R.A. 1917C 188, the court said: "Revenue or income is what is produced by capital without impairing the capital. What is taken from the capital cannot be considered revenue or income." However, the court held that a distinction must be made between revenues earned by the property belonging to the minors and revenues earned by the property of their father and transmitted to them, as stock dividends earned or produced before the minors inherited the property, the tutor being entitled to a commission under the statute cited on the first class of revenues, and not on the second class. In the case of the Succession of Hargrove, 9 La. Ann. 505, it was held that the net amount, and not the gross amount, of the proceeds of the sales of crops made on the minor's plantation, was to be considered as the revenues meant under the provisions of the foregoing article. See also Grover's Succession, 12 La. Ann. 335. In Turnbull v. Towles, 10 La. 254, it was held that the revenue must be considered as composed of the interest of five per cent on the moneys in hands of the tutor and of the annual hire or value of the services of the minor's slaves.

In People v. New York Cent. R. Co. 24 N. Y. 485, affirming 34 Barb. 123, it was held that the toll or tax imposed by the laws in force at the time of the adoption of the New York constitution of 1846 on merchandise carried by railroad companies, was not included within the "canal revenues," appropriated by the seventh article of that instrument; that the "revenues" of the canals included tolls, penalties and rent of surplus water, and any other return which the state might receive from the capital invested in the canals, and so meant the income or receipts from the canals.

In Cromie v. Wabash, etc. Canal, 71 Ind. 208, it was held that the word "revenue" in a contract granting a canal company for its own use the proceeds of all the tolls and revenues which might accrue from a specified portion of the canal, during the time provided for by the contract, after paying the expenses of keeping the canal in repair and certain other expenses stipulated for, the residue to go to the company, was broad enough to cover income derived from the sale of ice in the canal, as the ice was a source of revenue, as much as water rents or anything else pertaining to the canal.

In Hurlbut v. Gainor, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 588, 103 S. W. 409, it appeared that the ground on which a writ of sequestration of property was asked, as stated in the affidavit, was that the "plaintiff fears that the defendant will make use of his possession to convert to his own use the fruits or revenues, produced by the property." The court held that the words "fruits" and "revenues" were used in the sequestration statute (Rev. Stats., art. 4864) as synonymous, and that the use of the word "or" between these words did not present in the alternative separate grounds for the writ, nor render the affidavit indefinite or uncertain.

The word "revenue" in a statute (Art. 341, C. C. La. 1825; Art. 347, C. C. La. 1898) directing a tutor to invest in the name of his minor the revenues which exceed the expenses of his ward whenever they amount to the sum of five hundred dollars, on penalty of being charged with interest thereon, is to be taken as synonymous with the word "funds," and as meaning all moneys belonging to the minor that come into the hands of the tutor in the course of administration. Fuselier v. Babineau, 14 La. Ann. 764, quoted with approval in the Tutorship of Watson, 51 La. Ann. 1641, 26 So. 409.

In Cataract Power, etc. Co. v. Buffalo, 131 App. Div. 485, 115 N. Y. S. 1045, there was involved a municipal ordinance granting a franchise to a private company to introduce electrical energy into the city for the purposes of light, heat and power, and providing that the structures for its lines should be sufficient to afford facilities for at least one other company which additional space should not be used by the company receiving the grant for ten years after the acceptance of the grant, and that at any time during the ten years the city might use such additional space for any public purpose from which it should not derive a revenue without compensation. It was held that the water rates paid by persons and corporations for their private use was "revenue" under the ordinance, and that the city had no right to use the additional space for the purpose of transmitting electricity to use in pumping water for private use. The court said: "It seems to me clear that water rates paid by private parties to the city constitute 'revenue' within the meaning of that word as used in the ordinance, and the city has no right to use the additional space for the purpose of pumping water for such private use without compensation. Much of the water used is for public purposes, and for this no water rates are paid, but a large amount is received as water rates for merely private purposes and from private persons, and this certainly is 'revenue,' and for it compensation should be paid."

A Maryland statute passed in 1880 conferred on a city the power to license and regulate certain vehicles owned and used in the city, and also to license and regulate certain occupations carried on therein; "provided, however, that all the revenue arising from said licenses shall be applied to the paving or repaving of the public highways of the city." In Vansant v. Harlem Stage Co. 59 Md. 330, the court held that the primary object of the law was not to authorize the city to levy and collect a tax for the purpose of raising revenue, and that the term "revenue" used in the proviso, was used in the same sense as "the money received" from the license, and in fact only made a particular appropriation of the license money, where without such proviso, it would have gone for general municipal uses.

The Nebraska statute of limitations (Rev. St. 1913, § 7581) provides in part that "every claim and demand in behalf of the state, except for revenue [etc.] shall be barred by the same lapse of time as is provided by the law in case of like demands between private parties." In State v. Stanton County, 100 Neb. 747, 161 N. W. 264, it was held that a demand by the state for the taxes levied and collected by a county under the statutes providing for the board and care of patients committed to the state hospital for the insane (Ann. St. 1911, §§ 10094, 10095) and transferred from the county insane fund to the county general fund, was a demand for "revenue" of the state within the exception in the statute.

"All Revenue."

In Humphrey v. Lang, 169 N. C. 601, 86 S. E. 526, L.R.A.1916B 626, it appeared that a testator devised to his wife "all revenue" from certain named banks, properties and companies. The court affirmed the holding of the lower court that a dividend declared by one of the banks named, paid to the estate in a time certificate of deposit, but which the stockholders had the privilege of taking in cash or in stock, at their option, was revenue or income, and not principal, and that the widow was entitled to it under the will.

"Estimated Revenue."

In Callaway v. Baltimore, 99 Md. 315, 57 Atl. 661, there was involved the following provision of a city charter: "In case of any surplus arising in any fiscal year by reason of an excess of income received from the estimated revenue over the expenditures for such year, the said surplus shall be passed to the commissioners of finance to be credited to the general sinking fund." The court held that the proceeds of a loan dedicated by the statute authorizing the same to a particular municipal use, to wit, for the purpose of extending the city's water service and constructing an additional reservoir, did not come within the description of "estimated revenue," as used in the section quoted. Much less, the court declared, could it be said that the future proceeds of stock of that character, which had not yet been issued or sold, fell within the description of "estimated revenue."

"General Revenue."

In Whitehead v. Gibbons, 10 N. J. Eq. 230, it appeared that a will contained the following provisions: By the "second item" of his will, the testator declared, "I do order and direct that all my just debts be paid and freely discharged, for which purpose I bind my whole, entire and undivided estate; and I direct that my estate shall not be divided, and no devise or bequest take effect, until all my just debts are paid and fully discharged from the general revenues of my estate, together with such appropriations as are hereinafter mentioned and provided." By the "third item" of his will, the testator ordered that his whole and entire stock of blood horses be sold at public auction, and the proceeds of the sale appropriated to the payment of his debts, and the surplus, after that, be divided equally among his four children. By the "fifth item," he ordered all bonds secured by mortgages, promissory notes, and other obligations and contracts for the payment of money, except Ashbel Bruen's bond of $12,000, secured by mortgage, and four bonds of the city of Savannah, to be collected with all possible despatch, and the proceeds applied to the payment of his debts, and any surplus, over and above what is sufficient for that purpose, to be equally divided among his four children. By the "twelfth item," he directed that all money on hand in any bank with which he kept an account, and at his dwelling house, or elsewhere, also all and every balance of account for money or funds due him in the hands of all and any of his agents or attorneys, or persons with whom he might have had dealings, should first be applied to the payment of his funeral expenses, then to the payment of his debts, then to the current temporary expenses of his children, at home or abroad, at school or otherwise, until the adjustment of his affairs in ascertaining the condition of the estate and their respective rights, and any balance remaining should go into his general estate, and be divided equally between his four children. The exceptants to the executor's settlement insisted that the testator intended the "general revenues" of the estate as the primary fund to pay his debts, that he charged the "general revenues" of his estate, together with the appropriations made in the third, fifth, and twelfth items of his will, with the payment of his debts. The court said: "What constitutes the general revenues of this estate? I think it is plain the testator meant the rents and profits of his real estate, and the interest or profits arising out of the personal estate. He had made specific devises of all his real estate to his children. He had charged it with the payment of his debts. He had declared the devises should not take effect until all his debts were paid. As to his personal property he makes a specific appropriation of the whole of it. He appropriates a part of it to secure a trust fund; another portion of it he directs his executors to convert into money to pay his debts; another part to convert into money to pay his funeral expenses; then his debts; then the temporary expenses of his children until his estate should be settled; and he then specifically bequeaths all the personal property he could enumerate, not before appropriated to his four children, making provision for residue, if any. He does not mean the personal property in the third, fifth, and twelfth items to constitute a part of the general revenue. He had directed that to be converted into money. Nor did he mean the proceeds or interest arising out of that fund to make any part of that revenue; for, in the second item of the will, he distinguishes it from the general revenue, as the appropriations provided with the 'general revenues' to pay his debts. We then have two distinct funds, the general revenue of the testator's estate, chargeable with his debts, and a fund which has been raised out of specific personal property, converted into money by the express orders of the testator. Which fund is to be the first appropriated for the purpose? It appears to me to have been the intention of the testator, and that he meant the phraseology he used as an expression of such intention, that the appropriations made in the second, fifth, and twelfth items of the will should constitute the primary fund for the payment of his debts. And again, if there is an absence of an intention as to which fund shall be primarily liable, upon general principles, the debts are first to be paid out of the property mentioned in the items enumerated. The testator first charges all his estate, both real and personal, with the payment of his debts; but knowing it would not be necessary to sell his real estate for that purpose, nor to break in upon the specific legacies which he had made to his children, he declares that the revenues shall be used for that purpose, together with such other appropriations as he makes. The word 'appropriations' is significant. It evinces the intention of the testator to designate and set it apart from his other property for a specific object. The word means a designation to a particular exclusive use. He orders his blood horses to be sold, and certain obligations to be collected with all possible despatch, to constitute a fund in the hands of his executors to pay his debts. It cannot be that he meant the 'revenues of his estate as the primary fund,' and this fund, thus 'earmarked,' as it were, and 'appropriated' to the very object, to be a secondary or auxiliary fund. The revenues of the estate are sufficient to pay the debts without the aid of the appropriations in the second, fifth, and twelfth items of the will. Did the testator ever contemplate such a result as that these appropriations should never be used for this object? It is quite as clear he could not have meant the two funds as a common fund to pay the debts. What proportion of the burden was each fund to bear, and at what period was the account to be taken? I, think, too, the intention of the testator is clear from another circumstance. He manifested a great anxiety to have his debts paid speedily. The fund created by the third, fifth, and twelfth items of his will was a certain fund in the hands of his executors immediately upon their assuming the duties of their office. It was a fund which appropriately belonged to the executors, in their character as personal representatives of the testator. Not so with the rents and profits of the realty, which constituted the bulk of the 'revenue' of the estate. They did not pass into the hands of the executors ratione officii. They had no authority to collect them, except by the express or implied authority conferred upon them by the will. The will gives no express authority. It is only by implication that the executors possess it. The testator having authorized the rents to be appropriated, under certain circumstances, to pay his debts, and the duty of paying his debts devolving upon his executors, by implication, they are clothed with power to collect the rents. . . . The fact that the testator expressed a great anxiety to have his debts speedily paid; that of the two funds charged with this burden, one was a certain fund in the hands of his executors available at once, the other not belonging to them appropriately as executors, and the testator conferring upon them no express authority to obtain possession of it, all these considerations are of importance, as showing that the testator's mind was not upon the revenue of his estate as the primary fund for the payment of his debts. To determine that such was his intention would mar the prominent feature in his will, his determination to have his debts speedily paid; it would embarrass the very object which seemed to swallow up all others in contemplation of the testator. To my mind, the intention of the testator is clearly expressed upon the face of the will, that the property enumerated in the third, fifth, and twelfth items should constitute the primary fund to pay his debts. But if there is an absence of intention as to what part of his estate shall constitute the primary fund, upon well settled principles of law, the property named in these several items is the appropriate and primary fund for that object. . . . But it is said that the 'general revenues' derived from his estate, mentioned in the second item of the will, constituted the testator's 'general estate,' and although it was proceeds and interest of real and personal estate specifically devised and bequeathed, the testator did not intend it should go to the devisees and legatees, from the fact that he devised to them the realty and personalty out of which it was derived, because he declared that no devise or bequest should take effect until all his debts were paid; that his revenue had accumulated in the hands of the executors before the debts were paid, and consequently before any devise or bequest took effect. This brings us back to the first question we considered, whether the testator meant anything more than to charge the devises and legacies with the payment of his debts, and to make the revenues derived from them an auxiliary fund to the specific personal property appropriated for his debts. I have before stated it as my opinion, that it was the intention of the testator that the devisees and legatees should take their estates and legacies without diminution, except so far as it was necessary to appropriate these proceeds to the payment of his debts in aid of other funds provided for the purpose."

In Stevens v. Miller, 3 Kan. App. 192, 43 Pac. 439, it was said that the words "general revenue purposes" in the Kansas statute authorizing a municipality to "levy and collect taxes for general revenue purposes not to exceed ten mills on the dollar in any one year, on all the real, mixed and personal property within the limits of said cities, taxable according to the laws of this state," (Gen. St. 1889, par. 788), mean the same as "ordinary purposes." Accordingly it was held that in the absence of a showing that the council had already levied the full amount permitted by law for "general revenue purposes," a levy might be made thereunder for the purpose of paying a judgment against the city.

"Ordinary Revenue."

After stating the various lexical and other definitions of the word "revenue," the court in the reported case holds that it is broader than and includes receipts from taxation, as well as municipal income; that revenue may be said to be the genus, while taxation is but a species. The court concludes that the word

"revenue," as used in an act appropriating one-third of the money out of the state revenue fund for the support of the public schools (Laws Mo. 1915, § 1, p. 89), when standing alone, and when not modified by the word ordinary, means the annual and current income of the state, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses. This, the court holds, excludes such income as the constitution, or any permanent existing law, may specifically devote to a special purpose, in contradistinction to a public use, or which is not required to be paid into the state revenue fund but into a special fund, e. g., the collateral inheritance tax, specifically collected for the support of the state university and its departments (R. S. 1909, § 312); the money derived from license fees on motor vehicles (Laws 1911, § 13, p. 331); fees paid into the state treasury to the credit of the "insurance department fund" (R. S. 1909, § 6884); and others of similar sort. However, taking the two words, "ordinary" and "revenue," together, as they occur in the appropriation act under consideration, the court holds that they mean the regular and usual annual income of the state, however derived, which is subject to appropriation for general public uses. The court thereupon proceeds to the determination of the question whether the several sums mentioned in the agreed statement of facts are included in the terms "ordinary revenue."

"Bills for Raising Revenue."

"What bills are properly 'bills for raising revenue,' in the sense of the Constitution, has been matter of some discussion. A learned commentator supposes that every bill which indirectly or consequentially may raise revenue, is, within the sense of the Constitution, a revenue bill. He therefore thinks, that the bills for establishing the post office, and the mint, and regulating the value of foreign coin, belong to this class, and ought not to have originated (as in fact they did), in the senate. But the practical construction of the Constitution has been against this opinion. And, indeed, the history of the origin of the power, already suggested, abundantly proves, that it has been confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the words, and has not been understood to extend to bills for other purposes, which may incidentally create revenue. No one supposes that a bill to sell any of the public lands, or to sell public stock, is a bill to raise revenue, in the sense of the Constitution. Much less would a bill be so deemed which merely regulated the value of foreign or domestic coin, or authorized the discharge of insolvent debtors upon assignment of their estates to the United States, giving a priority of payment to the United States in case of insolvency, Ann. Cas. 1918B.—14.

although all of them might incidentally bring revenue into the treasury. Story, Const. § 880." The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023.

This practical construction of the provision of the federal (Art. 1, § 7, 8 Fed. St. Ann. 337) and the state constitutions that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the house of representatives," contended for by Judge Story, viz., that the phrase "bills for raising revenues" is confined to bills the direct and principal object of which is to raise revenue, has been followed in practically all the decisions arising under those provisions. The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023; Twin City Bank v. Nebeker, 167 U. S. 196, 17 S. Ct. 766, 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 134, affirming 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 190; Dundee Mortg. Trust Invest. Co. v. Parrish, 11 Sawy. (U. S.) 92; Geer v. Ouray County, 97 Fed. 435, 38 C. C. A. 250; Twin Falls Canal Co. v. Foote, 192 Fed. 583; Stanfield v. Umatilla River Water Users' Assoc. 192 Fed. 596; Harper v. Elberton, 23 Ga. 566; Com. v. Bailey, 81 Ky. 395, reversing 3 Ky. L. Rep. 110; State v. Bernheim, 19 Mont. 512, 49 Pac. 441; Anderson v. "A bill for raising revenue,' as we understand it from the debates on the Federal Constitution, authorities, and textwriters, embraces all appropriations of money for the public treasury where the bill either provides for the levy of duties or taxes, capitulation or ad valorem, upon the people, or is a part of a system of laws or another bill which does so provide." Com. v. Bailey, 81 Ky. 395, reversing 3 Ky. L. Rep. 110.

"It is, of course, possible to differentiate between a law 'for raising revenue' and a 'revenue law,' but the distinction is not entirely obvious, and the two phrases might very properly be used to convey the same meaning. Lexically and grammatically, the strain comes, not in assimilating but in distinguishing them. As language is commonly and ordinarily understood, it would seem that, where a bill 'for raising revenue' is enacted into law, it becomes 'a revenue law,' and a 'revenue law' originates in a bill 'for raising revenue.'" Twin Falls Canal Co. v. Foote, 192 Fed. 583, wherein it was held that the Reclamation Act (Act of June 17, 1902, c. 1093; 32 Stat. 388; 7 Fed. St. Ann. 1098) was not a bill "for raising revenue" in the constitutional sense. To the same effect see Stanfield v. Umatilla River Water Users' Assoc. 192 Fed. 596.

Any law which provides for the assessment and collection of a tax to defray the expenses of the government, is a revenue law. Such legislation is commonly referred to under the general term, "revenue measures," and those measures include all the laws by which the government provides means for meeting its expenditures. Peyton v. Bliss, Woolw. 170, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,055.

"Bills for raising revenue" are, when passed, "revenue laws" within the meaning of the statute (Act of July 18, 1866, § 8; 14 Stat. 180, now Rev. Stat. § 3088; 2 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 1173) authorizing an action in rem, where a vessel or the master or owner of a vessel is subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States. The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023.

The post-office laws are not laws or bills for raising revenue within the constitutional provision, U. S. v. James, 13 Blatchf. 207, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,464; though they are revenue laws within the meaning of certain statutes, U. S. v. Bromley, 12 How. 88, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 905; Warner v. Fowler, 4 Blatchf. 311, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,182. So, a bill establishing or increasing rates of postage is not a bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of the Constitution. U. S. v. James, 13 Blatchf. 207, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,464, wherein the court said: "Certain legislative measures are unmistakably bills for raising revenue. These impose taxes upon the people, either directly or indirectly, or lay duties, imposts or excises, for the use of the government, and give to the persons from whom the money is exacted no equivalent in return, unless in the enjoyment, in common with the rest of the citizens of the benefit of good government. It is this feature which characterizes bills for raising revenue. They draw money from the citizen; they give no direct equivalent in return. In respect to such bills it was reasonable that the immediate representatives of the taxpayers should alone have the power to originate them. Their immediate responsibility to their constituents, and their jealous regard for the pecuniary interests of the people, it was supposed, would render them especially watchful in the protection of those whom they represented. But the reason fails in respect to bills of a different class. A bill regulating postal rates for postal service, provides an equivalent for the money which the citizen may choose voluntarily to pay. He gets the fixed service for the fixed rate, or he lets it alone, as he pleases and as his own interests dictate. Revenue, beyond its cost, may or may not be derived from the service and the pay received for it, but it is only a very strained construction which would regard a bill establishing rates of postage as a bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of the Constitution. This broad distinction existing in fact between the two kinds of bills, it is obviously a just construction to confine the terms of the Constitution to the case which they plainly designate. To strain those terms beyond their primary and obvious meaning, and thus to introduce a precedent for that sort of construction, would work a great public mischief."

The act (Act of June 3, 1864; 13 Stat. 99, c. 106) providing for a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds and for the circulation and redemption thereof, so far as it imposed a tax on the average amount of the notes of a national banking association, was not a revenue bill within the constitutional clause. Twin City Bank v. Nebeker, 167 U. S. 196, 17 S. Ct. 766. 42 U. S. (L. ed.) 134, affirming 3 App. Cas. (D. C.) 190, wherein Mr. Justice Harlan said: "What bills belong to that class is a question of such magnitude and importance that it is the part of wisdom not to attempt, by any general statement, to cover every possible phase of the subject. It is sufficient in the present case to say that an act of Congress providing a national currency secured by a pledge of bonds of the United States, and which, in the furtherance of that object, and also to meet the expenses attending the execution of the act, imposed a tax on the notes in circulation of the banking associations organized under the statute, is clearly not a revenue bill which the Constitution declares must originate in the House of Representatives. Mr. Justice Story has well said that the practical construction of the Constitution and the history of the origin of the constitutional provision in question proves that revenue bills are those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and are not bills for other purposes which may incidentally create revenue. 1 Story on Const. § 880. The main purpose that Congress had in view was to provide a national currency based upon United States bonds, and to that end it was deemed wise to impose the tax in question. The tax was a means for effectually accomplishing the great object of giving to the people a currency that would rest, primarily, upon the honor of the United States, and be available in every part of the country. There was no purpose by the act or by any of its provisions to raise revenue to be applied in meeting the expenses or obligations of the government."

An act incorporating a town is not an act "for raising revenue," although the act among the many powers conferred on the town the power to tax. In such a case taxation is not the end; it is a mere incident. Harper v. Elberton, 23 Ga. 506.

An act entitled "An act to provide uniform and cheap textbooks for the public schools of Minnesota (Laws 1877, c. 76; Gen. St.

1878, c. 36, §§ 156-167)" was held not to be a revenue act in Curryer v. Merrill, 25 Minn. 1, 33 Am. Rep. 450, wherein the court said: "A bill for raising a revenue is one whose main purpose is to raise money by taxation. A mere appropriation of public money, though it may lead to the necessity of taxation, is insufficient to characterize a measure as one for revenue, such as must originate in the house, and not in the senate."

In Geer v. Ouray County, 97 Fed. 435, 38 C. C. A. 250, it was held that an act (Act of April 17, 1889; 1 Mill Ann. St. Colo. 1891, §§ 945-948) entitled "An act to enable the several counties of the state to refund their bonded debt which has matured, or may hereafter mature, and to issue bonds in satisfaction of judgments and matured bonds," was not a bill for raising revenue. The court said: "A bill for raising revenue, within the meaning of this provision of the Constitution, is one which provides for the levy and collection of taxes for the purpose of paying the officers and of defraying the expenses of the government. This act was not of that character. Its main purpose was to authorize certain quasi municipal corporations to refund their debts. The provisions for the levy and collection of taxes which it contained were mere incidents to the general refunding legislation which it carried. The probability is that they did not even increase the taxes which the counties were required to levy, for they were bound to lay taxes to pay their debts and the interest upon them before as well as after they were refunded. These provisions raise no revenue for the government, but, on the other hand, the act expressly provided that the moneys derived from the levies made under it should not be appropriated to pay the officers of the state or of the county, or to defray the expenses of governing the people, but should be set apart and applied exclusively to pay the bonds and coupons issued under it for the purpose of refunding the debts of the counties."

In Anderson v. Rittenbusch, 22 Okla. 761, 98 Pac. 1002, it was held that a statute (Sess. Laws 1907-08, p. 729, c. 81, art. 9) entitled "An act for the discovery of property not listed for taxation, providing for its assessment and the collection of taxes thereon," was not a bill for raising revenue. The court said: "We have a complete revenue law for the purpose of raising money to defray the expenses of state, county, and municipal government, and one that would apportion the burdens of government justly and equally among the taxpayers if all property owners complied with its provisions. Unfortunately this is not the case, and the legislature found it necessary to provide a means for reaching property which, through fraud or other means, was omitted from taxation, whereby such property and the owners thereof would be required to pay their just share of the burdens of government. To our minds such a law is in no sense a bill for raising revenue, although it may incidentally have that effect. It does not belong to that class of revenue bills mentioned by Judge Story as those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word."

In holding that a Kentucky statute (Act of April 9, 1880) for the regulation of the fees and salaries of the public officers enumerated in the first section was not a "bill for raising revenue," the court in Com. v. Bailey, 81 Ky. 395, reversing 3 Ky. L. Rep. 110, said: "'A bill for raising revenue,' as we understand it from the debates on the Federal Constitution, authorities, and textwriters, embraces all appropriations of money for the public treasury where the bill either provides for the levy of duties or taxes, capitation or ad valorem, upon the people, or is a part of a system of laws or another bill which does so provide. A bill may originate in the senate for the appropriation of money for or from the treasury, unless it necessitates the levy of taxes or duties to meet its requirements. The principle underlying this provision of the Constitution is founded on the ground that the people are bound to pay the taxes to support the government in consideration of protection to their lives, liberty, and property; hence, the power of taxation was placed in the hands of the popular branch of the legislature as a means of security to the people, from whom its members are selected, against exactions by taxation for other than strictly governmental purposes. This view excludes from the comprehension of this constitutional clause such bills as appropriate money to or from the treasury, raised from the people in consideration of other benefits and services than protection in their lives, liberty, and property. . . . It is clear from every source that the terms 'bills for raising revenue' are confined to bills to levy taxes in the strict sense of the word, and do not embrace bills for other purposes which incidentally create revenue, unless so framed as to draw money from the people, with no other advantage or benefit to them except the general protection which belongs to the citizen under our form of government as a matter of common right. The act before us incidentally turns money into the treasury. The reduction of the fees and salaries of the officers named necessarily results in increasing the sums in the treasury to the extent of the amount these officers may collect for their services beyond $3,000, deputy hire and necessary expenses. But the sums collected by them from the litigant or persons for whom the services may be rendered are in consideration of such services, and those sums are not, in the strict sense, taxes levied on the citizen any more than increased postage is a tax levied on the sender of mail matter. Both have a consideration to support them, and that consideration is exceptional, and does not belong to the people in common, but it is rendered for the identical persons who are bound to pay therefor. The act neither increases nor diminishes the burdens of the people or litigants who pay the fees of these officers for their services. The rate of fees remains the same, the effect and purpose of the act being to so regulate the compensation of these officers as to reduce the sum retained by them for their services to $3,000. We do not think the bill was, in any particular, a bill 'for raising revenue' in the constitutional sense of those terms."

An act creating the office of county assessor, and for other purposes relative thereto (Sess. Laws Okla. 1910-11, c. 152), has been held not to be a bill for raising revenue, since "revenue bills" are those that levy taxes in the strict sense of the word. Johnson v. Grady County (Okla.) 150 Pac. 497.

In Colorado Nat. L. Assur. Co. v. Clayton, 54 Colo. 256, 130 Pac. 330, it was held that a bill regulating the insurance business and insurance companies doing business within the state, and requiring the payment of certain enumerated fees and a two per cent tax annually on gross premiums, was not a bill for raising revenue. The court said: "Plaintiff contends the tax is a revenue measure, and unconstitutional because the act originated in the senate instead of the house. This contention does not meet with our approval. A bill designed to accomplish some well defined purpose other than raising revenue, is not a revenue measure. Merely because, as an incident to its main purpose, it may contain provisions, the enforcement of which produces a revenue, does not make it a revenue measure. Revenue bills are those which have for their object the levying of taxes in the strict sense of the words. If the principal object is another purpose, the incidental production of revenue growing out of the enforcement of the act will not make it a bill for raising revenue. The primary object and purpose of this bill was to regulate insurance companies and the insurance business in the state. It is a regulation or supervision tax, and the method of arriving at the amount, or because of its operation the act produces an excess which is required to be turned into the general fund, does not affect its validity or render it an act for revenue."

In State v. Bernheim, 19 Mont. 512, 49 Pac. 441, it appeared that a statute (Sess. Laws 1893, p. 150; Civ. Code §§ 978-984) providing that the owner of a railroad or steamboat should provide each agent who was authorized to sell tickets with a certificate of authority, which the agent must exhibit to the secretary of state, who, on payment of a license fee of one dollar, should issue a license authorizing him to engage in the business of selling tickets of the common carrier from whom he held his appointment, originated in the senate. It was held that the fact that a license fee of one dollar must be paid to the secretary of state for the license, did not make the law a bill for raising revenue, and so unconstitutional.

A statute requiring the payment of certain fees by parties litigant to officers named in the act, who were paid by salary and not out of such fees (Laws Ore. 1893, p. 163), has been held not to be a bill for raising revenue. Northern Counties Invest. Trust v. Sears, 30 Ore. 388, 41 Pac. 931, 35 L.R.A. 188, wherein the court said: "A law which requires a fee to be paid to an officer, and finally covered into the treasury of a county, for which the party paying the fee receives some equivalent in return, other than the benefit of good government, which is enjoyed by the whole community, and which the party may pay and obtain the benefits under the law, or let it alone, as he chooses, does not come within the category of an act for raising revenue."

The Oklahoma Medical Practices Act (Comp. Laws 1909, §§ 4242-4264) imposing a fee on peddlers of medicine and medical appliances is not a revenue measure, since revenue laws in the contemplation of the constitution are those only whose principal purpose is the raising of revenue, and not those under which revenue may incidentally arise. In re Ambler, 11 Okla. Crim. 449, 148 Pac. 1061.

The Oregon statute (Act of Nov. 25, 1885, Laws Spec. Sess. 38) amending an act entitled "An act to regulate the sale of spirituous, malt, and vinous liquors," and fixing, different amounts for the license to sell such liquors than were provided for in the act amended, has been held not to be a bill to raise revenue. State v. Wright, 14 Ore. 365, 12 Pac. 708.

A law authorizing the levy of taxes to build bridges and roads has been held not to be a "revenue bill." Fletcher v. Oliver, 25 Ark. 289, wherein the court said: "Labor produces money; the timber, stone and gravel used in the construction of the road may be converted into money. It requires money to produce the labor, timber, stone and gravel that may be used in the construction of the roads. If one should contract with another for the building of a public road or highway from here to Hot Springs, over which the public could travel by the ordinary means of conveyance, we should expect the ravines and streams between here and that point to be placed in such condition, by bridging or otherwise, as would render the crossing as free from all danger as any other portion of the road. Money, in this instance, is placed in the same class of adjuncts for building roads and highways that timber, stone, gravel or labor may be, and, as such, is not revenue, in the sense in which the word is used in the constitution. The revenue there referred to was such as might be imposed for the support of the state government, and the payment of its ordinary expenses. There are many laws that provide for raising money by taxation that are not revenue laws. The law under which the city derives the power to tax the property within its limits, originated in the senate. The law organizing schools, and permitting the levy of a tax for that specific purpose, originated in the senate, and no one ever dreamed of calling them revenue laws."

An act (Sess. Laws Okla. 1913, c. 246) entitled "An act providing for exemption from ad valorem tax on mortgages of real estate and the indebtedness thereby secured, the payment of the registration tax when filing mortgages for record," etc., has been held not to be a revenue bill. Cornelius v. State, 40 Okla. 733, 140 Pac. 1187; Trustees', etc. Ins. Co. v. Hooten (Okla.) 157 Pac. 203, L.R.A. 1916E 602.

In Mumford v. Sewell, 11 Ore. 67, 4 Pac. 585, 5 Am. Rep. 462, in construing a law (Act of Oct. 26, 1882) taxing mortgages, the court said: "Some of us have considerable doubt whether the bill is not properly a bill for raising revenue, and therefore in violation of sec. 18 of art. 4 of the state constitution, because it originated in the senate. But it is not sufficiently clear that a law which merely declares that certain property therefore exempt from taxation shall thereafter be subject to taxation, is strictly a law for raising revenue. We do not feel warranted, therefore, as at present advised, in declaring the law unconstitutional on this ground." In Dundee Mortg. Trust. Invest. Co. v. Parrish, 11 Sawy. (U. S.) 92, however, in construing the same act, the court said: "But I am clear that this is not a bill for raising revenue. True, it provides that when revenue is to be raised mortgages shall contribute thereto as land. But it does not authorize or provide for levying any tax or raising a cent of revenue. A bill for raising revenue or a 'money bill,' as it was technically called at common law, is a bill levying a tax on all or some of the persons, property, or business of the country for a public purpose; and the assessment or listing and valuation of the polls or property preliminary thereto, and all laws regulating the same, are merely measures to secure what may be deemed a just or expedient basis for the levying of a tax or raising a revenue thereon."

A Kentucky statute (Act of March 4, 1904), "relating to revenue and taxation, providing for license taxes on compounded, rectified, adulterated or blended distilled spirits, known and designated as single stamped spirits, and providing penalties for violations of its provisions," has been held to be a bill for raising revenue, and not a bill to regulate the manufacture and use of rectified spirits with revenue as a mere incident. Hence, having originated in the senate, it was held void. H. A. Thierman Co. v. Com. 123 Ky. 740, 97 S. W. 366, 30 Ky. L. Rep. 72.

In Perry County v. Selma, etc. R. Co. 58 Ala. 546, it was held that an Alabama statute (Act of Feb. 9, 1870, Pamph. Acts 87) entitled an act "To amend an act entitled an act to establish revenue laws for the state of Alabama," though in a sense reducing the taxes in that it assumed to relieve certain railroad property, was nevertheless a bill for raising revenue, and unconstitutional by reason of having originated in the senate.

"Revenue Laws."

IN GENERAL.

Any law which provides for the assessment and collection of a tax to defray the expenses of the government is a revenue law. Such legislation is commonly referred to under the general term, "revenue measures," and those measures include all the laws by which the government provides means for meeting its expenditures. Peyton v. Bliss, Woolw. 170, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,055.

The lexical definition of the term revenue is very comprehensive; and is thus given by Webster: "The income of a nation, derived from its taxes, duties, or other sources, for the payment of the national expenses." The phrase other sources would include the proceeds of public lands, those arising from the sale of public securities, the receipts of the patent office in excess of its expenditures, and those of the post-office department when there should be such excess. Indeed, the phrase would apply in all cases of such excess. But it is a matter of common knowledge that the appellative "revenue laws" is never applied to the statutes involved in these classes of cases. U. S. v. Norton, 91 U. S. 566, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 454; 2 Cow. Crim. (N. Y.) 358.

"Bills for raising revenue" are, when passed, "revenue laws" within the meaning of the statute (Act of July 18, 1866, § 8; 14 Stat. 180, now Rev. Stat. § 3068; 2 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 173) authorizing an action in rem, where a vessel or the owner or master of a vessel is subject to a penalty for a violation of the revenue laws of the United States. "Revenue laws," within this statute, then, means laws relating to the income of the government, arising from taxation, duties and the like, and which on their face were plainly designed to raise revenue. The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023.

While the post-office laws are revenue laws, within the meaning of certain statutes, U. S. v. Bromley, 12 How. 88, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 905; Warner v. Fowler, 4 Blatchf. 34, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,182; they are not laws or bills for raising money within the Constitution, U. S. v. James, 13 Blatchf. 207, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,464.

That the general term "revenue laws" includes internal revenue acts, has been both held, U. S. v. Wright, 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 22, 35, 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 20, 3 Pittsb. 192, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,770, and denied, Stevens v. Mack, 5 Blatchf. 514, 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 181, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,404.

The Act of July 4, 1864 (13 Stat. 390), entitled "An act further to regulate the carriage of passengers in steamships and other vessels," consisting of ten sections, containing no provision of any kind concerning revenue, and amending various sections of prior acts, all of which concern the protection of the lives of passengers on steamers, is not a revenue law, though it may incidentally touch the interests of the United States treasury. The Nashville, 4 Biss. 188, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 10,023.

Under the Act of Congress of June 30, 1870 (16 Stat. L. 176, now Rev. Stat. § 949; 6 Fed. St. Ann. 594), making it the duty of the court to give to causes wherein a state is a party or where the execution of the "revenue laws of a state" has been enjoined or suspended by judicial order, preference and priority over all other civil causes; and giving to the state, or the party claiming under the laws of the state, the execution of whose revenue laws has been enjoined or suspended, the right to have such cause heard at any time after docketing in preference to any other civil cause between private parties, the ordinances of municipal corporations levying taxes cannot be classed as revenue laws of a state. Davenport City v. Dows, 15 Wall. 390, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 96, wherein the court said: "Congress seems to have intended to give to the state the right to preference in hearing when itself a party to a cause pending in this court, and a like preference when the execution of the revenue laws of a state is enjoined or suspended, to any party claiming under such laws. This preference is given, plainly enough, because of the presumed importance of such cases to the administration and internal welfare of the states, and because of their dignity as equal members of the Union. The reasons for preference do not apply to municipal corporations, more than to railroad and many other corporations."

It has been held that the Collection Act of March 2, 1799 (Brown & D. Laws, c. 128; 1 Stat. 678, c. 22), was a revenue act within the meaning of the clause in the Act of April 18, 1818 (Story's Laws, c. 65; 3 Stat. 433, c. 70, § 4), providing "that all penalties and forfeitures incurred by force of this act shall be sued for, recovered, distributed, and accounted for, and may be mitigated or remitted, in the manner and according to the provisions of the revenue laws of the United States." The Abigail, 3 Mason 331, 1 Fed. Cas. No. 18.

A section of the New York General Corporation Law (§ 16a; Laws of 1895, c. 240; also known as section 181 of the Tax Law), provides that every foreign corporation, except certain specified kinds of corporations, shall pay to the state treasurer for the use of the state, a license fee of one-eighth of one per cent for the privilege of doing business within the state, to be computed on the basis of the capital stock employed by it within the state during the first year of carrying on its business within the state. It also provides, inter alia, that no action may be maintained or recovery had by such a foreign corporation without its having obtained a receipt for the license fee thereby imposed within thirteen months after beginning business in the state. Section 15 of the General Corporation Law (Laws 1892, c. 687, as amended by Laws of 1901, c. 538, and Laws of 1904, c. 490) provides that "a foreign stock corporation whose business 'to be carried on in this state is such as may be lawfully carried on by a corporation incorporated under the laws of this state for such or similar business' is entitled to a certificate of authority to do business in this state on compliance with the requirements of section 16 of the General Corporation Law by filing with the secretary of state a sworn copy in the English language of its charter, a statement under its corporate seal particularly setting forth the business or objects of the corporation which it is engaged in carrying on or which it proposes to carry on within the state, and a place within the state which is to be its principal place of business, and designating in the manner prescribed in the Code of Civil Procedure a person upon whom process against the corporation may be served within the state." The court held in F. J. Emmerich Co. v. Sloane, 108 App. Div. 330, 95 N. Y. S. 39, 1129, that the phrase "revenue law" meant "a law providing in terms for revenue," and that this definition would fit the provisions of section 181 of the Tax Law, but not those of sections 15 and 16 of the General Corporation Law.

STATUTE RELATING TO APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

The Act of Congress of May 31, 1844 (5 Stat. L. 658), giving a writ of error in any civil action brought by the United States for the enforcement of its revenue laws was held to embrace within its meaning the Act of March 3, 1845 (5 Stat. L. 736), designed to reduce rates of postage and to prevent frauds in the revenue of the post-office department, since the latter act was, within the meaning of the former, a revenue law. U. S. v. Bromley, 12 How. 88, 13 U. S. (L. ed.) 905, wherein the court said: "That the act which prescribes the offense charged is a revenue law, there would seem to be no doubt. In its title, it is declared to be an act to reduce the rates of postage, and for the 'prevention of frauds on the revenue of the post-office department.' In its character and object it is a revenue law, as it acts upon the rates of postage and increases the revenue by prohibiting and punishing fraudulent acts which lessen it. Under the Act of 1836, the revenue of the post-office department is paid into the treasury. Revenue is the income of a state, and the revenue of the post-office department, being raised by a tax on mailable matter conveyed in the mail, and which is disbursed in the public service, is as much a part of the income of the government as moneys collected for duties on imports."

Under the same statute as re-enacted (Rev. Stat. § 643; 4 Fed. St. Ann. 260, repealed by Judicial Code, Act of March 3, 1911; 36 Stat. 1087; 5 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 1087) it was held that another statute (Rev. Stat. § 844; 4 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 707) providing for the payment by the clerk of a court into the treasury of the surplus money received by him as the fees and emoluments of his office, was not a revenue law. U. S. v. Hill, 123 U. S. 681, 8 S. Ct. 308, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 275, wherein the court said: "As the provision relates to the jurisdiction of this court for the review of the judgments of the circuit courts, it is proper to refer to the statutes giving jurisdiction to those courts to see if there is anything there to show what the term 'revenue law,' as here used, means. Looking, then, to § 629 of the Revised Statutes, we find that by the fourth subdivision the circuit courts have been granted original jurisdiction 'of all suits at law or in equity arising under any act providing for revenue from imports or tonnage,' and 'of all causes arising under any law providing internal revenue.' And again, by the twelfth subdivision, 'of all suits brought by any person to recover damages for any injury to his person or property on account of any act done by him under any law of the United States for the protection or collection of any of the revenues thereof.' This clearly implies that the term 'revenue law,' when used in connection with the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, means a law imposing duties on imports or tonnage, or a law providing in terms for revenue; that is to say, a law which is directly traceable to the power granted to Congress by § 8, art. I, of the Constitution, 'to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.' This view is strengthened by the third subdivision of § 699, which gives this court jurisdiction, without reference to the value in dispute, of 'any final judgment of a circuit court . . . in any civil action against an officer of the revenue, for any act done by him in the performance of his official duty.' Certainly it will not be claimed that the clerk of a district court of the United States is an 'officer of the revenue,' but there is nothing to indicate that the term revenue has any different signification in this subdivision of the section from that which it has in the other. The clerk of a court of the United States collects his taxable 'compensation,' not as the revenue of the United States, but as the fees and emoluments of his office, with an obligation on his part to account to the United States for all he gets over a certain sum which is fixed by law. This obligation does not grow out of any 'revenue law,' properly so called, but out of a statute governing an officer of a court of the United States." The foregoing was quoted in part in U. S. v. Mason, 218 U. S. 517, 31 S. Ct. 28, 54 U. S. (L. ed.) 1133.

The phrase "revenue laws of this state" in the provision of the Missouri constitution (Art. 6, § 12) giving the supreme court appellate jurisdiction in cases involving the construction of the "revenue laws of this state," does not relate alone to the assessment of property, the levy or collection of taxes, licenses, etc., but may well include statutes concerning the disbursement of the revenue as well as the gathering of it into the county or state chest. State v. Adkins, 221 Mo. 112, 119 S. W. 1091, wherein the court said: "We conclude: (1) that when our jurisdiction is put upon the ground that the construction of the revenue laws of the state is involved, the law up for construction must be a state law as contradistinguished from the provisions of special city charter; (2) that it makes no difference where the law is to be found, whether under the title of 'revenue' or any other title, so long as it relates to the subject-matter of revenue; (3) that the revenue must be directly and primarily concerned, not merely indirectly or as an incident; (4) that the term 'revenue law' covers and includes laws relating to the disbursement of the revenue and its preservation as well as provisions relating to the assessment, levy and collection of it; and (5) finally, that where the question in the case is merely one relating to the general practice in circuit courts or before justices of the peace, although the case may pertain to the collection of taxes, yet the revenue laws are not involved in a constitutional sense."

The foregoing decision was followed in State v. Reynolds, 243 Mo. 715, 148 S. W. 623, and in State v. Shuck, 184 Mo. App. 511, 170 S. W. 431. Thus in State v. Reynolds, supra, in holding that the portions of a city charter relating to the assessment of benefits to property for public improvements were not "revenue laws of this state" within the constitutional phrase, the court quoted the foregoing extract from State v. Adkins, supra, and added: "With these conclusions we are fully satisfied. We would emphasize but one point. Our brother uses the phrase 'revenue laws of the state' whilst the constitution uses the phrase 'the revenue laws of this state.' We are not prepared to say that the word 'this' is more pointed as to the laws referred to than is the word 'the,' but it occurs to us that its use more strongly tends to show that the legislative mind was dealing with state laws as contradistinguished from city charters. . . . We do not think that the constitution makers when they used the phrase 'the revenue laws of this state' had any reference to special city charter provisions going solely to local assessments."

The purpose of the provision in the Texas statute (Rev. Stat. art. 996) permitting a writ of error to the supreme court from the decision of the court of appeals in case the revenue laws of the state were involved, when in other cases such a writ is not allowed, was to give the supreme court power in all such cases to construe the laws which were primarily intended to produce the revenues from which the government was to be supported. Johnson v. Hanscom, 90 Tex. 321, 37 S. W. 601, 38 S. W. 761, wherein, in construing the meaning of the words "the revenue laws of the state" the court held that while in a general sense these terms might embrace all laws, the operation of which brought an income to the state or to its counties, however trivial might be the sum yielded, an action by an officer to compel the payment by the county to him of costs and fees earned by him as recorder and ex-officio justice of the peace in criminal actions, did not come within the exception as being a case involving the revenue laws of the state.

STATUTE RELATING TO LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

The Act of Congress of March 26, 1804 (c. 40, § 3; 2 Story's Laws 941; 2 Stat. 290, re-enacted in Rev. Stat. § 1047; 3 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 330), provides that any person or persons guilty of any crime arising under the revenue laws of the United States, or incurring any fine or forfeiture by breaches of the said laws, may be prosecuted, etc., at any time within five years after committing the offense or incurring the fine or forfeiture. The true meaning of "revenue laws" in that clause is such laws as are made for the direct and avowed purpose of creating and securing revenue or public funds for the service of the government. No laws, whose collateral and indirect operation may possibly conduce to the public or fiscal wealth, are within the scope of the provision. U. S. v. Norton, 91 U. S. 566, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 454; 2 Cow. Crim. Rep. (N. Y.) 358; U. S. v. Mayo, 1 Gall. 396, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,755. In U. S. v. Wright, 11 Int. Rev. Rec. 22, 35, 17 Pittsb. Leg. J. 20, 3 Pittsb. 192, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 16,770, the court said: "The general terms of this section would seem to embrace offenses created by the act upon which this indictment is founded, but an elaborate argument has been made by the defendants' counsel to show that it is to be restricted in its application to offenses defined, or penalties imposed by laws relating to the importation of goods, etc.; and this for the reason that only such laws are to be regarded as revenue laws within the meaning of the Act of March 26, 1804. The argument has failed to convince us of the soundness of such interpretation. Its fundamental infirmity is in confounding the instrumentality with the result. Taxation is the means by which revenue is raised, and revenue is, therefore, the product or fruit of taxation. It matters not in what form the power of taxation may be exercised, or to what subjects it may be applied, its exercise is intended to provide means for the support of the government, and the means so provided are necessarily to be regarded as the national revenue. Duties upon imports are imposed for the same general object, and because they are so imposed the money thus produced is considered revenue, not because it is derived from that particular source. So also with regard to the act upon which the indictment in this case is founded; its object is to furnish financial sustenance to the government; its title expressly declares it to be 'An act to provide internal revenue,' etc. The taxes imposed by it when paid are to be applied to vital national objects, and constitute part of the revenue of the government. It is therefore manifestly a revenue law, and as such comes within the purview of the Act of 1804. . . . We must hold that the act upon which this indictment is founded is a revenue law, within the meaning of the Act of 1804, and that the limitation for the prosecution, trial and punishment of persons guilty of offenses within it, is extended to five years."

So, a suit for a penalty brought under an act which is not a "revenue law," and which therefore is not a case arising under the "revenue laws of the United States," is not within the limitation of five years prescribed by the foregoing statute, but is governed by the statutes with reference to the time limited for suing on penal statutes. U. S. v. Norton, 91 U. S. 566, 23 U. S. (L. ed.) 454; 2 Cow. Crim. (N. Y.) 358 (holding that an "Act to establish a postal money-order system," Act of May 17, 1864, 13 Stat. 76, could not be deemed a revenue law); Parsons v. Hunter, 2 Sumn. 419, 18 Fed. Cas. No. 10,778 (holding that the Consular Act of Feb. 28, 1803, c. 62, § 2; 2 Story's Laws 884; 2 Stat. 203, c. 9, providing a penalty for not depositing a ship's register and certain other papers with the consul on arrival in a foreign port, was in no just sense a revenue law); U. S. v. Mayo, 1 Gall. 396, 26 Fed. Cas. No. 15,755 (holding that an action to recover a penalty under the Embargo Act of Jan. 9, 1808, c. 8; 2 Stat. 450, was not a case arising under the revenue laws of the United States).

STATUTE RELATING TO REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

While the general terms, "revenue laws of the United States," used in the Act of March 2, 1833 (4 Stat. 632), providing for the removal of suits brought in state courts, under the revenue laws, to the federal courts, undoubtedly might, if standing alone, include all revenue laws of every description, yet, where they are used in an act entitled "An act further to provide for the collection of duties on imports," they must be considered as not intended to include laws for the collection of internal duties, and hence the statute does not apply in cases arising under the internal revenue laws. Stevens v. Mack, 5 Blatchf. 514, 6 Int. Rev. Rec. 181, 23 Fed. Cas. No. 13,404.

And it has been held that officers under the post-office department, such as an inspector and an assistant attorney-general of that department, are not officers acting under "the revenue laws," within the meaning of that phrase as used in the statute as re-enacted (Rev. Stat. § 643; 4 Fed. St. Ann. 260, repealed by Judicial Code, Act of March 3, 1911, c. 231; 36 Stat. 1087; 5 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 1085); People's United States Bank v. Goodwin, 162 Fed. 937, wherein the court said: "It is the treasury department which, by law, is charged with the administration of all revenue laws, customs and internal. If the fact that some acts of the officers of a department performed in pursuance of an act of Congress result in the collection or receipt of moneys which must necessarily be paid into the treasury of the United States, and thereby become available for the payment of the governmental expenses, makes that department and all the officials under it persons acting under 'the revenue laws' of the United States within the meaning of section 643, it is hard to imagine a case against any officer of the United States which would not be removable under that section. Officers of the judicial department, clerks and marshals, collect all fines and penalties imposed under the criminal laws of the United States; the marshals of the United States collect fees for their services from litigants—and all these moneys, whether collected for fines and penalties or fees for services performed by these officers, are required to be paid into the national treasury, and are, of course, available and used for defraying the expenses of the government under the appropriation acts of Congress. The department of the interior is charged with the sale of the public lands and the collection of all revenues arising from the public domain; the war and navy departments are authorized to sell many articles when they cease to be of further use for the purposes of these departments; the department of commerce and labor collects certain fees in naturalization cases—and all these moneys are required by law to be paid into the treasury to be used in the same manner as moneys collected under the revenue laws. Do these facts make all the officials and employees of those departments officers acting under 'the revenue laws' of the United States within the meaning of section 643? The mere statement of these facts is a conclusive answer to the defendants' contention. In my opinion, to permit the removal of a cause under this section of the law, the acts which constitute the cause of action must have some rational connection with official duties under 'a revenue law,' and in some way affect the revenue of the government. It could hardly be claimed that even a revenue collector, if sued for some act claimed to have been committed in the performance of his official duties, would have the right to remove the cause under section 643, if neither the declaration nor petition for certiorari showed that the act for which he was sued was in fact in the performance of an official duty imposed on him by law, having some relation to the collection of revenue for the government. These facts must appear on the face of the complaint in the action or in the petition for the writ of certiorari; otherwise a national court is without jurisdiction."

Nor is the Reclamation Act (Act of June 17, 1902, c. 1093; 32 Stat. 388; 7 Fed. St. Ann. 1098) a "revenue law," under the foregoing removal statute. Twin Falls Canal Co. v. Foote, 192 Fed. 583, wherein the court said: "Obviously, as indicated in its title, the reclamation of the arid lands of the United States by rendering to settlers temporary assistance in procuring water for the irrigation thereof was the controlling motive for its passage. It was recognized that in executing plans for the irrigation of much of the public arid land individual effort would be inadequate, and that the government with its unlimited credit could undertake and successfully carry to completion projects, which, because of their magnitude and difficulties, private enterprise would hesitate to undertake. The government was neither to gain nor to lose by the enterprise, for in theory the entire cost of any given project is to be reimbursed by those who enter irrigable lands thereunder. It is clear that, in so far as it is a feature at all, revenue is an incident only, and not the primary purpose of the act.

Without further elaboration, my conclusions may be briefly summarized as follows: (1) Unquestionably, the reclamation act is not a measure 'for raising revenue' in the constitutional sense. (2) It is not clear, and there is no decisive ruling to the effect, that the phrase 'revenue laws,' as used in section 643, is more comprehensive than the constitutional clause, 'bills for raising revenue.' (3) However that may be, 'revenue law,' as the phrase is ordinarily understood, does not aptly describe the reclamation act. Construction is required. (4) There is nothing either in the history of section 643 or in the conditions conducing to its enactment from which it is to be inferred that Congress intended to attach to the phrase, 'revenue laws,' any unusual significance or give to it a meaning beyond that which it is ordinarily understood to convey. (5) The reported cases are wholly indecisive of the question. (6) There is nothing in the reclamation act from which it can be inferred that Congress intended it as a revenue measure or from which the presumption arises that Congress purposed that controversies like the one here involved should be brought within the exclusive cognizance of federal courts. (7) In view of these several considerations, it is concluded generally that the reclamation act cannot properly be held to be a 'revenue law' within the meaning of section 643." To the same effect see Stanfield v. Umatilla River Water Users' Assoc. 192 Fed. 596.

However, a direct tax law (Act of 1861, 12 Stat. 294) in which a direct tax was imposed by a statute which revised and increased the duties on import, and for the first time taxed incomes, thus embracing in one revenue law, customs, duties, direct taxes and internal revenue, and entitled "An act to provide increased revenue from imports, to pay interest on the public debt, and for other purposes," has been held to be a revenue law and not an internal revenue act within the terms of the foregoing statute providing for the removal of suits. Peyton v. Bliss, Woolw. 170, 19 Fed. Cas. No. 11,055.

The post-office laws were held to be "revenue laws" within the meaning of the removal statute. Warner v. Fowler, 4 Blatchf. 311, 29 Fed. Cas. No. 17,182, wherein the court said: "The revenue of the state is the produce of taxes, excise, customs, and duties, which it collects and receives into the treasury for public use. It is the income which it receives to enable it to perform its proper functions. And laws relating to the revenue, or revenue laws, are such laws as are enacted in reference to such income, such as give rules as to the mode of its collection, and as to the manner in which the officials employed in such collections shall conduct. All taxes which are imposed by the state, whether such taxes be direct or indirect, are, when collected, the revenue of the state. They are its income. As they are the revenue of the state, all laws regulating such taxes and giving such rules for their collection are taxes relating to the revenue. The duty paid for the carriage of letters by the agency of government is at times a most important branch of the public revenue, and the laws relating to the same are of the greatest importance to the revenue. From this duty the government, in time of war, or at any time when, from any cause, the income from customs is materially impaired and cannot be increased, derives an essential part of its revenue. Duties or taxes collected under the tariff laws of the United States, upon the importation of foreign goods into the country, are the revenue of the state; and the laws regulating the collection of such duties or taxes, and prescribing rules to officials employed in such collection, are laws relating to the revenue. This is conceded. But such duties or taxes are no more the revenue of the state than are the duties or taxes collected under the post-office laws of the United States, for the carriage of letters in the public mails, the revenue of the state. And the laws regulating the collection of duties or taxes upon the importation of foreign goods into the country, and prescribing rules for the governments or officials in the collection of such duties or taxes, are no more laws relating to the revenue than are the laws which regulate the mode of collecting duties or taxes for the carriage of letters in the public mails, or which prescribe rules for the conduct of officials in the collection of such duties or taxes for such carriage."

"Revenue Measure."

The power to license and regulate, granted by statute, and conferred on municipal corporations solely for police purposes, cannot be used by them as a means of increasing their revenues. So in Ft. Smith v. Gunter, 106 Ark. 371, 154 S. W. 181, it was held that an ordinance passed by the city under the authority of a statute which attempted to define those things which a city council should have power to license, regulate, or prohibit, and in which in the very nature of things only general terms were employed, imposing a license on restaurants at the rate of $25 per annum, $15 for six months, and $3 per month, was the regulation of restaurants by the city and was not a revenue measure.

In Pottsville v. Pottsville Gas Co. 15 Pa. Dist. 979, 32 Pa. Co. Ct. 7, it was held that an ordinance of a borough requiring the obtaining of a permit before making excavations in the streets and fixing the fee therefor according to the size of the excavation to be made and the nature of the paving of the street, was not a measure for revenue. The court said: "What is 'revenue?' Webster defines it to be 'The annual produce of taxes, excise, customs, duties, rents, etc., which a nation or state collects and receives into the treasury for public use.' It is an annual tax. Surely this is not an annual tax. The defendant company may not dig up the streets again in a single place for five years. And if they do not dig there will be no charge. It is not for general use, but to pay for the very expenses incurred by the acts of this company, necessitated by their failure to restore the streets to their former condition and for which the borough is not responsible. The borough is bound to keep its streets in a reasonably safe condition and are responsible in damages for neglect. Why then should they be forced to a suit at law, in case the company would, not pay for these repairs? Why can they not demand payment in advance? We think they can. In the cases cited it is an annual charge which the municipalities have sought to enforce. Here, if it exceeds what is reasonable for the necessary supervision, it becomes revenue. In this case it is not an annual tax. It is dependent entirely upon the action of the company. During the period covered by the evidence they must have had an unusual amount of work, for the price paid for labor leads to that conclusion, and they may not be called upon to pay such an amount for permits in years."

However, in Parsons v. People, 32 Colo. 221, 76 Pac. 666, it was held that the section of an act regulating the sale of liquor and requiring a license fee from those engaged in selling liquor was a revenue measure, having been enacted, and the fee imposed, solely for the purpose of securing revenue for state purposes, and there being no element of regulation in the statute.

"Revenue Debts or Charges."

As used in an act (42 & 43 Vict. c. 187, § 12) empowering one railway company to purchase the undertaking of another at a price to be fixed by arbitration and providing that the purchase money should be used in part in paying off any revenue debts or charges of the company purchased, so far as the same had not already been paid out of revenue, it has been held that the words "revenue debts or charges," included such current expenses as might be incurred after the time of transfer and during the limited operations of the company purchased while winding itself up and directing the apportionment of the purchase money, as well as the revenue debts and charges which existed at the time of the transfer. Hutton v. West Cork R. Co. 23 Ch. D. (Eng.) 654, 52 L. J. Ch. 689, 49 L. T. N. S. 420, 31 W. R. 827.

In Midland Great Western Ry. Co. v. Dublin, etc. R. Co. 4 R. & Can. T. Cas. 145, it was held that under a working agreement between the two railway companies providing for the submission to arbitration of all questions arising between the two companies as to its construction, certain new works, as boilers at certain of the stations for heating water to supply passengers with foot warmers, and the replacing of a wooden engine shed with a larger one built of stone, were revenue charges and not capital charges and were to be borne by the plaintiff company under the agreement.

"Revenue Tax."

In holding that the fee required to be paid for a building license under an ordinance providing that no person should build or enlarge any building, or remove any building from place to place in the city, or put any new roof or covering on any building within the fire district, etc., without a license or permit first issued therefor to the owner or person in charge of such building, was a revenue tax, the court in Welch v. Hotchkiss, 39 Conn. 140, 12 Am. Rep. 383, said: "The objection is that the fee to be paid for a building license is a tax for revenue purposes; that the charter confers no power upon the city to levy such a tax; that it is a sum paid for which no consideration or equivalent is given in return; that it is unequal in its operation, the same fee being required for all classes of buildings without regard to size or expense; and that the power thus to tax implies and carries with it the power to require such a fee as would prevent owners from building at all, and thus comes in conflict with the fundamental rules of law, and operates as a restraint of trade. If it is to be regarded as a revenue tax, it might be liable to some or all of these objections. But we are of the opinion that it is not a tax, in any proper sense. It is rather a reasonable sum collected of the party, intended for the purpose of defraying, in part, the necessary expense attending the issuing and recording the license. As such it is open to none of these objections."

In Yancey v. New Manchester Mfg. Co. 33 Ga. 622, it was held that the act providing for an income tax for the support of the indigent widows and orphans of deceased soldiers (Act of April 18, 1863; Pamphlet Acts 177, 178) was a revenue tax.

"Board of Revenue."

"The term 'board of revenue' has a distinct meaning in our legislative history, from the fact that for many years there have existed in various counties of the state such boards as a substitute for courts of county commissioners, with like powers and duties." State v. Bracken, 154 Ala. 151, 45 So. 841, wherein the title of an act using that term was held to express clearly the purpose of the act.

"Officer of the Revenue."

A postmaster is not an "officer of the revenue" within the federal statute (Rev. Stat. § 989, 3 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 232, reenacting Act of March 3, 1863, 12 Stat. 741) providing that "when a recovery is had in any suit or proceeding against a collector or other officer of the revenue for any act done by him, or for the recovery of any money exacted by or paid to him, and by him paid into the treasury, in the performance of his official duty, and the court certifies that there was probable cause for the act done by the collector or other officer, or that he acted under the direction of the secretary of the treasury or other proper officer of the government, no execution shall issue against such collector or other officer, but the amount so recovered shall, upon final judgment, be provided for and paid out of the proper appropriation from the treasury." Campbell v. Jomas, 3 Fed. 513, wherein the court said: "The section is taken from section 12 of the Act of March 3, 1863 (12 U. S. Stat. L. 741). . . . The Act of March 3, 1863, is entitled 'An act to prevent and punish frauds upon the revenue, to provide for the more speedy and certain collection of claims in favor of the United States, and for other purposes.' In section 2 are found the words 'frauds upon the revenue;' in sections 3, 4 and 6 the words 'any officer of the revenue;' in section 5 the words 'the revenue laws;' in section 7 the words 'any fraud on the revenue;' in section 11 the words 'the revenue laws;' and in sections 12 and 13 the words 'collectors or other officers of the revenue.' It is clear that the word 'revenue' in all these forms of expression, means only the revenue from customs. The act does not relate to revenue from any other source. So far as it relates to revenue from any source it relates only to revenue from customs. The words 'officers of the revenue,' in section 12, mean officers of the revenue from customs. The words 'officers of the revenue' in section 989 of the Revised Statutes, which is a mere revision or reprint of section 12 of the Act of 1863, can have no different meaning from what it would have had if there had been no revision or reprint. Under said section '12 the words 'other officers of the revenue' would never have been construed to mean a postmaster. Therefore, they cannot be so construed in section 989 of the Revised Statutes. The revision cannot change the meaning of the same words by displacing the enactment from the connection in which Congress originally placed it."

v.

BRADY ET AL.

Illinois Supreme Court—February 21, 1917.

277 Ill. 272; 115 N. E. 393.

"Revenue" — Meaning of Term.

The constitution, in limiting appropriations which may lawfully be made by each general assembly for the ordinary and contingent expenses of the government until the expiration of the first fiscal quarter after the adjournment of the next regular session to the amount of revenue authorized by law to be raised in such time, does not regard the amount of the state's total revenue as merely the amount of its moneys raised by direct taxation.

[See note at end of this case.]

Public Officers — Liability — Payment under Invalid Law.

The state auditor of public accounts and the state treasurer cannot be compelled to account for and restore moneys paid out, before the institution of a taxpayer's suit, pursuant to appropriations made by the general assembly, since their duties in issuing and paying warrants are purely ministerial, and neither is required to decide the validity of a law apparently enacted for a governmental purpose.

Payment for Purpose Not Governmental.

A public officer having only ministerial duties may be held personally liable for the payment of an appropriation for a purpose which is not governmental in its nature.

States — Exceeding Current Revenue — Validity of Contract.

Const. art. 4, § 18, prohibits appropriations in excess of the revenue authorized by law to be raised in the period for which appropriations are made, but provides that in case of failure of revenue the general assembly may borrow moneys to be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained, or to pay the debt so created, and to no other purpose. Section 19 prohibits the general assembly from authorizing the payment of any claim or part created against the state under any contract made without express authority of law, with the exception that it may make appropriations for expenditures incurred in repelling invasion or suppressing insurrection. Cr. Code (Hurd's Rev. St. 1915-16, c. 38) § 208, provides that making a contract in excess of the amount of an appropriation subjects the public officer to a fine and removal from his office, trust, or employment. It is held that every claim or contract created or made by an officer of the state is utterly void if not within the amount of appropriations already made, unless there is express authority of law for the creation of the debt or claim or the making of the contract, that authority being "express" which confers power to do a particular identical thing set forth and declared exactly, plainly, and directly with well-defined limits, an authority given in direct terms, definitely and explicitly, and not left to inference or implication, as distinguished from authority which is general, implied, or not directly stated or given.

Constitutional Law — Construction of Constitution — Contemporaneous Construction.

Where the language of the constitution and the intent of the people in adopting it are clear and free from doubt or uncertainty, the practice of the general assembly and officers of the government in making appropriations has no influence in determining their legality, since contemporaneous construction is of value only where there is doubt and uncertainty.

Taxpayer's Action — Restraining Unauthorized Payments.

A taxpayer has the right to maintain a suit to restrain the state auditor of public accounts and the state treasurer from paying out sums illegally appropriated by the general assembly, in violation of Const. art. 4, §§ 18, 19, in excess of revenue.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 884.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sangamon county: CREIGHTON, Judge.

Action by J. B. Fergus, plaintiff, against James J. Brady et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. MODIFIED.

P. J. Lucey, Lester H. Strawn, A. R. Roy and Logan Hay for appellants.

F. S. Munro, John A. Watson and Stevens & Herndon for appellee.

[274] CARTWRIGHT, J.—By his second amended bill filed in this case in the circuit court of Sangamon county, the appellee, J. B.

Fergus, prayed for an injunction against the appellants, James J. Brady, Auditor of Public Accounts, and Andrew Russel, Treasurer of the State of Illinois, to prevent the payment of various sums appropriated by the General Assembly to boards and individuals and to require an accounting and restitution for sums that had been paid out of the State treasury on warrants drawn by the Auditor and paid by the Treasurer. The defendants demurred generally and specially, and the chancellor sustained two of the special causes of demurrer. The bill alleged that appropriations amounting in the aggregate to more than $400,000 were illegal because in excess of the revenue authorized to be raised by taxation. The chancellor held that the word "revenue," as used in section 18 of article 4 of the constitution, is not limited to moneys raised by taxation but includes moneys derived from all sources required by law to be paid into the State treasury within a specified time, and also held that the bill of complaint did not state a case against the defendants warranting an accounting and restitution of moneys paid out of the State treasury. An interlocutory decree was entered accordingly, and the defendants answered, alleging the validity of the appropriations and setting forth the payment of the greater part of them before the suit was instituted. Charles E. Pope, to whom an appropriation had been made, intervened by petition and the cause was heard mainly on a stipulation of facts. The chancellor found that a considerable number of unpaid appropriations were unlawful and enjoined their payment but included by inadvertence [275] four claims that had been paid. An appeal was prosecuted from the decree, and appellants have assigned error on the ruling of the chancellor on each of the items held illegal, and the appellee has assigned cross-errors on the ruling of the chancellor in sustaining the special causes of demurrer and the failure to require an accounting and restitution by the defendants of claims paid out before the bill was filed and to decide the same to be illegal.

The decision of the controversy will be better understood by first considering the cross-errors assigned on the ruling of the chancellor sustaining two special causes of demurrer.

The constitution limits appropriations which may lawfully be made by each General Assembly for the ordinary and contingent expenses of the government until the expiration of the first fiscal quarter after the adjournment of the next regular session to the amount of revenue authorized by law to be raised in such time, and the first question is whether the amount of revenue is limited to moneys raised by taxation. There is a very large amount of money paid into the State treasury from other sources than direct taxation, and the ordinary meaning of the word is the total income of the government, derived from all sources, subject to be applied to public purposes. It would not be reasonable to say that appropriations which are not to exceed income should be limited to moneys raised by direct taxation while there are other large sums of money which may be applied to the purposes of the government not taken into account.

The chancellor also held on the special demurrers that the complainant could not compel an accounting and restitution of moneys paid out before the institution of the suit in pursuance of appropriations made by the General Assembly. The duties of the Auditor and Treasurer in issuing and paying warrants are purely ministerial, and neither is required to decide upon the validity of a law which is [276] apparently enacted for a governmental purpose. A public official having only ministerial duties may be held personally liable for the payment of an appropriation for a purpose which is not governmental in its nature, as in the case of Jackson v. Norris, 72 Ill. 364, where the treasurer of the city of Salem paid $1,000 to the Salem Manufacturing Company to enable that company to discharge its debts, but it would be a perilous doctrine to hold that an official having ministerial duties in the machinery of the State government is authorized to determine whether an act of the General Assembly is in violation of the constitution where he has no notice that the appropriation is unlawful, as in this case. If an appropriation were entirely outside of the functions of a State government the question would be different. The chancellor was right in eliminating from the controversy between the complainant and the State Auditor and Treasurer all the appropriations which had been paid.

The errors assigned by the appellants against the decision of the chancellor concern the unpaid appropriations found to be illegal, and whether they were or not depends upon provisions of the constitution. Sections 18 and 19 of article 4 of the constitution are as follows:

"Sec. 18. Each General Assembly shall provide for all the appropriations necessary for the ordinary and contingent expenses of the government until the expiration of the first fiscal quarter after the adjournment of the next regular session, the aggregate amount of which shall not be increased without a vote of two-thirds of the members elected to each house, nor exceed the amount of revenue authorized by law to be raised in such time; and all appropriations, general or special, requiring money to be paid out of the State treasury, from funds belonging to the State, shall end with such fiscal quarter: Provided, the State may, to meet casual deficits or failures in revenues, contract debts, never to exceed in the aggregate $250,000; and moneys thus borrowed shall be applied to the purpose for which they were [277] obtained, or to pay the debt thus created, and to no other purpose; and no other debt, except for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection, or defending the State in war (for payment of which the faith of the State shall be pledged), shall be contracted, unless the law authorizing the same shall, at a general election, have been submitted to the people, and have received a majority of the votes cast for members of the General Assembly at such election. The General Assembly shall provide for the publication of said law for three months at least before the vote of the people shall be taken upon the same; and provision shall be made, at the time, for the payment of the interest annually, as it shall accrue, by a tax levied for the purpose or from other sources of revenue; which law, providing for the payment of such interest by such tax, shall be irrevocable until such debt be paid: And, provided, further, that the law levying the tax shall be submitted to the people with the law authorizing the debt to be contracted.

"Sec. 19. The General Assembly shall never grant or authorize extra compensation, fee or allowance to any public officer, agent, servant or contractor, after service has been rendered or a contract made, nor authorize the payment of any claim, or part thereof, hereafter created against the State under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law; and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts shall be null and void: Provided, the General Assembly may make appropriations for expenditures incurred in suppressing insurrection or repelling invasion."

Section 208 of division 1 of the Criminal Code makes it a crime for anyone holding any public office, trust or employment to contract, directly or indirectly, for an expenditure beyond the amount appropriated to be contracted for or expended upon the subject-matter of the contract, in the following language: "Every person holding any public office (whether State, county or municipal), trust or employment, [278] . . . who shall be guilty of contracting directly or indirectly, for the expenditure of a greater sum or amount of money than may have been, at the time of making the contracts, appropriated or set apart by law or authorized by law to be contracted for or expended upon the subject-matter of the contracts, . . . shall be fined not exceeding $10,000, and may be removed from his office, trust or employment."

These provisions of the constitution and statute are clear and unambiguous in terms and their purpose and object cannot be misunderstood. Section 18 prohibits appropriations in excess of the revenue authorized by law to be raised in the period for which appropriations are made, but necessarily revenue, whether derived from one source or another in the future, must always be estimated and never can be a fixed and certain sum. Circumstances may occur that will cause the reasonable expectations of the General Assembly as to the amount of revenue to miscarry or not to be fulfilled, so that there may be a temporary deficiency. To meet that condition which may arise from failure in making collections of taxes or result from decreased revenue from other sources, the section provides that in case of failure of revenue the General Assembly may contract debts, never to exceed $250,000. This debt is only to be created by borrowing money,—not by incurring debts or making contracts,—since the section requires that the moneys thus borrowed shall be applied to the purpose for which they were obtained or to pay the debt thus created, and to no other purpose. No other debt can be contracted, except for the purpose of repelling invasion, suppressing insurrection or defending the State in war, except upon a vote of the people at a general election. By section 19 the General Assembly is prohibited from authorizing the payment of any claim, or part thereof, created against the State under any agreement or contract made without express authority of law, and all such unauthorized agreements or contracts [279] are null and void, with the exception that the General Assembly may make appropriations for expenditures incurred in repelling invasion or suppressing insurrection. By the Criminal Code the making of a contract in excess of the amount of an appropriation subjects the offender to a fine not exceeding $10,000 and removal from his office, trust or employment. No right whatever can grow out of the commission of a crime, and by the plain language of the constitution every claim or contract is utterly void if not within the amount of appropriations already made, unless there is express authority of law for the creation of the debt or claim or the making of the contract. In section 19 claims under any agreement or contract made by express authority of law are excepted, and if there is some particular and specific thing which an officer, board or agency of the State is required to do, the performance of the duty is expressly authorized by law. That authority is express which confers power to do a particular, identical thing set forth and declared exactly, plainly and directly, with well defined limits, and the only exception under which a contract exceeding the amount appropriated for the purpose may be valid is where it is so expressly authorized by law. An express authority is one given in direct terms, definitely and explicitly, and not left to inference or to implication, as distinguished from authority which is general, implied or not directly stated or given. An example of such express authority is found in one of the deficiency appropriations to the Southern Illinois penitentiary which had been paid, and serves only as an illustration. The authorities in control of the penitentiary are required by law to receive, feed, clothe and guard prisoners convicted of crime and placed in their care, involving the expenditure of money, which may vary on account of the cost of clothing, food and labor beyond the control of the authorities, and which could not be accurately estimated in advance for that reason or by determining the exact number of inmates. To [280] extend the meaning of the constitutional requirement that there shall be express authority of law for the creation of a debt or the making of an agreement or contract in excess of an appropriation for the purpose beyond the meaning we have given to it would destroy and nullify the provisions of the constitution. The power of the General Assembly to make appropriations for any purpose is not exhausted by one appropriation but additional appropriations may be made before an indebtedness is incurred, as occasion may require.

The language of the constitution and intent of the people in adopting it being clear and free from doubt or uncertainty, the practice of the General Assembly and officers of the government in making appropriations has no influence in determining their legality. Contemporaneous construction is of value only where there is doubt and uncertainty, and there is none in this instance. All that has been done is that the General Assembly and public officials have disregarded constitutional requirements adopted by the people for their protection. It cannot be said that the people, who constitute the other party in interest, have acquiesced in the construction adopted by the General Assembly, since the money interest of an individual taxpayer would not justify the necessary expense of an appeal to the courts to prevent such unlawful action.

It would not be practicable to enumerate the appropriations held void by the chancellor and to explain in detail their nature. Each one was for the payment of a claim created without express authority of law and either without a previous appropriation or in excess of the appropriation.

It is argued that the complainant, as a taxpayer, had no right to maintain the bill, but on the principle declared in Jones v. O'Connell, 266 Ill. 443, 107 N. E. 731, and Fergus v. Russell, 270 Ill. 304, Ann. Cas. 1916B 1120, 110 N. E. 130, he had a right to maintain the suit.

The four appropriations which had been paid and were included in the decree by mistake are, $280.15 to A. DeElton [281] Peterson, $200 to T. E. Wayne, $200 to J. McGreal and $137 to W. P. McGuire. The decree will be modified by striking out these four items and as so modified will be affirmed.

Decree modified and affirmed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that, as used in a constitutional provision that annual appropriations shall not exceed the revenue authorized to be raised by taxation, the term "revenue" is not limited to the proceeds of direct taxation but includes "the total income of the government derived from all sources subject to be applied to public purposes." The cases discussing the definition of the term "revenue" are collated in the note to State v. Gordon, reported ante, this volume, at page 191.

NEWELL

v.

REID ET AL.

Michigan Supreme Court—December 21, 1915.

189 Mich. 174; 155 N. W. 352.

Food and Drugs — Foreign Substance in Animal Food — Liability of Seller.

In an action for the death of two cows alleged to have been caused by eating bran purchased from defendants and containing arsenic, the evidence is held to be sufficient to support findings that the cows died from arsenic poisoning.

[See note at end of this case.]

Error to Circuit Court, St. Clair county: TAPPAN, Judge.

Action by John Newell, plaintiff, against James Reid et al., defendants. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants bring error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Clair R. Black and John B. Mellwain for plaintiffs in error.

Walsh & Walsh and C. L. Benedict for defendant in error.

[175] OSTRANDER, J.—It is alleged in the plaintiff's declaration that he purchased from defendants bran to feed to cattle, that defendants sold him the bran for such use, that the bran was not fit and proper for such use—"and was mixed with and contained poisonous substances and unwholesome and deleterious material, and was entirely worthless and of no value and unfit for such use and of a poisonous and unwholesome nature; and the said plaintiff, . . . relying upon said promises and warranties, fed such bran and materials to certain live stock, to wit, two cows then and there the property of said plaintiff of the value of, to wit, $300, which thereupon, by reason of its unwholesome and poisonous nature, immediately became sick and soon thereafter died as a result of eating said bran and materials aforesaid."

The court refused a peremptory instruction favorable to defendants. Defendants then presented, and the court submitted to the jury, two special questions, namely:

"Do you find from the preponderance of the evidence in this case that the two cows of the plaintiff died from arsenic poison, and not from other causes?"

"Do you find from a preponderance of the evidence [176] in this case that at the time of the sale of the bran to plaintiff there was arsenic in the small sack sufficient to kill the two cows?"

To each question the jury returned an affirmative answer, with a general verdict for plaintiff of $140.

It is certified that the bill of exceptions "has been made sufficiently full and complete so that the Supreme Court on writ of error may by going over the same be able to make an examination of the entire case."

It is the contention, and only contention, of defendants, appellants, that the answers to the special questions and the general verdict are not supported by testimony. In considering this contention, it is assumed that the record contains substantially all of the testimony given at the trial. Otherwise, it would be presumed that testimony had been given which supported the findings of the jury. Stevens v. Rose, 69 Mich. 259, 37 N. W. 205. The assumption is based upon what seems to be the fair meaning of the certificate above referred to.

The contents of the stomachs of the two cows which died, and which the plaintiff claims were poisoned, were not analyzed. However, the testimony for the plaintiff tended to prove that both cows were fed bran from a package purchased from defendants, both died, exhibiting symptoms of arsenical poisoning, the remainder of the contents of the package was screened, a portion of the material was submitted to a chemist, and he found upon an analysis that it contained arsenic. Further, the testimony tended to prove that when it was sold to plaintiff the bran was not in the packages purchased by defendants from the manufacturer of the bran, but, had been resacked by defendants after having been turned out upon the floor of their barn, or storehouse. The smaller package, claimed to have contained the noxious substance, or substances, had in it, besides bran, pieces of bread and meat. The [177] chemist tested a portion of a sample of 1½ ounces of this material, consisting of a mixture of bread, bran, meat, dirt, and hairs, and found arsenic, and estimated that in the 1½ ounces there was probably a grain of arsenic. Defendants used rat poison about their premises on several occasions, putting it upon bread and meat. A box of the material screened from the smaller sack of bran, and like that sent to the chemist, was exhibited to the jury. It is not mere conjecture, but an inference, based upon testimony, that the smaller sack of bran contained sweepings from the storehouse floor and included portions of bread and meat and rat poison, which ought not to have been sold for food for cattle. There was testimony tending to prove that the rat poison used by defendants contained no arsenic, and different persons might have reached different conclusions concerning the preponderance of the evidence. That there was testimony supporting the finding is, I think, clear.

The judgment is affirmed.

Brooke, C. J., and Person, Kuhn, Stone, Bird, Moore, and Steere, JJ., concurred.

NOTE.

Liability for Injury Resulting from Foreign Substance in Food.

It appears to be the general rule that on a sale of food there is an implied warranty of fitness for human consumption (see the notes to National Cotton Oil Co. v. Young, 4 Ann. Cas. 1123, and Farrell v. Manhattan Market Co. 15 Ann. Cas. 1076) and that a manufacturer or vendor is liable for consequential damages resulting from the breach of that warranty. See the notes to Jackson v. Watson, 16 Ann. Cas. 492; Doyle v. Fuerst, Ann. Cas. 1913B 1110; Mazetti v. Armour, Ann. Cas. 1915C 140; and Woodward v. Miller, 100 Am. St. Rep. 188. As to the liability as for negligence of a restaurant proprietor for serving unfit food, see the notes to Crocker v. Baltimore Dairy Lunch Co. Ann. Cas. 1914B 884, and Merrill v. Hodson, Ann. Cas. 1916D 917. A question closely related to that discussed in the present note, namely, the liability for an injury resulting from a foreign substance in a beverage, is considered in the note to Crigger v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co. Ann. Cas. 1917B 572.

The few cases which have passed on the liability arising from the sale of food containing a foreign substance seem to have been based on negligence, and to turn on the question whether the presence of such a substance in an article of food is prima facie evidence of negligence. In Chaproniere v. Mason, 21 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 633, it was held that a prima facie showing of negligence was made by proof of the presence of a stone in a bun.

So in Ternay v. Ward Baking Co. 167 N. Y. S. 562, reversing a dismissal of the action, the court stated the facts and its conclusion thereon as follows: "Plaintiff sued for injuries received through having partaken of a loaf of bread, baked by the defendant, because of the presence of many particles of glass imbedded in the crust on the lower side of the loaf. It appears from the evidence that the defendant's driver delivered this bread, with other loaves, to a storekeeper, who placed them in a case reserved for the bread which stood on a counter in the dealer's store. The dealer testified that this case was always in a state of perfect repair, and that there was no glass or other foreign substance in it; that, however, his customers were in the habit of helping themselves to the bread which they purchased by themselves taking it out of the showcase. I understand respondent to urge in support of the judgment that the line of cases beginning with Thomas v. Winchester, 6 N. Y. 397, 57 Am. Dec. 455, and ending with MacPherson v. Buick Motor Co. 217 N. Y. 382, Ann. Cas. 1916C 440, 111 N. E. 1050, L.R.A.1916F 696, does not apply, because in those cases the defects considered were defects of manufacture, whereas in the instant case the evidence is not sufficient to charge the defendant, as manufacturer, with responsibility for the presence of the glass. This claim is based upon a two-fold argument: First, to the effect that manifestly glass is not an ingredient of bread; and, second, that the proof is not sufficient to exclude the possibility or probability of outside interference with the bread during the interval between its delivery and the purchase by the infant plaintiff. Of course, it need hardly be said that there was no direct proof that the glass had been inserted by the manufacturer. There is, therefore, I take it, no dispute between the parties as to the correct principle of law defining the responsibility of the defendant in the premises. Defendant, it may be assumed, would be liable, were the proofs sufficient to raise a question for the jury whether the glass was in the bread before its delivery to the dealer, and if the jury should so determine. It is superfluous to repeat that there can be no set formula to determine the quantum of evidence required to prove an ultimate fact. Each case must depend upon its own intrinsic circumstances. The particles of glass shown on the exhibit, which by consent of both parties has been submitted to the court, are embedded in the lower crust of the loaf, and, so far as can be judged from the part submitted, were distributed over its entire surface. They have the appearance of having been baked into the crust, or, at all events, of having been impressed thereon at a time when the crust was soft, and therefore probably still warm from the baking. The testimony of the dealer is sufficient to permit a finding that no opportunity was ever presented during his possession of the loaf to so interfere with it as to produce the result which the exhibit discloses. I think, therefore, that on his evidence and the mute testimony of the exhibit an issue was presented for submission to the jury whether the dangerous condition of the bread was not produced by the defendant through its agents."

In Freeman v. Schultz Bread Co. 100 Misc. 528, 163 N. Y. S. 396, wherein it appeared that a nail was embedded in a loaf of bread, the court said: "The manufacturer of bread, it may be assumed, knows and recognizes that, when he puts his finished product upon the market, it is intended for sale to and use by the public as bread is ordinarily used, by biting off a piece to masticate, without first examining or testing it in the search for foreign substances which might injure the teeth or mouth while biting into a slice, or become dangerous to life if swallowed. A loaf of bread of itself is not dangerous, but it may be assumed that a manufacturer knows it may become a source of danger to the consumer if care is not used in its manufacture, and that unless he uses ordinary care and skill with regard to the manner of manufacturing it, and to keep it clear from dangerous foreign substances with which it is likely to come into contact in the factory, there will be injury to the person for whom the bread is intended, and therefore a duty arises on his part to the consumer to use that ordinary care and skill in its manufacture, for a neglect to perform which duty causing an injury an action for negligence can be maintained."

But in Jacobs v. Childs Co. 166 N. Y. S. 798, a restaurant keeper was held not to be charged with negligence by proof of the presence of a nail in a cake prepared and served by him, the court saying: "The plaintiff, while a guest in one of the eating places maintained by the defendant, ordered a piece of cake which was served wrapped in wax paper. The plaintiff removed the cover, and while in the process of eating bit upon a metallic nail which was concealed in the cake. For the injuries resulting therefrom she seeks to hold the defendant liable. The cake was baked and prepared by the defendant. The learned counsel for the plaintiff at first proceeded upon the theory of the defendant's implied warranty of the fitness of the food for consumption; but subsequently moved to change the cause of action to one in tort predicated upon the negligence of the defendant in permitting the nail to get into the cake. The court having allowed the amendment, the question for consideration is whether the fact of the presence of the nail is sufficient to charge the defendant with negligence. The extent of the duty of restaurant keepers to furnish wholesome food and the resultant liability upon their failure so to do is foreign to the decision of this case. The cake which was served to the plaintiff was not bad for consumption or unwholesome. The various ingredients which made up the cake were not deleterious to health, and the cake itself was fit for consumption. The gravamen in this case is that a foreign substance in no wise connected with the preparation of the cake caused injury to the plaintiff. Likewise the consideration of those authorities must be eliminated which deal with the responsibility of manufacturers engaged in making commodities which were inherently dangerous. The plaintiff failed to show any negligence on the part of the defendant beyond the fact of the presence of the nail in the cake. She relies upon the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur. Without entering into a discussion of the vexed question of the application of that doctrine, I am of the opinion that it has no application to this case. It is obvious that the nail was not used in the mixing of the dough, nor in connection with the other ingredients of the cake. It apparently was dropped into the dough carelessly or wilfully by one of the defendant's servants or an outsider."

In Akers v. Overbeck, 18 Misc. 198, 41 N. Y. S. 382, it was held that negligence was not shown by the fact that a sack of coffee contained a stone, whereby the coffee mill of a purchaser was broken.

In Liggett, etc. Tobacco Co. v. Cannon, 132 Tenn. 419, Ann. Cas. 1917A 179, 178 S. W. 1009, L.R.A.1916A 940, it was held that chewing tobacco is not a "food" within the rule allowing a recovery by a person not in privity with the manufacturer for an injury from the presence of a foreign substance therein.

In Hunt v. Rhodes Bros. Co. 207 Mass. 30, 92 N. E. 1001, it appeared that a married woman was injured while preparing for cooking a leg of lamb purchased by her husband, in which was embedded a carpet tack. The court held that the evidence warranted a finding that the husband acted as her agent so as to create a privity of contract between her and the seller, and added: "We cannot help feeling that a more satisfactory ground on which to rest the case would have been the duty which the defendant owed to any one preparing it to be served as food to see that there was not suffered to remain embedded in the lamb anything that was liable to cause injury to any one in preparing it while in the exercise of due care."

In some cases involving the presence of a foreign substance in food sold for the use of animals it has been held that there could be a recovery for breach of an implied warranty. Wilson v. Dunville, 6 L. R. Ir. (Eng.) 210 (small particles of lead in grain); Coyle v. Raum, 3 Okla. 695, 41 Pac. 389 (castor beans in oats). And see the reported case.

In other cases the doctrine of implied warranty has been held not to apply to a sale of animal food, and the presence of a foreign substance has been deemed not to show negligence. National Cotton Oil Co. v. Young, 74 Ark. 144, 4 Ann. Cas. 1123, 85 S. W. 92, 109 Am. St. Rep. 71 (pieces of wire in cotton seed meal); Lukens v. Freund, 27 Kan. 664, 41 Am. Rep. 429 (metal clasps in bran).

Where the seller was charged with notice of the presence of the foreign substance a recovery on the ground of negligence has been sustained. French v. Vining, 102 Mass. 132, 3 Am. Rep. 440 (hay on which seller knew white lead had been spilled); Provost v. Cook, 184 Mass. 315, 68 N. E. 336 (oats known to seller to have been in place involving danger of mixture with paris green).

Signature — Definition of Term "Sign."

To "sign" a document is to affix a signature thereto, to ratify by hand or seal, or to subscribe in one's own handwriting. Citing Words and Phrases, Sign.

Wills — Execution — Necessity of Signature at End — Olographic Will.

An olographic will containing testatrix's name at beginning of document, and closing with, "whereunto I hereby set my hand, etc.," but not subscribed, is not "signed," as required by Civ. Code, § 1277, in view of section 13, which provides that words are to be construed as ordinarily used and according to context.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where an olographic will was not signed as required by Civ. Code, § 1277, indorsement "my will," with decedent's signature, on the envelope containing it, does not cure the defect, merely showing her belief that it was a valid will, and the envelope not being a part of the will.

[See note at end of this case.]

Manner of Execution — Intent of Testator.

The power and method of testamentary disposition is within legislative control, and, in determining whether a will is properly executed, testator's intention cannot be considered.

Signature — Definition of Term "Sign."

To "sign" a document is to make any mark upon it in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation, and the "signature" is the sign thus made, and, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the document's face.

Wills — Place of Signature — Intent.

Where a signature is at the end of a will, universal custom creates the conclusion that it was appended as an execution; if elsewhere, it is for the court to say from inspection of the whole document, as to language as well as form and relative position of parts, whether that was the intention.

L. P. Forestell for appellant.

Wm. A. Powell, Earl H. Webb and George W. Chamberlain for respondent.

[413] SHAW, J.—The court below, upon the petition of Woltman, duly made an order admitting a certain document to probate as the last will of the decedent. From this order Walter Manchester, a brother and heir of the decedent, appeals.

The document referred to was wholly in the handwriting of the decedent. The only objection presented upon this appeal is that it was not signed by the decedent.

The document began as follows:

"January 14th, 1914.

"I, Matilda Manchester, leave and bequeath all my estate & effects, after payment of legal, funeral & certain foreign shipment expenses (as directed) to the following legatees, viz.:"

Then followed a statement of devises and bequests to divers persons. It ended as follows:

"Whereunto I hereby set my hand this fourteenth day of January, 1914."

The name of the decedent does not appear in or on the paper anywhere, except in the opening clause as above shown. This document was folded by the decedent and placed in an envelope, which was then sealed and indorsed by the decedent, in her own handwriting, with the words, "My Will, Ida Matilda Manchester." In that condition it was, by her direction, placed in her safe deposit box, where it was found after her death. These are all the facts bearing upon the question of its execution as a will.

"An olographic will is one that is entirely written, dated, and signed by the hand of the testator himself. It is subject [419] to no other form, and may be made in or out of this state, and need not be witnessed." (Civ. Code, sec. 1277.)

The will in question fits this description in all respects except the signing thereof. It was not "signed" according to the meaning of that word in ordinary usage. To sign, as applied to a document, is defined as follows: "To affix a signature thereto; to ratify by hand or seal; to subscribe in one's own handwriting." (Webster's Dictionary.) Unquestionably, as used in the above-quoted section, it means the signature of the testator in his own handwriting written somewhere in or upon the document, with the intention by so writing it to authenticate the document. The name written at another place than the end of the document, and not for the purpose of authenticating it and indicating its completion, but merely to identify the person who is making the will, cannot be deemed to be a name "signed" to the document, unless that word is given a meaning entirely different from that which it is generally understood to have. (7 Words & Phrases, p. 6508.) The Civil Code itself provides that words "are construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language." (Civ. Code, sec. 13.) If this be done, a document in which the name of the person making it appears only in the beginning thereof, and by way of recital to designate that person as the maker, in the manner above shown, cannot be said to have been signed by the maker. (In re Walker, 110 Cal. 393, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104, 30 L.R.A. 460, 42 Pac. 815.) We have here the additional indication of lack of that completion essential to a will in the closing words, "whereunto I hereby set my hand this," etc. These are apt words to precede a signature in attestation of a will or deed, and they tend to show that the decedent intended to sign immediately below, but failed to carry out that intention.

The defect is not cured by the words "My Will" indorsed on the envelope and signed by the decedent. The manifest purpose of that indorsement was to state that the paper within the sealed envelope was the will of Ida Matilda Manchester. It shows that the decedent believed that the inclosed document was her will, and indicates that she believed that it was lawfully executed and valid. But her belief that it was a valid will, properly executed, does not make it so. The power [420] to dispose of one's property by will and the mode by which it may be exercised are matters under legislative control, and the mode prescribed by the statute must be followed, or there is no will. "For the purpose of determining whether a will had been properly executed, the intention of the testator in executing it is entitled to no consideration. For that purpose the court can consider only the intention of the legislature as expressed in the language of the statute, and whether the will as presented shows a compliance with the statute." (In re Seaman, 146 Cal. 460, 106 Am. St. Rep. 53, 2 Ann. Cas. 726, 80 Pac. 701; In re Walker, 110 Cal. 391, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104, 30 L.R.A. 460, 42 Pac. 815.) If the decedent had used a printed form of will, filled the blank spaces as she desired, and had duly signed it, without attesting witnesses, the document would show her testamentary intentions as satisfactorily as the document she here prepared, but it would not have been a valid will. (Billings's Estate, 64 Cal. 427, 1 Pac. 701.) The act of signing is essential. An intention proven by other means will not serve the purpose.

There is no force in the argument that the indorsement on the envelope can be treated as a part of the document inclosed, as if it were an additional page attached thereto to give room for the signature. The circumstances are utterly inconsistent with the idea that the indorsement was made for any such purpose. They show that it constituted no part of the paper designated as "My Will" within the sealed envelope. (Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 6 L.R.A. 775, 10 S. E. 843.)

It is claimed that the decisions in Stratton's Estate, 112 Cal. 513, 44 Pac. 1028, and In re Camp, 184 Cal. 233, 66 Pac. 227, are opposed to the foregoing conclusions. In Estate of Stratton the olographic will was duly signed at the end, but below the signature were the words, "My husband Thomas Stratton." Discussing the effect of these words as part of the document, the court held that they were intended to name the husband as a legatee; that they were merely displaced by the testator, and should be read as though written at the beginning or end of the last clause, in which the legatee was designated only by the pronoun "he." In this discussion the court said: "The statute does not require that an olographic will shall be 'subscribed by the testator at the end thereof.' It is sufficient that it be 'signed' by him and this signing may be at the beginning or in any part of the document," [421] citing In re Walker, 110 Cal. 391, 52 Am. St. Rep. 104, 30 L.R.A. 460, 42 Pac. 815.

In the case of In re Camp, proof that the final clause of an olographic will, including the signature of the testator at the end thereof, had been torn off and destroyed after the testator's death was duly made by two credible witnesses, as required by section 1339 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and this was held to be sufficient proof of the authenticity of the will. The initial clause also contained the name of the testator. The court said that this also established the fact that the document was intended by him to be his last will, and that "the writing by him of his name in that clause was itself a sufficient signature."

The declarations in these cases are entirely consistent with the rule stated in In re Walker, that "To sign an instrument or document is to make any mark upon it in token of knowledge, approval, acceptance, or obligation. The signature is the sign thus made." In neither of them was there any discussion, or need of discussion, as to the kind of proof permissible to establish the fact that the signature appearing in an olographic will, though not at the usual place at the end of the document, was nevertheless intended as a signature in execution thereof. They do not in the least control our decision of this question. The true rule, as we conceive it to be, is that, wherever placed, the fact that it was intended as an executing signature must satisfactorily appear on the face of the document itself. If it is at the end of the document, the universal custom of mankind forces the conclusion that it was appended as an execution, if nothing to the contrary appears. If placed elsewhere, it is for the court to say, from an inspection of the whole document, its language as well as its form, and the relative position of its parts, whether or not there is a positive and satisfactory inference from the document itself that the signature was so placed with the intent that it should there serve as a token of execution. If such inference thus appears, the execution may be considered as proven by such signature.

This rule has the support of the better reasoned decisions of other jurisdictions. Thus, in Waller v. Waller, 1 Grat. (Va.) 454, 42 Am. Dec. 564, where the subject is elaborately discussed, the court says that the signing of the will is required as proof "that the act is a complete, concluded act," [422] and that "the signing must be such as upon the face and from the frame of the instrument appears to have been intended to give it authenticity. It must appear that the name so written was regarded as a signature, that the instrument was regarded as complete without further signature and the paper itself must show this." In Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 6 L.R.A. 775, 10 S. E. 843, the will began as follows: "I, Abraham Warwick, declare this to be my last will and testament," but the testator's name did not occur elsewhere in the will, and there was no declaration in the document that the signature at the beginning was written for the purpose of authentication or execution. The court held that the signature was not "affixed in such a manner as to make it manifest that the name was intended as a signature." To the same effect are Catlett v. Catlett, 55 Mo. 339; Crutcher v. Crutcher, 11 Humph. (Tenn.) 384; Armant's Succession, 43 La. Ann. 310, 26 Am. St. Rep. 183, 9 So. 50; In re Tyrrel, 17 Ariz. 418, 153 Pac. 767; French v. French, 14 W. Va. 479. And in the recent decision in In re Dombrowski, 163 Cal. 295, 125 Pac. 235, we said: "No doubt a subscription or signing of any kind will not constitute a valid execution of a will unless made with the intention, on the part of the testator, of finally and completely authenticating the will." This was said of an attested will, but that it was not supposed to state a rule confined to attested wills is shown by the fact that Waller v. Waller, 1 Grat. (Va.) 454, 42 Am. Dec. 564, is cited as an application of it.

The few decisions to the effect that where the name of the testator appears only in the initial clause of an olographic will, the will may be considered as "signed" within the meaning of statutes similar to ours, are all based on the supposed authority of the English case of Lemayne v. Stanley, 3 Lev. 1, 83 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 545, decided in 1681. The will there considered was an attested will. The subsequent cases following it take it as absolute authority, and do not properly distinguish or limit the scope of its language. The case has been criticised in England and limited strictly to cases where witnesses saw the will written or where it was subsequently acknowledged before them. (Morison v. Turnour, 18 Ves. Jr. 175, 34 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 284; Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. Jr. 234, 32 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 598.) To overcome its effect in [423] England the statutes of 1 Vict. 15 Vict. and 16 Vict. were enacted, changing the law so as to require that "all wills be signed at the end thereof." In view of this consequence of that decision, it is obvious that its authority should not be considered as controlling. The rule we have stated is, in our judgment, supported by sounder reasons and is less likely to produce evil results.

Our conclusion is that the document in question was not signed by the testator, as required by section 1277, and that it is not entitled to probate.

The order is reversed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that an instrument in testamentary form in which the name of the maker appears only in the body is not "signed" within the meaning of a statute relating to holographic wills unless it appears that the name was so inserted for the purpose and with the intent of authenticating the instrument. Applying that rule, it is held that the inference of the requisite intent is prevented by the fact that the instrument concludes "whereunto I hereby set my hand," etc., no signature following those words. It is well established that in the absence of a statute requiring a signature at the end, the name of the testator written by him in the body of the will is sufficient if the intent thereby to authenticate the will appears. See the note to Armstrong v. Walton, Ann. Cas. 1916E 137. That the court did not intend in the reported case to depart from that doctrine is shown by a decision rendered on the following day (In re Estate of McMahon, 174 Cal. 423, 163 Pac. 669, L.R.A.1917D 778) sustaining as a holographic will an instrument not subscribed at the end but introduced by the words "This is the last will and testament of Elizabeth R. McMahon." The decision in the reported case apparently rests, therefore, on the view that the final clause of the instrument there under consideration indicated an intent that it should be further signed. The further holding in the reported case that the signing was not aided by the inclosure of the instrument in an envelope indorsed "My will" with the signature of the alleged testatrix is apparently opposed to the cases of Alexander v. Johnston, 171 N. C. 468, 88 S. E. 785, and Warwick v. Warwick, 86 Va. 596, 10 S. E. 843, 6 L.R.A. 775, cited in the note heretofore referred to.

v.

NATIONAL LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY ET AL.

Iowa Supreme Court—May 15, 1916.

176 Iowa 362; 157 N. W. 929.

Corporations — Directors — Relation to Stockholders.

The officers and directors of a corporation are trustees of the stockholders in many respects, as in the transaction of the business and care of the property of the corporation.

Fraud — What Constitutes Fiduciary Relation.

Wherever special confidence is reposed by reason of blood, business, friendship or association, by one person in another who is in a position to have and exercise or does exercise and have influence over each other, a fiduciary relation may exist.

Effect of Fiduciary Relation — Burden of Proof as to Transaction.

Whenever the relations between the contracting parties are such as to render it certain that they do not deal on terms of equality, but that either, on the one side, from superior knowledge of the matter derived from a fiduciary relation or from overmastering influence, or, on the other, from dependence, or a trust justifiably reposed, unfair advantage in a transaction is rendered probable, the transaction is presumed void, and the burden shifts to the stronger party to show affirmatively that no deception was practiced and no undue influence used.

Corporations — Relation of Stockholders to Corporation.

The stockholders of a corporation have no legal title to property, which is owned by the entity known as the corporation, but their shares represent integral parts of the whole, and proportional shares of the dividends declared or to be declared, and of net assets upon dissolution.

[See 7 R. C. L. tit. Corporations, p. 25.]Same.

A corporation itself is a legal personality holding the full title, legal and equitable, to all corporate property.

Fiduciary Relation of Director and Stockholder — Purchase of Stock by Director.

Any contract whereby corporate directors acquire profit to the shareholder's detriment, casts upon them the burden of affirmatively showing that the contract was fairly procured for value, or, if for less than value, upon full disclosure of all facts known to the director and unknown to the shareholder.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Plaintiff, the holder of shares of stock in a life insurance company having a book value of about $130 each, but which had sold as high as $150, and who sold them for around $200 a share to the vice-president and secretary of the company, acting with the president and others, owning a majority of its stock, in transferring or reinsuring its risks at a value giving them about $1,000 a share, and certain payments and preferences for such service, and who had not been informed as to the true condition of the company or the value of its assets, may maintain an action against such officers for fraud, and recover the full value of his stock, without reference to the price agreed upon at the time of the sale.

Appeal from District Court, Polk county:
AYRES, Judge.

Action by E. J. Dawson, plaintiff, against National Life Insurance Company et al., defendants. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Casper Schenk for appellant.

Maurice E. Locke, Cummins, Hume & Bradshaw and J. B. Weaver, Jr., for appellees.

[363] LADD, J.—The Des Moines Life Insurance Company was organized on the mutual plan about 1885, and so continued under various forms of organization until about January 1, 1908, when it was incorporated under the laws of Iowa as a legal reserve life insurance company, with a capital stock of $100,000 divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $100 each. Its business expanded so that, in the fall of 1911, nearly $30,000,000 of insurance [364] was in force. The health of its president, C. E. Rawson, failed, and the burden of managing the company devolved largely on his wife, L. C. Rawson, and son-in-law, Wilmot A. Harbach, who had been vice-president and secretary respectively since the reorganization. Rawson owned 251 shares of stock; Mrs. Rawson, 250 shares; their son Homer, 1 share; and Harbach, 50 shares. The remaining 448 shares were widely distributed; for in reorganizing, any policyholder was permitted to subscribe for a limited number, and in that way, plaintiff, who was the company's chief bookkeeper, acquired 3 shares. The book value of these shares was about $130 each at the time in question, but shares had been sold for as much as $150 each. A surplus of $350,000 not assigned to policyholders had accumulated, and, according to the evidence, the value of the insurance outstanding for the purpose of transferring to another company was about $15 per $1,000 of stipulated indemnities, or altogether, about $450,000. This, of course, included the transfer of agencies, in so far as possible, and other incidental advantages. Manifestly, the management had been efficient, and there was room for a finding that the actual value of the stock was much more than either the book value or prices at which previously sold, or $200 per share paid plaintiff by defendant Harbach on December 8, 1911, especially if disposed of for the purpose of effecting reinsurance. During the time in question, the National Life Insurance Company of the United States was a corporation organized under the laws of Illinois, with a capital of $500,000, divided into shares of $100 each, of which Albert M. Johnson owned 3,420; his wife, 1,050; Robert D. Lay, 500; and Robert E. Sackett, 30. Johnson was president, and Lay, secretary, both being directors. Since January 23, 1912, W. A. Harbach has been in the employ of that company in the agency department, at a salary of $12,000 per annum. For more than a year, Johnson had been negotiating in behalf of his company, either directly with Mrs. Rawson or, through Harbach, with Mr. and Mrs. Rawson, for the purchase of the stock of [365] the Des Moines company, with the well-understood purpose of reinsuring its risks in the National Life Insurance Company and taking over its assets. These negotiations culminated in an option, November 29, 1911, in the words following:

"For and in consideration of one dollar and other good and valuable considerations in hand paid to C. E. Rawson and L. C. Rawson by A. M. Johnson, receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said C. E. Rawson and L. C. Rawson hereby agree to sell and the said A. M. Johnson hereby agrees to buy on or before February 28, 1912, 502 shares of the capital stock of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company for the sum of $500,000, to be paid as mutually agreed to.

"If either party fails to perform their part to this agreement they shall pay to the other the sum of $5,000 as liquidated damages.

"In witness whereof the parties hereto have set their hands and seals this 29th day of November, A. D. 1911.

"C. E. Rawson (Seal)

"L. C. Rawson (Seal)

"A. M. Johnson (Seal)"

At the time this was signed, the parties thereto, with Harbach, arranged that Johnson should acquire the remainder of the stock, or substantially all of it, at not to exceed $200 per share, and that Harbach should purchase the stock for Johnson. On December 1st following, the latter addressed a letter to Harbach, saying that his 50 shares of stock would be purchased for the sum of $10,000, to be paid when the shares of Mr. and Mrs. Rawson were finally acquired, and on the following day placed in Harbach hands $80,000 out of which to obtain the remaining 448 shares of stock. Harbach acknowledged this and outlined a plan under which the name of the purchaser would be concealed. On December 16th, Harbach was paid for his stock, and on the 23d, Johnson advised Harbach:

[366] "That, upon the consolidation or reinsurance of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company by the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, you will be placed upon the pay roll of the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America for a term of three years, at a salary of $12,000 per year, payable monthly.

"For your services in assisting me in purchasing the capital stock of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company, and for other services in connection with the possible consolidation or reinsurance of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company by the National Life Insurance Company of the United States of America, you are to receive the sum of $40,000, upon terms of payment to be agreed upon between us, at the same time the stock of C. E. and L. C. Rawson is purchased and paid for."

This latter would make the price of Harbach's stock a little higher than that to be paid the Rawsons. The plan doubtless was adopted because of Harbach's agency in buying the minority of shares. He had bought for Johnson all but 14 of these shares at an average price of something less than $200 per share. On January 23, 1912, the Des Moines Life Insurance Company and the National Life Insurance Company entered into a contract, by the terms of which the former undertook to transfer to the latter all of its assets and business; and the National Life Insurance Company, in consideration thereof, agreed to save the Des Moines Life Insurance Company harmless, to assume all its obligations on outstanding policies, to maintain the necessary legal reserves, make necessary reports, and to enter into direct individual supplementary contracts to this effect with the policy holders of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company, and further, to "pay the Des Moines Life Insurance Company $700,000—$300,000 on the taking effect of the agreement, and $400,000 in five annual instalments of $80,000 each." This plan was approved by the state reinsurance commission, consisting of the governor, auditor of state and attorney general. The contract was performed, and thereafter the Rawsons were [367] paid $500,000 in money or legal obligations to pay for their 502 shares of stock, or nearly $1,000 per share, and Harbach, $40,000 for his services rendered Johnson in consummating the deal; and also he was taken into the employment of the National Life Insurance Company at the salary agreed upon, more than double that paid him by the Des Moines Life Insurance Company. The evidence was such that the jury might have found that, though the president of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company was enjoying a salary of $10,000 per year, the vice-president, a salary of $6,000, and the secretary, a salary of $5,000, they had negotiated, for nearly a year, without the knowledge of other stockholders, with Johnson as president of the National Life Insurance Company with the distinct purpose of effecting, directly or indirectly, the transfer to his company of all the assets and risks of the Des Moines Life Insurance Company, and thereby terminating its existence. Until Johnson, in pursuance of the plan agreed upon, had acquired substantially all the shares of the minority stockholders, he humored Mrs. Rawson's sentiment against participating in the actual transfer of the assets and reinsuring the risks; but thereafter he insisted that this be done as a condition precedent to buying the Rawsons' stock, and she finally acquiesced, and the deal as contemplated from the outset was consummated. According to Johnson's testimony, the completion of the deal depended upon obtaining substantially all the shares of the minority stockholders. The jury might well have found, but for the withdrawal of the issue, that the negotiations from the beginning were to acquire all the company's property; that the scheme of buying the stock was merely a means of accomplishing this; and that these directors and officers, knowing that Johnson was ready and willing to pay approximately $700,000 therefor, secretly connived with him to so effect the transfer that the Rawsons and Harbach might receive an unfair portion of the proceeds of the sale,—that is, $550,000 for their 552 shares of stock, or nearly $1,000 per share,—while those owning the 448 shares should have less [368] than $100,000, leaving the balance for the added expenses of perpetrating the deal in this fashion.

Appellant requested the court to instruct the jury in the language following:

"You are instructed that a director and managing officer of a corporation doing business as a life insurance company stands in a relation of a fiduciary to all the stockholders who are not themselves engaged in the active management of the company, and before any such director and officer of the company, who is acquainted with its conditions and affairs, can rightfully purchase the stock of such company from stockholders who are not actively engaged in the management and operation of the corporation, such managing officer and director must inform such stockholders of the true condition of the company and its affairs and assets, and must give to such stockholders all the information affecting the value of the stock which such officer himself possesses; and a purchase from a stockholder who is not acquainted with the condition and affairs of the company of his stock in such company, by one of the directors and managing officers, without first having informed such stockholder of the true condition of the company, and value of its assets, is a fraud on the part of such officer and director, and renders him or her liable to pay the stockholders the full value of the stock without reference to the price agreed on at the time of the sale, provided the stockholder does not himself know the value of the stock."

This was refused and the jury told that:

"Neither the defendant W. A. Harbach nor the defendant L. C. Rawson were bound, because of their official position with the Des Moines Life Insurance Company, . . . to make any disclosures as to the reinsurance or merger of said company."

And to this plaintiff excepted. That both had knowledge of facts materially affecting the value of the shares of its capital stock not possessed by other shareholders is not questioned, and whether the instruction was correct necessarily [369] depends on the nature of the relation sustained by the defendants named as directors and secretary and vice-president, to the shareholders as such. If the relation was fiduciary in character with respect to the interests of the shareholders represented by their shares of stock in the company, then they owed the duty, before assisting Johnson in purchasing, to disclose everything bearing on their value coming to their knowledge as officers of the company. If no such relation existed, then they might deal with them severally, precisely as a stranger to the organization might, even to the extent of intentionally helping others to buy their stock at a mere fraction of its actual value. The authorities are agreed that the officers and directors of a company are trustees of the stockholders in many respects, as in the transaction of the business and care of property of the corporation, but there is a conflict as to whether any fiduciary relation exists between them concerning the shares of capital stock. One line of cases, while recognizing that the directors and managing officers are trustees for the shareholders in some respects, limit these strictly to matters appertaining to the management of corporate affairs, and say that dealing with the individual shareholder concerning his shares of capital stock is not within the scope of the trust relation, and that, as director or officer, he is charged with no duty to the stockholder with reference to his shares; in other words, the matter of buying from or selling to the stockholder capital stock in the corporation is wholly without the scope of his agency as director or managing officer thereof. Tippecanoe County v. Reynolds, 44 Ind. 509, 15 Am. Rep. 245; Carpenter v. Danforth, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 581; Deaderick v. Wilson, 8 Baxt. (Tenn.) 108. Other decisions merely restate this conclusion and cite the above cases, especially the first two, as establishing it, and many textbooks do likewise. See O'Neile v. Ternes, 32 Wash. 528, 73 Pac. 692; Haarstick v. Fox, 9 Utah 110, 33 Pac. 251; Crowell v. Jackson, 53 N. J. L. 656, 23 Atl. [370] 426; Walsh v. Goulden, 130 Mich. 531, 90 N. W. 406; Hooker v. Midland Steel Co. 215 Ill. 444, 74 N. E. 445, 106 Am. St. Rep. 170; Bawden v. Taylor, 254 Ill.

464, 98 N. E. 941; Grant v. Attrill, 11 Fed. 469; Gillett v. Bowen, 23 Fed. 625; Haverland v. Lane, 89 Wash. 557, 154 Pac. 1118; 1 Cook on Corp. (7th ed.) § 320; 2 Machem on Corp. § 1637; Bower on Actionable Non-Disclosure, §§ 138, 308; Cooley on Torts (3d ed.) p. 991. In Smith v. Hurd, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 371, 46 Am. Dec. 690, Chief Justice Shaw, in holding that an individual stockholder might not maintain an action against the directors of a corporation for damages consequent upon negligence and malfeasance in what they did as such, resulting in loss and waste of its capital, observed:

"There is no legal privity, relation or immediate connection between the holders of shares in a bank in their individual capacity, on the one side, and the directors of the bank on the other. The directors are not the bailees, the factors, agents or trustees of such individual stockholders."

And it was decided that such an action might be maintained by the corporation only. On the principle thus stated, the above decisions seem to be founded, as will best appear from excerpts from the leading cases. In Carpenter v. Danforth, supra, Sutherland, J., in the course of the opinion, said:

"There was certainly a trust relation between the plaintiff as the holder of, or as the person having the legal title to, the shares of stock, and the defendant, Danforth, as a trustee or director. A corporation aggregate can only act by agents. Its trustees or directors are its agents for managing its affairs. They are such agents, viewing the corporation either in the abstract, as an immaterial thing, of legislative creation, with a name and certain powers and rights given by law, or as composed of its corporators, or shareholders, having the right to share pro rata in its dividends. There is, therefore, a certain trust relation between the shareholders and the directors of a corporation; but the trust put in the directors usually extends, and I must assume that in this case it extended only to the [371] management of the general affairs of the corporation, with a view to dividends of profits; and, therefore, that the trust relation between the plaintiff and the defendant Danforth extended no farther. The title to the property of a corporation is in neither the directors nor shareholders. It is in the corporation as an abstract, immaterial thing of legal creation. The directors are not trustees for the sale of the stock of the corporation. They have no power, as directors, to sell stock; they have no power to sell any stock but their own. The defendant Danforth was not a trustee for the sale of the plaintiff's stock. The plaintiff's stock was not the subject of trust between them, nor had the trust relation between them any connection with the plaintiff's stock, except so far as the good or bad management of the general affairs of a corporation by its directors, indirectly affects the value of its stock. In Knight v. Marjoribanks, 2 Macn. & G. (Eng.) 10, it was held, 'that the circumstance, that two parties stand towards each other in the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, does not affect any dealings between them, unconnected with the subject of the trust.' I think it will be found, in most of the cases referred to by the counsel, that it appeared, or that it was assumed, that the trust, or trust relation, extended to the subject of the dealing, or contract in question. . . . The counsel does not say, and he could not say, that the strict or technical relation of trustee and cestui que trust exists between the director and shareholder, for the legal title to the corporate property is not in the directors; but he insists that the trust relation which does exist between them, as to the management of the affairs of the corporation, compels the director, on a purchase of stock, to disclose all the facts within his knowledge, material on the question of value, not known to the seller—that this disclosure is a duty arising from the trust relation, independent of the question of positive or actual fraud; in other words, that the trust or trust relation, for or as to the management, subjects the director to the rule or principle of equity which has been so often referred to. I [372] think that the sale or transaction, or its subject, is not so far connected with, or the subject of the trust, or trust relation which is admitted to exist, as to subject the director to, or give the seller the benefit of, the principle of equity, or to make the principle reasonably applicable to the transaction. It will not do to make the principle generally applicable to purchases by directors of the stock of their corporations. As to stocks which have a regularly quoted price or market value, parties generally sell and buy them, with reference to this price or value, rather than with reference to their real value, or any opinion of their real value, founded on a knowledge or supposed knowledge of the condition of the corporations or of their affairs. As to such stock, would it do to make the purchase of it by a director, though it happened to be the stock of his own corporation, an exception, and to say that the parties dealt with reference to the real condition of the corporation and the supposed real value of the stock, founded on a knowledge or supposed knowledge of its affairs? Plainly it would not; and plainly in such case, the application of the principle of equity would be unreasonable. But the duty arising from the mere trust relation must be the same, in all cases where the same trust relation exists; for courts of equity, though they deal with special cases, apply general principles. My conclusion is, then, that this case is not a case of constructive fraud—that there was not any such trust or confidential relation between the plaintiff and Danforth as to make the principle of equity, which has been referred to, reasonably applicable to the case."

In Tippecanoe County v. Reynolds, supra, the court, after the statement of facts, proceeded:

"Was the defendant, in consequence of being a director and the president of the company, a trustee of the plaintiff as a stockholder, whereby it became his duty, as a purchaser of the stock, to pay a fair and adequate price for it, to take no advantage of the relation which he bore to the company or the knowledge acquired thereby, and to disclose to the plaintiff [373] all the material facts within his knowledge? . . . We are of opinion, upon an examination of such authorities as have been brought to our notice, upon the point, that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not exist in such case. It is said very frequently in the books that the directors of a corporation are trustees of the stockholders, and that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, with its consequences, exists between them. But these expressions must always be understood to have relation to the cases to which they are applied, and not to be of universal application. It may be conceded that, in respect to the property of the corporation, whether it be land, money, securities, capital stock, or other property held by the corporation, and the management of its business, the directors are trustees for the stockholders. The action of the directors in respect to the property of the corporation must affect, to a greater or less degree, the stockholders generally. It has been generally in such cases, or where the action of the directors has affected the whole body of stockholders, that the relation of trustee and cestui que trust has been held to exist. . . . It seems to us, however, keeping in view the current of authorities, that notwithstanding the general language employed in the above cases, for some purposes, the directors of a corporation stand in a relation similar to that of trustees for the shareholders. This seems to be the case in reference to the management, by the directors, of the property and general affairs of the corporation. These are matters usually entrusted to the directors, and in respect to which they are empowered to act; and their action affects the whole body of shareholders, beneficially or injuriously, in respect to dividends upon, or the value of, their stock. But stock in a corporation held by an individual is his own private property, which he may sell or dispose of as he sees proper, and over which neither the corporation nor its officers have any control. It is the subject of daily commerce, and is bought and sold in market like any other marketable commodity. The directors have no control or dominion over it whatever, or [374] duty to discharge in reference to its sale and transfer, unless it be to see that proper books and facilities are furnished for that purpose. As the property of the individual holder, he holds it as free from the dominion and control of the directors as he does his lands or other property. . . . Such being the nature of the interest of the stockholder in his stock, and the directors having no control, power, or dominion over it, or duty to discharge in reference to it, beyond the duty devolving upon them to prudently manage the affairs and property of the corporation itself, it seems to us to be very clear, that, in the purchase of stock by a director from the holder, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust does not exist between them."

In several of the cases cited, the decision may be put on other grounds, but in each is to be found the approval of the ruling in cases from which we have quoted. The consequences were such that their correctness was immediately challenged. In Tipppecanoe County v. Reynolds, supra, Downey, C.J., in dissenting denounced the contract upheld by the majority "as hard, unconscionable and fraudulent" and was of opinion that an actual fraud had been perpetrated and that the president of the corporation "occupied a relation of trust and confidence toward the county (owner of shares bought) which, under the circumstances disclosed, made him guilty of constructive fraud." As often declared, law is not alone the product of abstract reasoning, but of experience as well. It is the outcome of logic of the mind confirmed by the logic of events. The consequences of the application of a rule often furnish the most potent argument in its support or are most persuasive in its condemnation. Some of the cases disclose unconscionable advantages as the reward for the suppression of truth. Thus, in Tipppecanoe County v. Reynolds, supra, the president of a railroad company bought 570 shares of its stock through agents for $25,650, when these were actually worth $342,000. In Carpenter v. Danforth, supra, a director of a company, under the guise of friendship [375] for the family, bought of the executor of a deceased stockholder shares at $60 each, on which a dividend of 310 per cent was declared within five months, and another of 200 per cent, eight months later. In other words, with the information which he had acquired as officer of the corporation, and which he knew the executor did not possess, he pocketed $195 a share, or $26,520, which in all fairness belonged to the estate of his deceased friend. The possibility of so dealing with corporate stock has proven a strong temptation to dishonest management of the business of corporations, and in instances without number has enabled the managing officers to reap the profits legitimately belonging to the shareholders. The rule has operated as a shield for those who obtain control of corporate affairs, not to carry out the purposes of the organization, but to profit from the manipulation of its affairs, enabling them, by artificially increasing or depressing the market value of its stock, to take advantage of the confidence of their unsuspecting associates. There is something wrong in any rule which will enable a director legally by his position to obtain for himself alone profits all have won.

No stockholder would urge his choice as director that he might have such an opportunity. That a director or managing officer might thus serve his selfish purposes to the detriment of stockholders would tend strongly to discourage stock investments and be a menace to the efficient management of the business of corporations. The debate as to whether technically a fiduciary relation exists may and doubtless will go on, but a knowledge of the law is not required to enable one to appreciate the moral wrong perpetrated by a corporate officer in profiting by the ignorance of a stockholder by means of knowledge acquired by virtue of his position. That stockholders look to the managing officers for results, no one questions, and the natural tendency of stockholders is to rely on being fairly and openly dealt with by such officers. It is often difficult to draw precisely the line separating intimate from hostile relations. Surely the test is not alone whether one is [376] trustee for the other. The attorney is not ordinarily a trustee for his client, nor the priest for his parishioner, nor the agent for his principal, and yet the several relations are of the highest confidence, and impose the obligation of open dealing. The very selection for service is an expression of confidence, and the employment, the bestowal of power. The shareholder selects the director to serve him in caring for the corporate property. Upon his efficiency largely depends the value of the investment in its capital stock. Is he not thereby expressing his confidence? Is his faith in the man chosen to manage its affairs any less because of the corporation's being a separate and independent entity? The ordinary stockholder gives little or no attention to the details or control of corporate affairs. He trusts all with the managing officers, and naturally relies on them in all matters touching his interest in its business and property. Stockholders, other than directors and officers, stand on an equal footing and deal with each other at arm's length. No power with respect to the corporate property has been conferred on one not possessed by the other. But power akin to that of an attorney, priest, agent or copartner is conferred on the directors and officers by those selecting them to manage corporate affairs. Not that they have control of the shares of the stockholders, but for that they do control nearly everything affecting their value. The fiduciary obligation is to the stockholders in a body. Why not to the component parts represented by the shares? The relative position is such as to inspire confidence, and experience has frequently demonstrated that it actually exists. Why should the law say, then, that it does not, for that one is not the trustee for the other, when this is not a requisite in other relations?

The fiduciary relation may exist wherever special confidence is reposed, whether the relationship be that of blood, business, friendship or association, by one person in another when they are in a position to have and exercise or do have and exercise influence over each other. Curtis v. Armagast, [377] 158 Ia. 507, 138 N. W. 873. The rule is well stated in Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 91, 99, 31 Am. Rep. 428:

"Whenever, however, the relations between the contracting parties appear to be of such a character as to render it certain that they do not deal on terms of equality, but that, either on the one side from superior knowledge of the matter derived from a fiduciary relation, or from overmastering influence, or, on the other, from weakness, dependence, or trust justifiably reposed, unfair advantage in a transaction is rendered probable, there the burden is shifted, the transaction is presumed void, and it is incumbent upon the stronger party to show affirmatively that no deception was practiced, no undue influence was used, and that all was fair, open, voluntary, and well understood."

The officers of a corporation, by virtue of their position as trustees of the entire body of shareholders, acquire superior knowledge of the company's affairs bearing on the values of the shares of stock, and as a consequence thereof deal with a mere stockholder on unequal terms, in reference to said shares, and, owing to their superior knowledge and the natural reliance of the shareholders on their officers, are in a situation to exercise an influence that they could not otherwise exert. Though the stockholders have no legal title to the property, it being owned by the invisible intangible entity known as the corporation, their shares represent integral parts of the whole, the proportional shares of the dividend declared or to be declared, and of the net assets upon dissolution. Necessarily every detriment or disadvantage to the property or business affects proportionately the several shares of stock, for they represent parts of the entity. To say, then, that a director, as such, owes nothing to the shareholders, as such, is in effect declaring that, though acting as trustee of the entity, he is under no obligation with respect to its component parts. In his capacity as director, he served the entire body of stockholders, and in doing so he cannot well escape serving the individual [378] stockholder as well. The stockholders elect him to represent them in managing the corporation's affairs. This is because it is impracticable for them to administer such affairs directly. As a director for all, he serves each as well. Surely, as a servant of all, he necessarily is incapacitated to oppose the stockholders severally. Undoubtedly, he is not a trustee of the stockholder in the strict sense, for he does not have title to the latter's stock. His relation is that often denominated quasi trustee. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) Vol. 3, § 1090, clearly analyzes the relation of the directors of a corporation with it and the stockholders:

"The trust character of directors is involved in the very organization of a corporation, and is necessarily twofold—towards the corporation, and towards the stockholders. The doctrines are fundamental and familiar that the corporation itself is a legal personality, and holds the full title, legal and equitable, to all corporate property. Stockholders, individually and separately, hold the full title, legal and equitable, to their respective shares of stock. A stockholder does not, by virtue of his stock, acquire any estate, legal or equitable, in the corporate property; he obtains only a right to participate in the lawful dividends while the corporation is in being, and to his proportionate share of the net assets upon its dissolution and final settlement. Shares of stock, however, are regarded by courts of law and of equity as a species of property, as vendible in the market, as having a pecuniary value, and as clothing their owner with proprietary rights which will be protected and enforced. From this analysis it is obvious that, so far as the trust embraces or is concerned with the corporate property, the directors and managing officers occupy the position of quasi trustees towards the corporation only; there is no relation of beneficiary and trustee, having the corporate property for its subject-matter, between the stockholders and the directors. The directors are also agents for the corporation, but that fact does not prevent them from [379] being in a partial sense trustees for the corporation. The important conclusion I repeat, that this phase of their trust is concerned with and confined to the corporate property; from it arise their fiduciary duties towards the corporation in dealing with such property, and the equitable remedies of the corporation for a violation of those duties. On the other hand, the directors and managing officers occupy the position of quasi trustees towards the stockholders alone, and not at all towards the corporation, with respect to their shares of stock. Since the stockholders own these shares, and since the value thereof and all their rights connected therewith are affected by the conduct of the directors, a trust relation plainly exists between the stockholders and the directors, which is concerned with and confined to the shares of stock held by the stockholders; from it arise the fiduciary duties of the directors towards the stockholders in dealings which may affect the equitable remedies for a violation of those duties. To sum up, directors and managing officers, in addition to their functions as mere agents, occupy a double position of partial trust: they are quasi or sub modo trustees for the stockholders with respect to their shares of the stock."

The subject is so fully discussed in Oliver v. Oliver, 118 Ga. 362, 45 S. E. 232, as to leave little to be added. There the petitioners were owners of 658 shares of stock in an oil company, to purchase which at $110 each, defendant, who was president and director, obtained an option. He was then negotiating a sale of the plant for $304,500, which would be $185 per share, but concealed this from the petitioners; and, as soon as the sale of the plant was agreed to, closed the option and completed the sale, realizing a profit of $49,250. A demurrer to a complaint so alleging and praying to recover such amount because of constructive fraud in not disclosing the facts concerning the prospective sale of plaintiffs was overruled, and the court, speaking through the late Mr. Justice Lamar, said:

"The fact that he is trustee for all is not to be perverted [380] into holding that he is under no obligation to each. The fact that he must serve the company does not warrant him in becoming the active and successful opponent of an individual stockholder with reference to the latter's undivided interest in the very property committed to the director's care. That he is primarily trustee for the corporation is not intended to make the artificial entity a fetic to be worshipped in the sacrifice of those who in the last analysis are the real parties at interest. No process of reasoning and no amount of argument can destroy the fact that the director is, in a most important and legitimate sense, trustee for the stockholder. . . . Not a strict trustee, since he does not hold title to the shares, not even a strict trustee who is practically prohibited from dealing with his cestui que trust, but a quasi trustee as to the shareholder's interest in the shares. If the market or contract price of the stock should be different from the book value, he would be under no legal obligation to call special attention to that fact, for the stockholder is entitled to examine the books, and this source of information, at least theoretically, is equally accessible to both. It might be that the director was in possession of information which his duty to the company required him to keep secret; and, if so, he must not disclose the fact even to the shareholder, for his obligation to the company overrides that to an individual holder of the stock. But if the fact so known to the director cannot be published, it does not follow that he may use it to his own advantage, and to the disadvantage of one whom he also represents. The very fact that he cannot disclose prevents him from dealing with one who does not know, and to whom material information cannot be made known. If, however, the fact within the knowledge of the director is of a character calculated to affect the selling price, and can, without detriment to the interest of the company, be imparted to the shareholder, the director, before he buys, is bound to make a full disclosure. In a certain sense the information is a quasi asset of the company, and the shareholder is as much entitled to [381] the advantage of that sort of an asset as to any other regularly entered on the list of the company's holding. If the officer should purposely conceal from a stockholder information as to the existence of valuable property belonging to the company, and take advantage of this concealment, the sale would necessarily be set aside. The same result would logically follow where the fact giving value to the stock was of a character which could not formally be entered on the record. Where the director obtains the information giving added value to the stock by virtue of his official position, he holds the information in trust for the benefit of those who placed him where this knowledge was obtained, in the well-founded expectation that the same should be used first for the company, and ultimately for those who were the real owners of the company. The director cannot deal on this information to the prejudice of the artificial being which is called the corporation, nor, on any sound principle, can be permitted to act differently towards those who are not artificially but actually interested. . . . If, then, any sort of trustees, they are necessarily subject to the obligations and restrictions which inhere in that relation as to property intrusted to them. The shares are but the paper evidence of the interest which the stockholder has in the property under the control of the director. In their sale, the stockholder disposes not only of the lithographed or engraved scrip, but of his holdings in property. And when the director deals with a stockholder for the purchase of shares, he is not buying paper, but in effect is buying an undivided and substantial interest in property which has been committed to the director's care, custody, and control. Equity abhors mere names, and looks to the substance. Whether the corporation be treated as an enlarged and amplified form of partnership, and the director as managing partner, or whether he is called an agent or trustee, elected by the stockholders to represent them in the management of the concern, he occupies a fiduciary position and is essentially within the rule which requires agents, attorneys, bailees, partners, trustees, or other [382] fiduciaries, to exercise the highest degree of good faith as to all matters connected with the property committed to their care. . . . To say that a director who has been placed where he himself may raise or depress the value of the stock, or in a position where he first knows of facts which may produce that result, may take advantage thereof, and buy from or sell to one whom he is directly representing, without making a full disclosure, and putting the stockholder on an equality of knowledge as to these facts, would offer a premium for faithless silence, and give a reward for the suppression of truth. It would sanction concealment by one who is bound to speak, and permit him to take advantage of his own wrong—a thing abhorrent to a court of conscience. . . . When it is admitted, as it must be, both from the very nature of his duty and from the rulings of nearly all the cases, that he is trustee for the shareholder, how is it possible, in principle, to draw the line and say that, while trustee for some purposes, he is not for others immediately connected therewith? That the incidents of the trust relation stop short at the very point where it is vitally important to the shareholder that they should become active? For it must not be forgotten that the right to good faith in dealings concerning the stock is one of the very few which the individual shareholder is in a position to assert in his own name. Except in a few other instances the company itself is the only proper party to enforce the obligation arising from the trust relation of the director. In contracts with reference to the shares, the stockholder himself can enforce the rights arising from the quasi trust. . . . While not decided, it is in one case suggested that a stockholder, in dealing with a director, should recognize his superior opportunities for knowledge, and be warned thereby to exercise special caution. But the fiduciary relation fully warrants exactly the opposite course. Here, at least, the beneficiary may be off guard, and may rely implicitly not only on what is said, but also on the supposition that nothing important will be left unsaid, by the officer. Having previously [383] trusted the director in the management of the company, he is not required, when selling his shares, suddenly to exhibit entire want of confidence. And directors generally recognize the obligations imposed, and act accordingly. But the peculiar powers and special opportunities of these fiduciaries call for an enlargement rather than a restriction of the rule requiring disclosures. . . . The obligations of his office bring him peculiarly within the general doctrine which declares that concealment of material facts may of itself amount to a fraud where from any reason one has the right to expect full information from another, or where one knows that the other is laboring under a delusion in respect to the property sold, and yet keeps silence. . . . 'A suppression of the truth may amount to a suggestion of falsehood; and if, with intent to deceive, either party to a contract of sale conceals or suppresses a material fact, which he is in good faith bound to disclose, this is evidence of and equivalent to, a false representation.'

In Stewart v. Harris, 69 Kan. 498, 77 Pac. 277, 66 L.R.A. 261, 105 Am. St. Rep. 178, 2 Ann. Cas. 873, the defendant was president and general manager of a bank, and bought 12 shares of stock therein, then worth $350 per share, for $110 per share, without disclosing the improved condition of the bank's affairs. The trial court instructed the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that the president, or other managing officer of a corporation doing business as a bank, stands in relation of a trustee to all the stockholders who are not themselves engaged in the active management of the bank, and before any managing officer of a bank, who is acquainted with its condition and affairs, can rightfully purchase the stock of such bank from stockholders who are not actively engaged in the management and operation of the bank, such managing officer must inform such stockholders of the true condition of the bank and its affairs and assets, and must give to such stockholders all the information affecting the value of the stock which such managing officer himself possesses; and a [384] purchase, from a stockholder who is not acquainted with the condition and affairs of the bank, of his stock in such bank, by one of the managing officers, without first having informed such stockholder of the true condition of the bank and of the amount and value of its assets, is a fraud on the part of such managing officer, and renders him liable to pay the stockholder the full value of the stock, without reference to the price agreed on at the time of the sale, provided the stockholder himself does not know the value of the stock."

This instruction was approved on substantially the grounds stated in the Georgia case from which we have quoted. In following these decisions, Doan, J., tersely states, in Steinfeld v. Nielsen, 12 Ariz. 381, 100 Pac. 1004, what we regard as the law:

"Undoubtedly the law makes it the duty of an officer or director of a company, who is seeking to purchase from a stockholder the latter's holdings of stock, to disclose to the latter facts which have come to him by virtue of his relations to the company, and not known to the stockholder, or which may not be readily ascertained by the stockholder, and to disclose such plans and purposes as the corporation may have for the future which have a bearing upon the value of the stock of the company; but the underlying principle upon which this duty rests is that the officer or director, being the agent of a corporation, and so in a sense the agent of a stockholder, may not take advantage of the knowledge which he thus acquires, and which every member of the corporation is entitled to know, in dealing with such stockholder."

But when the cause was again before it, the court, after the admission of Arizona as a state Steinfeld v. Nielsen, 15 Ariz. 424, 139 Pac. 879, speaking through Ross, J., receded from the former holding, saying that:

"An officer or director may purchase the stock of his company from stockholders with the same freedom as a stranger, and, in so doing, the fact that he may be possessed of inside information as to the future plans and policies of his [385] company is not permitted to militate against him," citing the decisions heretofore mentioned and quoting the following from Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 419, 29 S. Ct. 521, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 853: "The supreme courts of Kansas and of Georgia have held the relationship existed in the cases before those courts because of the special facts which took them out of the general rule, and that under those facts the director could not purchase from the shareholder his shares without informing him of the facts which affected their value."

That the writer of the opinion in Strong's case was mistaken in saying that the decisions were based on special facts which took them out of the general rule clearly appears from our quotation from the Georgia case and the language of the instruction in the Kansas case. The question was left undecided in Strong v. Repide, though the margin of evidence held to discriminate between constructive fraud and active fraud was decidedly narrow, though enough to condemn the conclusions in Tipppecanoe County v. Reynolds, supra, and several other decisions. That court had previously declared its position in Jackson v. Ludeling, 21 Wall. 616, 22 U. S. (L. ed.) 492, which is clearly expressed in the syllabus as follows:

"Managers and officers of a company where capital is contributed in shares are, in a very legitimate sense, trustees alike for its stockholders and its creditors, though they may not be trustees technically and in form. They accordingly have no right to seek their own profit at the expense of the company, its shareholders, or even its bondholders."

The Supreme Court of Nebraska, in Barber v. Martin, 67 Neb. 445, 93 N. W. 722, where a director of an insurance company had bought of a confiding stockholder 18 shares of its capital stock at $50 per share, without informing her of a prospective sale at $115 per share which he made immediately thereafter, held that he was required to pay over the difference, on the principle that:

"The relation between officer and stockholder is that of [386] trustee and cestui que trust. The officer cannot use the confidence reposed in him for personal profit. If his conduct is impeached and brought under review, it will closely scrutinized. The burden was upon Barber to show that he had dealt fairly with the stockholders, and he was inhibited by every rule of equity and fairness from taking to himself the benefit of a transaction, if that benefit was inconsistent with the faithful discharge of his trust."

The High Court of Chancery of England, in Walsham v. Stainton, 1 De Gex J. & S. (Eng.) 678, held that a fiduciary relation existed between the purchasing managers of a company and the shareholders in dealing with the stock of the latter, and that, 38 years after the transaction, the executor of the latter, might recover of the purchasing manager the loss suffered. But in Percival v. Wright [1902] 2 Ch. D. (Eng.) 421, the contrary view was expressed, without referring to the previous decision. This led to the enactment of statutes under which directors are held to be trustees for shareholders, paid for their services rendered, and not permitted to profit in any way by information which comes to them by virtue of their positions. In Gadsden v. Bennetto, 23 Manitoba 33, the court approves Walsham v. Stainton and says that Percival v. Wright should not govern the case. The New York Court of Appeals has not passed upon the question, and a decided tendency to recede from Carpenter v. Danforth, supra, is manifested in the more recent decisions of the Supreme Court. In Stark v. Soule, 45 Hun 588, 9 N. Y. St. Rep. 555, it is said that there is no legal embarrassment in the way of purchasing stock shares by a director from a stockholder, yet because of the superior knowledge of the former, slight circumstances which have the effect of misleading the seller to take less than value might afford ground for redress, and in Von Au v. Magenheimer,

Introductory.

It is the purpose of this note to review the recent cases passing on the purchase of stock by an officer or director as affected by his fiduciary relation to the stockholder. For a discussion of the earlier cases see the notes to Stewart v. Harris, 2 Ann. Cas. 873, and Beach v. Miller, 17 Am. St. Rep. 298.

Majority Rule.

RULE STATED.

While the authorities are agreed that the relation of officers and directors concerning the affairs and care of the property of the corporation is fiduciary in character (see 7 R. C. L. tit. Corporations, p. 456) there is apparently a conflict of opinion as to whether such a relationship exists between them and the individual stockholders. The weight of authority is seemingly in conflict with the reported case and is to the effect that officers and directors do not sustain any fiduciary relation to individual stockholders with respect to their holdings of stock, and may deal with them and purchase their stock practically on the same basis as strangers, and in the absence of actual fraudulent representations or concealment a purchase so effected will not be invalid for a mere failure to disclose any information the directors may have affecting the value of the stock so purchased. Tackey v. McBain [1912] A. C. (Eng.) 186, 106 L. T. N. S. 226, 81 L. J. P. C. 130; Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 431, 29 S. Ct. 521, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 860, 6 Philippine 680; *DuPont v. A director may freely purchase the company's stock and occupies no relation of trust to an individual stockholder which prohibits him using whatever advantage his position may afford him through knowledge of its business and conditions superior to that of the stockholder for gaining information which affects the value of the stock. DuPont v. DuPont, 242 Fed. 98.

While directors occupy a trust relation to the corporation which they direct, their duty does not apply to the stockholders in the sale and purchase of stock. Dealing in its own stock is not a corporate function, and in buying or selling stock directors may trade like any outsider, provided they do not affirmatively act or speak wrongfully, or intentionally conceal facts with reference to it. Shaw v. Cole Mfg. Co. 132 Tenn. 210, 177 S. W. 479, L.R.A. 1916B 706.

In Haverland v. Lane, 89 Wash. 557, 154 Pac. 1118, the court said: "It must be borne in mind that the transaction was a sale of stock from one stockholder to another, the purchaser being an officer of the company. Was there a legal duty upon the defendant to disclose his market? The duty of a stockholder, he being an officer, when purchasing stock from another stockholder, has been defined by this court in O'Neile v. Ternes, 32 Wash. 528, 73 Pac. 692. The court adopted the text of 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d ed.) 898: 'The doctrine that officers and directors are trustees of the stockholders applies only in respect to their acts relating to the property or business of the corporation. It does not extend to their private dealings with stockholders or others, though in such dealings they take advantage of knowledge gained through their official position.' This is the holding of all the courts. Cook, Corporations (7th ed.) sec. 320; Beach, Corporations, secs. 246, 614. It would seem, then, if we grant that defendant was bound to disclose anything that might affect the corporation, that he was under no duty to reveal a contract and a market that was the result of a personal venture. There is nothing in the law that will prevent a stockholder, although he be an officer, from dealing in the shares of the corporation. He may find a market and buy stock to fill it. If his purchaser is willing to pay more than the stock is worth to get control of the company, or for any ulterior purpose, it is of no concern to the seller. If the purchaser is under personal contract to deliver to a third party, he is not bound to disclose his market. If it is for the benefit of the corporation he is . . . In the case at bar, the sale was entirely independent of the corporation. It did not involve its tangible assets in any way or affect their value. The parties dealt face to face. Plaintiffs knew that defendant had been purchasing stock and wanted theirs. They were suspicious of him and voiced their suspicions. They had access to the books of the company. They knew that the company was subject to a receivership if it passed its interest payments. They no doubt entertained a natural belief that others were seeking the property for their own advantage and benefit. Taking their suspicions at their full worth, they amounted to no more than this: they were apprehensive that the sale was for the benefit of some one with means to rejuvenate the Consolidated Company. But that was not enough to defeat the sale if they got a fair price. . . . The defendant was not an agent but a buyer. He bought on the market at the seller's price. The parties dealt at arm's length. The law will presume that defendant bought for an advantage, and under the authority of our own decision in O'Neile v. Ternes, supra, he was not bound to disclose his market and is consequently entitled to the advantage of his trade."

So it was impliedly held in Tackey v. McBain [1912] A. C. (Eng.) 186, 106 L. T. N. S. 226, 81 L. J. P. C. 130, that a director was not bound to disclose private information to a stockholder who sold his stock to the director at a lower price than that at which he would have sold it if he had been in possession of the information which the director had at the time of the sale. It appeared that the defendant who was the managing director of an oil producing company, received information that a "certain well had commenced to produce oil in unprecedented quantities, on the strength of which information he bought additional stock on the market. It was held that an action by a stockholder who sold his stock on the market against the director to recover the difference in price could not be maintained, though the defendant prior to the purchase of the stock made an untrue statement as to the recent operations of the company on the strength of which the plaintiff was induced to sell his stock.

In Wann v. Scullin, 210 Mo. 429, 109 S. W. 688, it appeared that an officer of a corporation who was also a stockholder of another corporation which was seeking to secure control of the stock of the first corporation advised the plaintiff to dispose of her stock to the latter corporation without mentioning the fact that he was interested in the last named corporation. It was held that the concealment was not a fraud on the plaintiff.

EXCEPTIONS TO RULE.

By reason of the existence of special circumstances, a fiduciary duty may exist so as to create an exception to the general rule and impose on an officer or a director the duty of disclosing information possessed by him with regard to the operations of the company which may affect the value of the stock he seeks to purchase. Allen v. Hyatt, 30 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 444, affirming 17 Dominion L. Rep. 7, affirming 8 Dominion L. Rep. 79, which affirmed 20 Ont. W. Rep. 594, 3 Ont. W. N. 370, which affirmed 18 Ont. W. Rep. 850, 2 Ont. W. N. 927; Gadsden v. Bennetto, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 719, 23

Manitoba 33, 49 Can. L. J. 308, 23 West. L. Rep. 633, reversing 5 Dominion L. Rep. 529, 21 West. L. Rep. 886; Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 431, 29 S. Ct. 521, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 860; George v. Ford, 36 App. Cas. (D. C.) 315; Jacquith v. Mason, 99 Neb. 509, 156 N. W. 1041; Commonwealth Title Ins. etc. Co. v. Seltzer, 227 Pa. St. 410, 76 Atl. 77, 136 Am. St. Rep. 896; Black v. Simpson, 94 S. C. 312, 77 S. E. 1023, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 137; Morrison v. Snow, 26 Utah 247, 72 Pac. 924.

Not only a moral but an equitable obligation is imposed on a managing director to disclose all information relating to the operations and financial conditions of the corporation, to a stockholder who relies on him as a friend and fellow shareholder, to keep him informed of the company's standing, and where he induces the stockholder to constitute him his agent to sell the stock and then buys the stock himself he is guilty of a fraud. George v. Ford, 36 App. Cas. (D. C.) 315.

Where directors of a corporation secured the consent of a majority of the shareholders for the sale of all the assets of the corporation, and surreptitiously acquired the shares with a profit to themselves, it was held that under the circumstances a trust or fiduciary relation was established between the directors and the shareholders. Allen v. Hyatt, 30 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 444, affirming 17 Dominion L. Rep. 7, affirming 8 Dominion L. Rep. 79, which affirmed 20 Ont. W. Rep. 594, 3 Ont. W. N. 370, which affirmed 18 Ont. W. Rep. 850, 2 Ont. W. N. 927.

If the facts within the knowledge of the director are of a character calculated to affect the selling price and can, without detriment to the interest of the company, be imparted to the shareholder, the director before he buys the holdings of a stockholder is bound to make a full disclosure. In a certain sense this information is a quasi asset of the company and the shareholder is as much entitled to the advantage of that sort of an asset as to any other asset regularly entered on the list of the company's holdings. Jacquith v. Mason, 99 Neb. 509, 156 N. W. 1041, wherein it was held that a director must return the profits realized on a sale of stock which he purchased from the plaintiff at a reduced price without disclosing the fact that he was offered a much higher price for the stock before his purchase from the stockholder.

Where officers of a company who were appointed by the directors a committee, combined to dispose of all the company's land at a secret profit to themselves, the acquisition of shares by them from shareholders at about half of their actual value, without disclosing the fact that the property in question was sold at a price which doubled the value of the shares, was held to be such fraudulent concealment as to render their purchase of the stock voidable. The information they had as to the purchase price of the corporate property was held, under the circumstances, to be received in a fiduciary capacity. Gadsden v. Bennetto, 23 Manitoba 33, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 719, reversing 5 Dominion L. Rep. 529, 21 West. L. Rep. 886, wherein it was said: "With great deference, I do not think that the law laid down in Percival v. Wright [1902] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 421, and the American case of Carpenter v. Danforth, 52 Barb. (N. Y.) 581, should govern this case. The two defendants were members of the committee appointed to sell this land; and, after a sale was made by suppressing the facts, they buy, through X, but really for themselves, this stock. It is well to observe that they were authorized to sell the land and shares; probably it was thought that, as selling the land was really a winding-up of the company, the purchaser might require to get all the stock in order really to make title. The defendants, with X, conspired together to suppress the facts and get the shareholders' property. It would be strange if in such a flagrant case of fraud the court could not grant relief, and I see no necessity for citing authorities. The very recent case of Allen v. Hyatt, 8 Dominion L. Rep. 79, is quite applicable, and justifies granting relief to the plaintiff. . . . The position of the members of the committee in this case is very different from that of ordinary directors of a company as regards their fiduciary relations; and this case is quite distinguishable from Percival v. Wright [1902] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 421. In the present case the committee was acting outside the ordinary duties of directors; they were appointed for the purpose of securing and bringing in a proposal for disposing, not only of the land, which was the property of the company, but the shares, which were the property of the individual shareholders. On any proposal being received by them which involved the acquisition of the shares, they were bound to disclose to the shareholders, the interested parties, the nature of the proposal and the price offered. If the proposal took the form of acquiring all the company's property and leaving the shares out of account, the shareholders would be immediately interested in that proposal, because their shares would become worthless when the property was transferred, and they could only look for reimbursement to their share of the purchase money on a distribution being made. If the committee, acting under its duties to the company and the shareholders, secured a highly advantageous offer, they were bound to make full disclosure of the offer to the company and the shareholders. The members of the committee were the confidential agents of the company and the shareholders. Their concealment of Cooper's offer, which so greatly enhanced the value of the shares, with a scheme in view to buy the shares at a low price, was a breach of the duty and a fraud upon the shareholders whose shares they acquired, by means of that concealment, at a price far less than their intrinsic value."

In Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 431, 29 S. Ct. 521, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 860, the court said: "It is here sought to make defendant responsible for his actions, not alone and simply in his character as a director, but because, in a consideration of all the existing circumstances above detailed, it became the duty of the defendant, acting in good faith, to state the facts before making the purchase. That the defendant was a director of the corporation is but one of the facts upon which the liability is asserted, the existence of all the others in addition making such a combination as rendered it the plain duty of the defendant to speak. He was not only a director, but he owned three-fourths of the shares of its stock, and was, at the time of the purchase of the stock, administrator general of the company, with large powers, and engaged in the negotiations which finally led to the sale of the company's lands (together with all the other friar lands) to the government at a price which very greatly enhanced the value of the stock. He was the chief negotiator for the sale of all the lands, and was acting substantially as the agent of the shareholders of his company by reason of his ownership of the shares of stock in the corporation and by the acquiescence of all the other shareholders, and the negotiations were for the sale of the whole of the property of the company. By reason of such ownership and agency, and his participation as such owner and agent in the negotiations then going on, no one knew as well as he the exact condition of such negotiations. No one knew as well as he the probability of the sale of the lands to the government. No one knew as well as he the probable price that might be obtained on such sale. The lands were the only valuable asset owned by the company. Under these circumstances and before the negotiations for the sale were completed the defendant employs an agent to purchase the stock, and conceals from the plaintiff's agent his own identity and his knowledge of the state of negotiations and their probable result, with which he was familiar as the agent of the shareholders and much of which knowledge he obtained while acting as such agent and by reason thereof. The inference is inevitable that at this time he had concluded to press the negotiations for a sale of the lands to a successful conclusion, else why would he desire to purchase more shares which, if no sale went through, were, in his opinion, worthless, because of the failure of the government to properly protect the lands in the hands of their then owners? The agent of the plaintiff was ignorant in regard to the state of the negotiations for the sale of the land, which negotiations and their probable result were a most material fact affecting the value of the shares of stock of the company, and he would not have sold them at the price he did had he known the actual state of the negotiations as to the lands and that it was the defendant who was seeking to purchase the stock. Concealing his identity when procuring the purchase of the stock, by his agent, was in itself strong evidence of fraud on the part of the defendant. Why did he not ask Jones, who occupied an adjoining office, if he would sell? But by concealing his identity he could by such means the more easily avoid any questions relative to the negotiations for the sale of the lands and their probable result, and could also avoid any actual misrepresentations on that subject, which he evidently thought were necessary in his case to constitute a fraud. He kept up the concealment as long as he could, by giving the check of a third person for the purchase money. Evidence that he did so was objected to on the ground that it could not possibly even tend to prove that the prior consent to sell had been procured by the subsequent check given in payment. That was not its purpose. Of course, the giving of the check could not have induced the prior consent, but it was proper evidence as tending to show that the concealment of identity was not a mere inadvertent omission, an omission without any fraudulent or deceitful intent, but was a studied and intentional omission to be characterized as a part of the deceitful machinations to obtain the purchase without giving any information whatever as to the state and probable result of the negotiations, to the vendor of the stock, and to in that way obtain the same at a lower price. After the purchase of the stock he continued his negotiations for the sale of the lands, and finally, he says, as administrator general of the company, under the special authority of the shareholders, and as attorney in fact he entered into the contract of sale December 21, 1903. The whole transaction gives conclusive evidence of the overwhelming influence defendant had in the course of the negotiations as owner of a majority of the stock and as agent for the other owners, and it is clear that the final consummation was in his hands at all times. If under all these facts he purchased the stock from the plaintiff, the law would indeed be impotent if the sale could not be set aside or the defendant cast in damages for his fraud."

In Black v. Simpson, 94 S. C. 312, 77 S. E. 1023, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 137, it appeared that the defendant who was the general manager of a corporation entered into negotiations with others for the sale of the franchises and property of the corporation. After ascertaining the price for which they could be sold he conceived a plan to buy up the stock from the individual stockholders, in which plan he succeeded by concealing the value of the stock and the condition of the corporate affairs and induced the stockholders to sell at a lower price by leading them to believe that the affairs of the corporation were in bad condition. It was held that the stockholders could maintain a joint action against the defendant for an accounting of all the profits he received by the acquisition and resale of the property.

The purchase of stock by an officer or director through false or fraudulent representations, or actual concealment of facts bearing on the corporation's operations with a view to induce the sale of stock at a reduced figure, will of course be set aside. Traer v. Clews, 115 U. S. 528, 6 S. Ct. 155, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 467; Price v. Union Land Co. 187 Fed. 886, 110 C. C. A. 20; Black v. Simpson, 94 S. C. 312, 77 S. E. 1023, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 137; *Hume v. Thus where the facts indicated not only a fraudulent concealment of the value of the stock from the plaintiff stockholder, but a carefully devised plan by which the payment of dividends was withheld and no trace of the dividend was left on the books and vouchers of the corporation, the purchase of the stock by an officer who was also acting as a trustee in proceedings to dissolve the corporation was held to be fraudulent. Traer v. Clews, 115 U. S. 528, 6 S. Ct. 155, 29 U. S. (L. ed.) 467.

The mere fact that a director or officer of a corporation makes a purchase of shares at a fraudulent price from a stockholder who is financially embarrassed does not render the purchase fraudulent. Steinfeld v. Nielsen, 12 Ariz. 403, 100 Pac. 1094.

In the absence of a conspiracy to defraud a stockholder, an officer of a corporation may purchase stock of a shareholder regardless of the motive of the purchaser in procuring the sale of the stock. Jones v. Green, 129 Mich. 203, 88 N. W. 1047, 95 Am. St. Rep. 433.

In Grant v. Attrill, 11 Fed. 469, the fact that the plaintiff was induced to sell his stock to certain directors by reason of the latter having levied an assessment on the corporate stock for the purposes of the cor-

the shares, was held to be such fraudulent concealment as to render their purchase of the stock voidable. The information they had as to the purchase price of the corporate property was held, under the circumstances, to be received in a fiduciary capacity. Gadsden v. Bennetto, 23 Manitoba 33, 9 Dominion L. Rep. 719, reversing 5 Dominion L. Rep. 529, 21 West. L. In Grant v. Attrill, 11 Fed. 469, the fact that the plaintiff was induced to sell his stock to certain directors by reason of the latter having levied an assessment on the corporate stock for the purposes of the corpuration and having threatened future assessments for the same purposes was held so to taint the sale with fraud as to render it void, the court saying: "The orator is to be supposed to know his rights. The defendant does not appear to have misrepresented or concealed any material fact relative to the corporate property or franchises. What was represented and withheld related to the policy of the management. The orator seems to have preferred to sell rather than risk the management promised; and he sold out. The course of the defendant may not have lain in the direction of the highest morality, and the whole scheme in which the orator and all were engaged may not; but this court is dealing with such rights as the law takes notice of, and not with purely moral questions. There is not enough shown as the bill is framed, to entitle the orator to rescind the contract and be restored to his stock."

Minority Rule.

In at least two jurisdictions it has been held in accord with the broad rule laid down in the reported case that a fiduciary relation does exist between a director and a stockholder with relation to the latter's shares, so that the director is bound if he proposes to purchase the shares to disclose all the information which he has obtained by virtue of his position as director which may affect the value of the stock. Dacovich v. Canizas, 152 Ala. 287, 44 So. 473; Poole v. Camden (W. Va.) 92 S. E. 454. In the case last cited it was said: "In our opinion, and according to the great weight of authority, the true conception of the relationship of director to stockholder of a corporation is that, while he is not his agent, trustee, or representative respecting his individual shares in the corporation, and having no possession of the certificates or script representing the stock, nor right or authority as such to deal in, sell, or otherwise dispose of the same, and is not any more than a third person precluded from buying or otherwise dealing with the stockholder in reference thereto, he nevertheless does sustain such fiduciary relationship to the stockholder as to impose upon him the utmost good faith respecting such dealings, and when called upon to advise him in relation thereto, and as to the value thereof, and as to the condition of the property and affairs of the corporation. He is bound at his peril to withhold no fact known to him and unknown to the stockholder affecting the value of the stock. 2 Purdy's Beach on Private Corporations, sec. 737a; 4 Thompson on Corporations (2d ed.) sec. 4031; Oliver v. Oliver, 118 Ga. 364, 45 S. E. 232; Stewart v. Harris, 69 Kan.

498, 77 Pac. 277, 66 L.R.A. 261, 105 Am. St. Rep. 178, 2 Ann. Cas. 873. And all authorities agree that, where a director misrepresents material facts peculiarly within his knowledge as a corporate officer, and the vendee relies thereon to his damage, the contract may be rescinded. Helliwell on Stock and Stockholders, sec. 184. In Oliver v. Oliver, supra, one of the leading cases cited by counsel for appellant, it is said: 'When it is admitted, as it must be, both from the very nature of his duty and from the rulings of nearly all the cases, that he is trustee for the shareholder, how is it possible in principle to draw the line and say that, while trustee for some purposes, he is not for others immediately connected therewith; that the incidents of the trust relation stop short at the very point where it is vitally important to the shareholders that they should become active?' And again: 'While not decided, it is in one case suggested that a stockholder in dealing with a director should recognize his superior opportunities for knowledge, and be warned thereby to exercise special caution. But the fiduciary relation fully warrants exactly the opposite course. Here, at least, the beneficiary may be off guard, and may rely implicitly, not only on what is said, but also on the supposition that nothing important will be left unsaid by the officer. Having previously trusted the director in the management of the company, he is not required, when selling his shares, suddenly to exhibit entire want of confidence.' It is conceded by counsel for appellant who relies upon what he calls the majority rule, denying trust relationship between director and individual stockholder, that special circumstances may create or induce that relationship, citing as instances thereof Strong v. Repide, 213 U. S. 419, 29 S. Ct. 521, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 953, and Oliver v. Oliver, supra. Though adopting the majority rule respecting a director as the general rule, affirmed by counsel, Mr. Cook (1 Cook on Stock and Stockholders [3d ed.] sec. 320) says: 'There is no confidential relation between him and a stockholder, so far as a sale of the stock between them is concerned; and, so long as he remains silent and does not actually mislead the person with whom he deals, the transaction cannot be set aside for fraud.' In Strong v. Repide, supra, the point of the syllabus applicable to this discussion is: 'Even though a director may not be under the obligation of a fiduciary nature to disclose to a shareholder his knowledge affecting the value of the shares, that duty may exist in special cases, and did exist upon the facts in this case, which indicate that a director of a corporation owning friar lands in the Philippine Islands, and who controlled the action of the corporation, had so concealed his exclusive knowledge of the impending sale to the government from a shareholder from whom he purchased, through an agent, shares in the corporation, that the concealment was in violation of his duty as a director to disclose such knowledge and amounted to deceit sufficient to avoid the sale; and, under such circumstances, it was immaterial whether the shareholder's agent did or did not have power to sell the stock.' Conceding the so-called majority rule to be the correct one, we think, upon the principles of the cases just referred to, recognizing the exceptions, that where a stockholder who, as in this case, is first sought by a secret agent of a director, with a proposition to buy his stock, and the stockholder goes to such director, to obtain full information respecting the value of his stock and the condition of the corporation, its plans and prospects, the reason for a recent reduction of dividends, and all other information affecting or tending to affect the value of his stock, such director cannot withhold any information within his knowledge, or in any way mislead or deceive him, or by acts, words, or conduct induce a sale of the stock to him, except upon penalty of having the sale rescinded at the option of the stockholder; that, if he undertakes to speak or become active in inducing the sale, he must speak fully, frankly and honestly, and conceal nothing to the disadvantage of the selling stockholder. Here substantially as in Stewart v. Harris, supra: 'Defendant suggests that plaintiff should have himself exercised more diligence in investigating the affairs of the bank; that the books of the bank were open to him. By this we are asked to say that in this case a means of knowledge is equivalent to knowledge; that a clue to the facts which, if diligently followed up, would lead to a disclosure, is equivalent to a discovery. Plaintiff could not be required to make an investigation of the books of the bank to determine its financial condition simply because it was in his power to do so. The diligence required by one to protect his interests is only such as a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under like circumstances. In a case like the one under review the trust relation existing between the parties, the superior opportunities of defendant to know of the condition of the affairs of the bank, and his actual knowledge of its affairs required no such diligence of inquiry on the part of plaintiff as is contended for by defendant. Plaintiff had the right to rely upon the belief that defendant would disclose to him the true condition of the affairs of the bank, and that he would not be called upon to investigate the condition of its affairs before he could with safety sell to the defendant his holdings of stock. It is not the intent of the law to place a restraint on the affairs of business, when conducted fairly, honestly, and openly, nor to deprive one party to a contract of the advantage which superior judgment, greater skill, or better information may give; but it cannot give its approval to a course of dealing that will permit those occupying a trust relation to be unmindful of the trust, betray the confidence reposed, and profit by such betrayal.' We cannot further review the authorities so well collected on both sides and presented in elaborate briefs of learned counsel. Our statement of the true rule is not, we think, wholly opposed to what is regarded as the rule of the majority; it is certainly in harmony with the principles of our own decisions and is supported by reason as well as by authority; it is substantially the rule upon which the court below predicated its decree."

Introductory.

It is a general rule of construction that prima facie the word "child" or "children," when used in a statute, will, or deed, means legitimate child or children, that is, that bastards are not within the meaning of the term "child" or "children." Woolwich Union v. Fulham [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 240, 75 L. J. K. B. 675, reversing [1905] 2 K. B. 203 affirmed [1907] A. C. 255; Robinson v. Georgia R. etc. Co. 117 Ga. 168, 43 S. E. 452, 97 Am. St. Rep. 156, 60 L.R.A. 555; Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 25 Am. Rep. 339; Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 21 N. E. 430, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159, 11 L.R.A. 434; McDonald v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 144 Ind. 459, 43 N. E. 447, 55 Am. St. Rep. 185, 32 L.R.A. 309; Jackson v. Hocke, 171 Ind. 371, 84 N. E. 830; Truelove v. Truelove, 172 Ind. 441, 86 N. E. 1018, 88 N. E. 516, 139 Am. App. 283, 102 N. E. 42; Brisbin v. Huntington, 128 Ia. 106, 5 Ann. Cas. 931, 103 N. W. 144.

"It is well settled that at common law the words child and children meant only legitimate child and children." Floyd v. Floyd, 97 Ga. 124, 24 S. E. 451. See to the same effect Kent v. Barker, 2 Gray (Mass.) 535.

"In every known system of law the word 'child' means child born in lawful wedlock." Landry v. American Creosote Works, 119 La. 231, 43 So. 1016, 11 L.R.A. (N.S.) 387.

"The word 'child' in the absence of any facts or circumstances indicating a different interpretation, carries with it the meaning of legitimate offspring." Tillery v. Tillery, 155 Ala. 495, 46 So. 582.

"It is perfectly clear that the word 'children' per se imports in law legitimate children." Thompson v. McDonald, 22 N. C. 463.

The general rule is that the expression "natural children" refers exclusively to children born out of lawful wedlock, though it is occasionally used in the sense of legitimate children. Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 46 Fed. 269; Lynch v. Knoop, 118 La. 611, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, 43 So. 252, 118 Am. St. Rep. 391, 8 L.R.A. (N.S.) 480. See also Cecil v. Com. 140 Ky. 717, Ann. Cas. 1912B 501, 131 S. In Statute.

GENERALLY.

It is well settled that when the word "child" or "children" is used in a statute, without qualifying words, it means legitimate child or legitimate children, and does not include an illegitimate child or illegitimate children, unless the context broadens its meaning, or some further statutory provision clearly manifests an intention to include them.

Washington.—See the reported case.

It is, of course, true that the foregoing is only prima facie the meaning to be given to the word, and that a wider meaning may, in the case of some statutes, be given to it, so as to include an illegitimate child or illegitimate children, where that meaning is more consonant with the object of the statute. Woolwich Union v. Fulham [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 240, 75 L. J. K. B. 675, reversing [1905] 2 K. B. 203, affirmed [1907] A. C. 255.

The question whether the term "child," as used in a statute, includes an adopted child, is discussed in the note to Ryan v. Foreman, Ann. Cas. 1915B 780. And the construction to be given the word "child," as used in a statute providing for the adoption of children, is considered in the note to Sheffield v. Franklin, 15 Ann. Cas. 90.

STATUTE OF DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION.

At common law, a child born out of wedlock was said to be filius nullius, and to have no inheritable blood. See the cases cited throughout this note. These expressions were of course figurative, and meant no more than that certain legal disabilities were attached to his status, one of which was his lack of capacity to inherit from his putative father or his mother or his parents' kindred.

So it has been held that the word "child" or "children," as used in statutes of descent and distribution, is to be construed in what is termed its legal or technical sense, as comprehending legitimate children only. Williams v. Witherspoon, 171 Ala. 559, 55 So. 132; Rhodes v. Williams, 143 Ga. 342, 85 S. E. 105; Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 25 Am. Rep. 339; Orthwein v. Thomas, 127 Ill. 554, 21 N. E. 430, 11 Am. St. Rep. 159, 4 L.R.A. 434; Jackson v. Hocke, 171 Ind. 371, 84 N. E. 830; Truelove v. Truelove, 172 Ind. 441, 86 N. E. 1018, 88 N. E. 516, 139 Am. St. Rep. 407, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 220; Cooley v. Dewey, 4 Pick. (Mass.) 93, 16 Am. Dec. 326; Porter v. Porter, 7 How. (Miss.) 106, 40

Am. Dec. 55. Compare Rogers v. Weller, 5 Biss. 166, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 12,022 (construing Illinois statute).

The word "children," as used in the general statute of descents and distribution of Alabama (Code 1907, § 3754), means legitimate children, having heritable blood. Williams v. Witherspoon, 171 Ala. 559, 55 So. 132.

The word "child" or "children," as used in the Indiana statute of descent (Burns 1908, §§ 2992, 2993; R. S. 1881, §§ 2469, 2470), must be held to mean legitimate child or children, unless the language of the statute clearly shows that it is employed in a different sense. Truelove v. Truelove, 172 Ind. 441, 86 N. E. 1018, 88 N. E. 516, 139 Am. St. Rep. 404, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 220.

Under the Illinois statute of descents, by which the property of an intestate is made to descend to and among the children and their descendants, it was argued in Blacklaws v. Milne, 82 Ill. 505, 25 Am. Rep. 339, that there was nothing in the statute restricting the customary meaning of the word "children" and that the positive law of the statute should prevail over the common-law rule; and hence that it included an illegitimate child. But it was held that a later section of the statute providing that the illegitimate child or children of any single or unmarried woman should be deemed capable in law to inherit the estate of their deceased mother, was an implied recognition of the existence of the rule of the common law and an abrogation of it to a certain extent only.

However, it has been held in other jurisdictions that the word "child" or "children," when found in statutes of succession, is not to be confined to its strict common-law significance, but includes in its meaning illegitimate as well as legitimate children—in fact, all such children as are by law capable of inheriting. In re Goodman, 17 Ch. D. (Eng.) 266, reversing 14 Ch. D. 619; In re Wardell, 57 Cal. 484; Wolf v. Gall, 32 Cal. App. 286, 163 Pac. 346-350; Heath v. White, 5 Conn. 228; Dickinson's Appeal, 42 Conn. 491, 19 Am. Rep. 553; Drain v. Violet, 2 Bush (Ky.) 155; Power v. Hafley, 85 Ky. 671, 4 S. W. 683, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 369; Barron v. Zimmerman, 117 Md. 296, Ann. Cas. 1914D 574, 83 Atl. 258. See also Eaton v. Eaton, 88 Conn. 269, 91 Atl. 191. Thus, in the case of In re Wardell, supra, the court said: "It is well settled that at common law the word 'children' means those born in lawful wedlock; and such, indeed, has been its legal meaning in every known system of law. Those only were considered as legitimate whose blood was traceable to the legal marriage of a common pair. A person not born in lawful wedlock was not regarded as a member of the group known in law as the family; and consequently was not entitled to the privileges of members of the family, or to any rights of inheritance or succession. Yet every person, whether born in lawful wedlock or not, was recognized as a member of the community, and his relations to the community, and to each member of it, and in respect of the things appertaining to it, were matters which were regulated by law. Indeed, the object of all law is to ascertain and settle the status of individuals in the social system, and to regulate the rights and duties of which each is the center. In relation to children, the common law was a rule of succession to an estate. No one could succeed to an estate in land who was not born in lawful wedlock. . . . If courts were now to restrict the word to its common-law meaning, all children born of an unlawful marriage, all children by adoption or acknowledgment of their father, and all children whose parents intermarried subsequent to their birth, would be excluded from rights of inheritance or succession. But by statute law, the offspring of marriages null in law (§ 84, Civ. Code), children born out of lawful wedlock whose parents subsequently intermarried (§ 215, id.), and children by acknowledgment or adoption of their father (§§ 224, 227, 228, and 230, id.), are all legitimate. These, although incapacitated at common law from succeeding to any rights of their father, are regarded for all purposes as legitimate from the time of their birth. Between them and the legitimate offspring of the same parents the law has established cognatic relations, and either is as capable as the other of exercising inheritable rights. Hence the term 'children,' as used in § 1307 of the law of succession, must relate to status, not origin—to the capacity to inherit, not the legality of the relations which may have existed between those of whom they may have been begotten. The word has, therefore, a statutory and not a common-law meaning; and its meaning includes all children upon whom has been conferred by law the capacity of inheritance."

In Eaton v. Eaton, 88 Conn. 269, 91 Atl. 191, it was said obiter: "The word 'children' in our statute of distributions is interpreted to embrace a mother's illegitimate as well as legitimate children, for the simple reason that the law regards the former as well as the latter as her children. In a word, the natural corollary of the English rule that the word 'child' or 'children,' when used in a statute, is to be restrained to signify legitimates only, is done away with, as it logically must be. That corollary is the logical consequence of the proposition that the illegitimate is the child of nobody. When that proposition is transposed into ours, that an illegitimate is the child of its mother, then all logical foundation for the corollary that the word 'child' or 'children' in statute, will, or deed, is to be interpreted as limited to legitimates, disappears, and the logical corollary becomes the reverse, so that presumptively the word 'child' or 'children' in a will embraces offspring legitimate and illegitimate."

The word "children" in the English statute of distributions (22 & 23 Car. 2, c. 10, §§ 6, 7) includes not only legal children according to the English law, viz., children born in lawful wedlock, as distinguished from children born before marriage who are not legitimate according to the English law, but children born in a foreign country and legitimated under the law of that country by the subsequent marriage of their parents, and such children take by representation under that statute as children of their father. In re Goodman, 17 Ch. D. 266, reversing 14 Ch. D. 619.

The word "children" in the Kentucky statute (Gen. St. c. 31, § 1, subsec. 1 is not confined to children born in lawful wedlock, but may include in its meaning children born in lawful wedlock, children made legitimate by the marriage of their parents, children by adoption, and children who have a right to inherit, either by a general or special law. Power v. Hafley, 85 Ky. 671, 4 S. W. 683, 9 Ky. L. Rep. 369.

In Barron v. Zimmerman, 117 Md. 296, 83 Atl. 258, Ann. Cas. 1914D 574, the question presented was whether, under a system of laws by which an illegitimate child was invested with the full qualifications of legitimacy with reference to the inheritance of his mother's estate, he was within the purview of a constituent provision that the estate which the deceased mother would have inherited should pass to her "child" or "children." The court held that this question should be answered in the affirmative, saying: "It would certainly seem to be a reasonable construction of statutory provisions which are codified together as parts of the same general plan of descent and distribution to hold that one who is placed in the position of a lawful begotten child for the purpose of inheriting from his mother should be regarded as a 'child' of the mother within the intent of the law, for the purpose of succeeding to the estate which she would have inherited if she had survived. It has been decided that so far as the inheritance of the mother's estate is concerned her children all stand upon an equal footing without regard to their legitimacy. Earl v. Dawes, 3 Md. Ch. 231. In the case just cited the Chancellor observed that by the statute illegitimates are placed, as regards their mother's estate, 'in the condition of legitimate children in all respects and to every intent.' But if we were to deny the right here asserted by the appellant, it would have to be upon the ground that although he is treated by the 'Inheritance' article of the Code as if he were a legitimate child of his mother for the purpose of being her heir at law, he is to be refused recognition as her 'child' under the same article for the purpose of representing her in the course of descent. If the several sections to which we have referred had been included in the same original enactment, it would probably not be seriously contended that an illegitimate child who was made capable by the statute of inheriting from his mother should not be regarded as her 'child,' under that unqualified description in the act, with a view to participation in the estate which she would have inherited had she lived.

... We must hold that one who, being a child in fact, is made a child in law with respect to inheritance from his mother, cannot be denied recognition as her 'child' under section 27 for the purpose of inheriting property to which she, if she had survived, would have been entitled. This interpretation of the law does not disregard, but is consistent with the rule, applied by this court in an early case, that legislation modifying the common law disqualifications of illegitimate children should be strictly construed."

So, the right of inheritance of legitimate and illegitimate children alike being a creature of law, when the law provides means for making legitimate a child born out of wedlock, it changes the status of that child, and in the absence of special provision to the contrary, he thenceforth comes within the provisions of the laws relating to legitimate children. Thereafter, a child so legitimated is included in the designation "child" or "children" when these words refer to a child or children legitimately born; and he is no longer included in the designation "illegitimate child," when that term is used in a statute, unless it is obvious that such words are intended by the legislature to include one who, though now legitimate, was formerly illegitimate. Wolf v. Gall, 32 Cal. App. 286, 163 Pac. 346, 350, wherein the court said: "We think these propositions are self-evident. Of what avail is it to have legitimated a child if he still labors under the disabilities of his former condition? If he has not acquired the rights by law given to, and become subject to the duties imposed upon, his new condition, there has been no change at all; for it is obvious that the fact that he was born out of wedlock has not been changed and never can be. If any stigma attaches to that condition it still remains, and all that the law can do—and all it seeks to do—is to remove the disabilities attached to the condition. We freely grant that the legislature can limit the extent to which the disabilities of an illegitimate child are removed; that although it has granted legitimacy in general terms, it can still perpetuate former disabilities or create new ones; so that, in a statute granting rights of succession to the property of intestates, a discrimination may still be made against persons legitimated by statute."

Likewise in Drain v. Violet, 2 Bush (Ky.) 155, the word "children" as used in the Kentucky statute of descent and distribution (c. 30; 1 Stant. Rev. Stat. 419) was held not necessarily to be confined to children born in lawful wedlock, but to include all such children as were by law capable of inheriting, and hence was held to include an illegitimate son who, by a special legislative enactment procured by the father, had been rendered capable of inheriting from the latter.

STATUTE OF PRETERMISSION.

Under the California statute (Civ. Code, § 1307) providing that "when any testator omits to provide in his will for any of his children, or for the issue of any deceased child, unless it appears that such omission was intentional, such child, or the issue of such child, must have the same share in the estate of the testator as if he had died intestate," it has been held that the word "children" included an illegitimate daughter of a testatrix who was an heir of her mother by statute, and whose name had been omitted from the will and for whom no provision therein had been made, it not appearing that the omission was intentional. In re Wardell, 57 Cal. 484.

Under a Washington statute of similar character (Bal. Code, § 4601 [1 Hill's Code, § 1465]), where it appeared that an illegitimate son was only remembered in the will as the child of Martha Kornetsky, being mentioned as "Otto," instead of his real name, Arthur Kornetsky, and the legacy was to him as the child of Martha Kornetsky, and in no other capacity, it was held that as there was no other child, and as it was evident that this child was in the mind of the testator, the statute was satisfied. In re Gorkow, 20 Wash. 563, 56 Pac. 385.

But under the Massachusetts statute to the same effect, it has been held that the word "children" therein did not include illegitimate children as well as legitimate. Kent v. Barker, 2 Gray (Mass.) 535. The court said: "The question in this case is, what is the meaning of the word 'children' in Rev. Sta. c. 62, § 21, and whether it includes illegitimate children, as well as legitimate. It is well settled, indeed it is conceded, that at common law the words 'child' and 'children' mean only legitimate child and children. Illegitimate children are the children of nobody, and have no rights of inheritance. . . .

Have the words acquired any other meaning in the legislation of the commonwealth? We think they have not. . . . There is then no provision in the statutes, that an illegitimate child shall have any share of a testate estate, unless it be found in Rev. Sta. c. 62, § 21. And it can be found here only by enlarging the legal meaning of the words 'children' and 'child' so as to include illegitimate children, giving to the word 'children' a meaning that did not exist in the common law, and confounding what the legislature have been careful to distinguish. There is another suggestion that seems quite conclusive. The provision of Rev. Sta. c. 62, § 21, applies to the omission by a testator to provide in his will for any of his children or 'the issue of any deceased child.' Now the second section of Rev. Sta. c. 61, expressly negatives the right of an illegitimate child to claim by representation. Curtis v. Hewins, 11 Metc. (Mass.) 294. If therefore the construction claimed by the demandants were to be adopted, the issue of a deceased illegitimate child must be held to take a share of the estate where there is an omission to provide for them by will, although they would not take if the ancestor had died without a will; or else the word 'children' must be held to include legitimate and illegitimate children, and the word 'child,' immediately following, be limited to a legitimate child. The result is this: As at the common law illegitimate children have no rights of inheritance or descent, whatever they take is by force of the statutes. The statutes have provided for cases of inheritance, for the descent of intestate estates. They have made no provision for cases where there is an omission by a testator to provide in his will for an illegitimate child. Whether the same reasons apply to the case of an omission of an illegitimate child, and the same results should follow such omission, is a question for the legislature, and not for the court."

STATUTE AVOIDING LAPSING OF LEGACIES.

As used in the Pennsylvania acts (P. L. 250, Act of April 8, 1833; P. L. 565, Act of May 6, 1844), having for their purpose the avoidance of the lapsing of legacies, the word "child" does not include natural or illegitimate children. Wettach v. Horn, 201 Pa. St. 201, 50 Atl. 1001.

In construing the Ontario statute (R. S. c. 106, § 35) of the same purport, a like construction has been placed on the word "child" as used in that statute. Hargraff v. Keegan, 10 Ont. 272.

STATUTE RELATING TO ADMINISTRATION OF DECEDENTS' ESTATES.

The word "children" in the Texas statute (Sayles' Tex. St. art. 2046) providing for the setting apart of the homestead by the probate court "for the use and benefit of the widow and minor children and unmarried daughters remaining with the family of the deceased," include both the children of the surviving widow and those of a former wife, but they must be the legitimate children of the deceased. Hayworth v. Williams, 102 Tex. 308, 116 S. W. 43, 132 Am. St. Rep. 879.

STATUTE RELATING TO CRIME.

It has been held that the term "child," as used in the accusation in a prosecution for the abandonment of a child, where the accusation followed the language of the statute (Pen. Code, 1910, § 116), imported a legitimate child. Woodard v. State, 18 Ga. App. 59, 88 S. E. 825.

Under the English statute (Geo. IV, c. 83, § 4) providing that among certain persons to be deemed rogues and vagabonds were "every person running away and leaving his wife or her child or children chargeable to the parish," it has been held that the word "child" did not include an illegitimate child, so that a single woman could not be convicted of running away and leaving her bastard child chargeable to the parish. Reg. v. Maude, 2 Dowl. N. S. (Eng.) 58, 6 Jur. 646.

In a prosecution for incest, under a statute (Ky. St. § 1219) providing that "whoever shall carnally know his or her father, mother, child, sister or brother, knowing such relation to exist, shall be guilty of felony," etc., the word "child" includes a "natural" child, as well as a "lawful" child. Cecil v. Com. 140 Ky. 717, Ann. Cas. 1912B 501, 131 S. W. 781, wherein the court said: "This statute was passed for the good of society, the elevation and betterment of mankind. It cannot be that it was intended to punish illicit intercourse between father and daughter if the daughter was born in lawful wedlock, and not punish such intercourse where the daughter was born out of lawful wedlock. In each case the relationship is the same, and the statute was intended to prevent sexual intercourse between persons occupying this relationship. If the child was begotten by the man, she was his daughter none the less because he failed to marry her mother. His blood courses through her veins just the same as though he had married her mother, and it is because of this blood relationship that statutes have been enacted in most every civilized country prohibiting the marriage of parent and child and visiting upon them severe punishment for carnally knowing each other. Incest was not an offense at common law, but the ecclesiastical courts punished those found guilty of this practice. It was regarded as an offense against good morals, and for this reason was punished by the ecclesiastical courts. But, aside from any moral consideration, such a practice is shocking to our sense of decency, propriety and good citizenship, and any parent found guilty of it should be punished as the law directs, whether the child is a legal or a natural child. This was the conclusion reached by the trial judge and the construction which he placed upon the meaning of the word 'child' in the statute, and hence he refused to give an instruction authorizing an acquittal unless the proof showed that the child, Jose Cecil, was born in lawful wedlock or her parents married each other after her birth."

STATUTE RELATING TO DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT.

In the majority of the jurisdictions, the rule is that the word "child," as used in the statutes giving a right of action for damages for the death by wrongful act of a child, means a legitimate child only, and hence neither the mother nor the father is entitled to maintain such an action for the death of an illegitimate child. This result is reached by a strict construction of statutes of that nature, which are in derogation of the common law, the courts holding that these statutes, giving remedies which did not exist at common law, cannot be helped by reference to statutes of descent, so as to take in the kin of bastards. Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. 2 H. & C. 735, 33 L. J. Exch. 91, 9 L. T. N. S. 299, 12 W. R. 52, 159 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 304; Clarke v. Carfin Coal Co. [1891] App. Cas. (Eng.) 412; Gibson v. Midland R. Co. 2 Ont. 658; Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 46 Fed. 269 (action under Missouri statute); Robinson v. Georgia R. etc. Co. 117 Ga. 168, 43 S. E. 452, 97 Am. St. Rep. 156, 60 L.R.A. 555; McDonald v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 144 Ind. 459, 43 N. E. 447, 55 Am. St. Rep. 185, 32 L.R.A. 309; Lynch v. Knoop, 118 La. 611, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, 43 So. 252, 118 Am. St. Rep. 391, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 480; Landry v. American Creosote Works, 119 La. 231, 43 So. 1016, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 387; Runt v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 88 Miss. 575, 41 So. 1 (action under Louisiana statute); Harkins v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 15 Phila. (Pa.) 286, 39 Leg. Int. 4; McDonald v. Southern Ry. 71 S. C. 352, 51 S. E. 138, 110 Am. St. Rep. 576, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 640. Compare Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 120 Mo. 275, 25 S. W. 179; Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Walker, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 106 S. W. 705.

The word "child" in the Act of Parliament (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, § 2) giving a right of action for the death by wrongful act of a parent, means legitimate child only. Dickinson v. North Eastern R. Co. 2 H. & C. 735, 33 L. J. Exch. 91, 9 L. T. N. S. 299, 12 W. R. 52, 159 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 304.

As used in the Indiana statute (R. S. 1894, § 267; R. S. 1881, § 266) providing that a father may maintain an action for the injury or death of a child, the word "child" means a legitimate child only. McDonald v. Pittsburgh, etc. R. Co. 144 Ind. 459, 43 N. E. 447, 55 Am. St. Rep. 185, 32 L.R.A. 309.

The word "child," as used in the Georgia statute (Civ. Code, § 3828) giving a right of action for death by wrongful or negligent act, means a legitimate child, and hence the mother of an illegitimate child cannot recover for his death. Robinson v. Georgia R. etc. Co. 117 Ga. 168, 43 S. E. 452, 97 Am. St. Rep. 156, 60 L.R.A. 555.

In Harkins v. Philadelphia, etc. R. Co. 15 Phila. (Pa.) 286, 39 Leg. Int. 4, it was held that the mother of an illegitimate child was not within the words or meaning of the Pennsylvania statute (Purd. 1094, Act of April 26, 1855) providing that the persons entitled to recover damages for any injury causing death should be the "husband, widow, children or parents of the deceased, and no other relative."

As used in the Louisiana statute (Act No. 71, 1884, Merrick Rev. Civ. Code 1900, art. 2315, p. 94) providing for the survival of a right of action for damages for death due to personal injuries to the surviving father or mother, the word "child" or "children" means a legitimate child and not a natural or illegitimate child, and hence the right of action does not survive to the mother of a natural child. Lynch v. Knoop, 118 La. 611, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, 118 Am. St. Rep. 391, 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 480; Runt v. Illinois Cent. R. Co. 88 Miss. 575, 41 So. 1; or to the natural father and mother of such a son. Landry v. American Creosote Works, 119 La. 231, 43 So. 1016, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 387. In Lynch v. Knoop, supra, the court said: "The right of action, under Act 71, p. 94, of 1884, survives in the surviving mother and father. 'The right of this action shall survive in case of death in favor of the minor children.' Id. This does not include the natural mother and the natural father. The articles of the Civil Code regarding the mother of legitimate children all refer to a lawful mother. The article of the code relating to natural mothers and natural fathers is separate from those relating to the lawful mother and father. The two, the mother and the natural mother, are treated in the code differently or from a different point of view; one from the point of view that she has a natural right, the other that it is a statutory right extending no further than the terms of the statute. The following are some of the marked differences between the natural child and the legitimate child. The natural heir is to be recognized and to be placed in possession under special provisions of the law. He is a stranger to the succession from which he inherits until permission is obtained to exercise the right of an heir. It is different with the legitimate heir. Originally the right to damages for personal injuries was not heritable. The statute has to some extent made it heritable, but it does not express the intention to include the natural mother as a person in whom the right survives, and without some expressed declaration in that respect it cannot be considered as secured under the terms of the statute. The terms of the act cannot be extended so as to include a natural mother or a natural offspring. Legitimate relationship was the legislative intent. The right does not survive in the mother further than it does in the natural child. Civ. Code, art. 3556, No. 8. Natural children, though recognized, are not children properly so called. The same is a logical conclusion as relates to the mother of the natural child. While she is the mother properly so called, she inherits from the natural child under the special provisions of our code. Articles 256, 261, 212. But this can afford no comfort to the plaintiff, for the right of inheritance is special and embraces only such rights as are in themselves heritable. The statute did not enlarge the rights of a natural mother or the mother of a natural child, and did not add to their number or extent. It only provided for the survival of certain designated rights, and as thus designated it includes the mother, and not the mother of the natural child."

However, in Texas, where the rule that a statute in derogation of the common law is to be construed strictly, has been abolished, it has been held that under the statute giving a right of action for the death of a mother to the children of such person, the word "children" embraces illegitimate children. Galveston, etc. R. Co. v. Walker, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 52, 106 S. W. 705, wherein the court said: "There can be no doubt that in this state the mother of such a child is legally entitled to its custody, its services and bound for its support. Under these circumstances it is difficult to see, in fact we fail to see, wherein the status of such a child, in reference to its mother, is in law any different from that of a legitimate child. In other words, the law regards it as her child. Having clothed it with the relationship and attributes of a child, it is believed that the legislature intended by the use of the word 'children' in the statute, to include illegitimate children as parties entitled to maintain the action in so far as they claim with reference to their mother."

Under the Missouri statute (Rev. St. 1889, § 4425) providing that a tortfeasor shall forfeit and pay, whenever any person shall die from any injury resulting from or occasioned by the negligence, unskillfulness or criminal intent described in the statute, the sum of $5,000 for every person or passenger so dying, which sum may be sued for and recovered and giving a right of action to the parents, or survivor, "if such deceased be a minor and unmarried, whether such deceased unmarried minor be a natural born child," it was held that the word "natural" was used in the sense of legitimate, though generally the expression "natural children" referred exclusively to children born out of lawful wedlock. Hence it was held that a mother could maintain an action under the statute for the death of an illegitimate son. Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 120 Mo. 275, 25 S. W. 179. But compare Marshall v. Wabash R. Co. 46 Fed. 269, an action based on the same state of facts.

The note to Lynch v. Knoop, 10 Ann. Cas. 807, presents the cases dealing with the right in general of a parent to recover for the death of an illegitimate child.

STATUTE RELATING TO EXEMPTION.

The Washington statutes relating to the exemption from attachment or execution of the head of a family or a householder, define the head of a family as "every person who has residing on the premises with him or her, and under his or her care and maintenance, . . . his or her minor child" (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 553 [P. C. 220, § 49]); and a householder as "every person who has residing with him or her, and under his or her care and maintenance, . . . his or her minor child." (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 563 [P. C. 81, § 877]). Thereunder, in the reported case it is held that the word "child," as used in those statutes, does not include an illegitimate child, and hence that one living with and maintaining an illegitimate child is not, by reason of that fact, the head of a family and therefore exempt.

STATUTE RELATING TO INSURANCE.

In the Massachusetts statute (St. 1888, c. 249, § 8) limiting the beneficiaries of the mortuary fund of a fraternal beneficiary association "to the husband, wife, children, relatives of, or persons dependent upon, such member," the word "children" means legitimate children, and does not include an illegitimate daughter of a member who did not contribute to her support. Lavigne v. Ligue des Patriotes, 178 Mass. 25, 59 N. E. 674, 86 Am. St. Rep. 460, 54 L.R.A. 814.

STATUTE RELATING TO NATURALIZATION OF INDIANS.

By the Curtis act, an act relating to the naturalization of the Indians in Indian Territory (Act June 28, 1898, c. 517, 30 Stat. L. 495), Congress provided that as soon as the roll of citizenship of any one of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians should have been completed as required by law, and a survey of the land of that nation or tribe made, the commission should proceed to allot the exclusive use and occupancy of the surface of the land of that tribe among the citizens thereof, giving each a fair and equal share thereof. By section 16 it was provided that, when any citizen should be in possession of only such an amount of agricultural or grazing lands as would be his just and reasonable share of the lands of his nation or tribe, and that to which his wife and minor children were entitled, he might continue to use the same and receive the rents therefrom until allotment had been made to him. In Walker v. Roberson, 21 Okla. 894, 97 Pac. 609, it was held that the language of the foregoing section, authorizing the father to hold and receive the rents from land to which his children were entitled as their allotments until allotments were made to him, did not include the right to hold and receive rents for the prospective allotment of an illegitimate son. In other words, it was held that the words "minor children," in that section of the act, did not include minor illegitimate children. The court said: "The language of this section [the next succeeding section of the same act] clearly indicates what children are referred to in this and the preceding sections. By using the language, 'that a person should not hold land and property in excess of his share and that of his family aforesaid,' it was clearly intended that a citizen should be permitted to hold land sufficient for the allotments of himself, wife, and minor children, who were members of his family. An illegitimate son, that does not live with the putative father, and to whose mother the putative father has never been married, is not a member of such man's family, and he is not one of the children referred to by said section, for whom the father could hold land and receive rents therefrom until allotment. To have provided that the father who had never legitimated or adopted his illegitimate child, and of whose family the illegitimate child had never become a member, should have the right to hold the land of such child and receive the rents therefrom, would have worked a great injustice. The father who does not support his illegitimate child, and who has never made such a child a member of his family by legitimation has no right in law to receive the rents and profits from the property of such child; but the effect of this act, if the word 'children,' as used therein, includes an illegitimate child, would have been to authorize the putative father to hold the lands of the illegitimate child and receive the rents therefrom, although he contributed nothing whatever to the support of such child. . . . While the word 'child' or 'children,' in the cases cited, is not used in any of them in the exact relation that it is used in the statute under consideration in this case, the cases cited cover various subjects, and clearly show the rule to be that the word 'children,' without qualifying expressions in a statute, deed of conveyance, or a will, does not include an illegitimate child."

STATUTE RELATING TO POOR.

In construing poor laws, the courts have usually held that the word "child" or "children," as used in those statutes, meant a legitimate child or children only. Woolwich Union v. Fulham [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 240, 75 L. J. K. B. 675, reversing [1905] 2 K. B. 203, affirmed [1907] A. C. 255; Forest City v. Damascus, 176 Pa. St. 116, 34 Atl. 351; Buffalo Tp. v. Lewisburg, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 121. Compare Northwich Union v. St. Pancras Union, 22 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 164, 58 L. J. M. C. 73.

A Pennsylvania statute (P. L. 542; Act of June 13, 1836, § 9, cl. 5) provides that "a legal settlement may be gained in any district . . . by any unmarried person, not having a child, who shall be lawfully bound as a servant, within such district, and shall continue in such service during one whole year." Thereunder it has been held that the word "child" in the clause quoted, meant only a legitimate child, and that an unmarried female, having a bastard child, might gain a settlement by hiring and service for one whole year. Forest City v. Damascus, 176 Pa. St. 116, 34 Atl. 351; Buffalo Tp. v. Lewisburg, 1 Pa. Co. Ct. 121.

The word "children" as used in the proviso to section 1 of the English Poor Removal Act of 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 66), prescribing that the status of children as to removability or irremovability is to be derived from and to follow that of their parent, does not include illegitimate children. Woolwich Union v. Fulham [1906] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 240, 75 L. J. K. B. 675, reversing [1905] 2 K. B. 203, affirmed [1907] A. C. 255, wherein Vaughan Williams, L. J., said: "As I have said, the appellant's counsel . . . argued that the proviso to the section did not apply in the case of an illegitimate child. He relied for the purpose of that argument upon the technical rule of law that the word 'child' or 'children' means a legitimate child or legitimate children, and that meaning must prima facie be given to the word whenever it occurs in a statute. It is of course true that that is only prima facie the meaning to be given to the word, and that a wider meaning may, in the case of some statutes, be given to it, so as to include an illegitimate child or illegitimate children, where that meaning is more consonant with the object of the statute. Although that is so, I cannot say that, in the case of the enactment in question, I find any object plainly aimed at which would make it more consonant with the scope of the act that we should depart from what is prima facie the meaning of the word and construe it as including illegitimate children. But, apart from that consideration, there is another reason why I should hesitate so to construe it. A long time has now elapsed since 1846, and during all that length of time numerous cases must have occurred in which the question whether the proviso to § 1 of the act was applicable to an illegitimate child might have been raised; but, apparently, there is no case in the books in which that point was raised, and, when one inquires what the practice of poor law administration has been in the matter, one cannot find that there has been any practice which is inconsistent with giving to the word 'children' in the proviso its prima facie meaning of legitimate children. Moreover, we have had cited to us the case of Reg. v. Maude, 2 Dowl. (N. S.) 58, which is very much in point to the present case. The judgment in that case was delivered by Wightman, J., and he pointed out that, where the word 'child' is used in the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, as for example in § 56, a legitimate child only is intended, and, when it is meant that the word should have a more extensive signification, it is expressly so declared, as in § 57, by which a husband is made liable to maintain the children of his wife born before the marriage, whether legitimate or illegitimate. The effect of his judgment is to lead one to the conclusion that in these poor law statutes generally, where the word 'child' is used without more, a legitimate child is meant, and where a wider meaning is intended, the legislature has again and again added such words as 'whether legitimate or illegitimate.' Of this § 3 of the very statute which we are discussing, namely, the Poor Removal Act, 1846, affords an example. In the case of the proviso to § 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846, an additional reason for supposing that the word 'children' is used in the sense of legitimate children is afforded from the collocation of the word with the word 'wife,' and the fact that the term 'person' therein being used in relation to a husband, the inference arises that the children thereby contemplated are the children of such a husband and wife. Under these circumstances I cannot avoid the conclusion that in the proviso to § 1 the word 'children' must receive its prima facie meaning, and therefore does not apply to illegitimate children."

In an examination for an order of removal with respect to the last legal settlement of paupers, the word "child" is a proper description of a legitimate child, as the law does not contemplate illegitimacy, Reg. v. Totley, 7 Q. B. 596, 53 E. C. L. 596, 115 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 614; but does not properly describe an illegitimate child, Reg. v. Birmingham, 8 Q. B. 410, 55 E. C. L. 410, 115 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 930.

In Northwich Union v. St. Pancras Union, 22 Q. B. D. (Eng.) 164, 58 L. J. M. C. 73, there was involved a statute (section 35 of the Divided Parishes Act, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) the first part of which provided that a child should take the settlement "of its father or widowed mother." The third part provided that "if any child in this section mentioned shall not have acquired a settlement for itself, or being a female, shall not have derived a settlement from her husband, and it cannot be shown what settlement such child or female derived from the parent without inquiry into the derivative settlement of such parent, such child or female shall be deemed to be settled in the parish in which he or she was born." Cotton, L. J., said: "Now, though 'child' in the first part of the section applies only, as I think, to a legitimate child, yet as illegitimate children are expressly mentioned in the second, I think that as a matter of construction the words in the third part 'any child in this section mentioned' must include not only the legitimate child mentioned in the first part, but the illegitimate child mentioned in the second part."

STATUTE CREATING PRESUMPTION OF GIFT.

Under the Georgia statute (Code, § 2664) which declares that "the exclusive possession by a child of lands belonging originally to the father, without payment of rent, for the space of seven years, shall create conclusive presumption of a gift, and convey title to the child," etc., it has been held that the word "child" did not include an illegitimate child. Floyd v. Floyd, 97 Ga. 124, 24 S. E. 451.

STATUTE RELATING TO WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION.

The word "child" or "children" as used in the New York Workmen's Compensation Law (Consol. Laws, c. 67, § 16, Laws 1914, c. 41, as amended by Laws 1914, c. 316, McKinney's Consol. Laws, Book 64) does not include the illegitimate dependent children of the bigamous marriage of a workman. Bell v. Terry, etc. Co. 177 App. Div. 123, 163 N. Y. S. 733, wherein the court said: "Section 16 of the act provides that 'if there be a surviving child or children of the deceased under the age of eighteen years' an additional amount shall be provided for such child or children until such child or children arrive at the age of eighteen years, and this without reference to whether the children are dependent upon the father or not. . . . In other words, the statute presumes that the children of a parent are dependent upon him or her up to the age of eighteen years and provides for them in the Workmen's Compensation Law. While, in a sense, the persons mentioned in the question are children they are not the lawful children of the decedent, and unlawful children are not favored in the law; they have only such rights as are expressly granted by statute in so far as property rights are concerned. Not only has the legislature not provided for illegitimate children under the Workmen's Compensation Law by specific language, but, by its definition of 'child' in subdivision 11 of section 3, it has clearly indicated an intention to use the word only in its legal sense, as modified. It declares that "child" shall include a posthumous child and a child legally adopted prior to the injury of the employee, and, by expressly fixing these limitations, it must be understood to have excluded any other child or children than such as would be included at common law and under the statutory definition. . . . Whatever may have been held in other jurisdictions, under ever varying language and differing conceptions of public policy, there is no justification for reading into the statute a provision which shall permit illegitimate children to share in the benefits provided for the lawful issue of one suffering through an industrial accident. If the legislature wants to assume this responsibility it should do so in plain and unequivocal language; it ought not to be done through strained and unnatural construction on the part of the courts. . . . The suggestion that section 1745 of the Code of Civil Procedure may have something to do with the answering of this question, plausible upon the surface, utterly fails when we come to analyze the language of the section in connection with that of the Workmen's Compensation Law. The language of section 16 of the Workmen's Compensation Law is that 'if there be surviving child or children of deceased under the age of eighteen years' an additional amount is to be paid. This does not say if there are surviving children of the mother but they must be surviving children of the deceased, while section 1745 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that in an 'action to annul a marriage, upon the ground that the former husband or wife of one of the parties was living, the former marriage being in force,' and that 'it appears, and the judgment determines, that the subsequent marriage was contracted by at least one of the parties thereto in good faith, and with the full belief that the former husband or wife was dead or that the former marriage had been annulled or dissolved, or without any knowledge on the part of the innocent party of such former marriage, the issue of the subsequent marriage, born or begotten before the final judgment, are deemed for all purposes the legitimate children of the parent, who at the time of the marriage was competent to contract, and are entitled to succeed as such, in the same manner as other legitimate children, to the real and personal estate of said parent; and the issue so entitled must be specified in the judgment, and the innocent party must be awarded their custody, and he or she is entitled to appoint a guardian of their persons by will.' It will thus be seen that this case could not come within the provisions of section 1745 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the employee knew of the marriage which stood in the way of lawful issue, and only the surviving child or children of the deceased are entitled under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Law. If we indulge the presumption, hardly warranted in this case so far as the record discloses, that Delia V. Bell was an innocent party to the bigamous marriage, the code only legitimatizes the issue as to her and permits the children to inherit from her. It does not make them the legitimate children of the wrongdoing husband; they are 'deemed for all purposes the legitimate children of the parent, who at the time of the marriage was competent to contract,' and we are not to read into the statute more than the legislature has provided."

In Deed.

The word "child" or "children" in a deed or other conveyance must be held to mean legitimate children, unless the context is such as to require a different meaning, or the circumstances surrounding the execution of the paper are such as to make the words import other than legitimates. Johnstone v. Taliaferro, 107 Ga. 6, 32 S. E. 931, 45 L.R.A. 95; Hall v. Cressey, 92 Me. 514, 43 Atl. 118. See also Bolton v. Bolton, 73 Me. 299; Lyon v. Lyon, 88 Me. 395, 34 Atl. 180; Appel v. Byers, 98 Pa. St. 479.

In Hall v. Cressey, supra, it appeared that a deed conveying certain real estate contained a provision that "this deed is to take effect and go into operation on the decease of me and my wife and not before; and if my son Stephen die without children, then Stephen's third part is to go to my son George." The defendant contended that Stephen took a vested remainder in fee simple, determinable on a contingency, namely the death of Stephen without children; and that on the death of Stephen without legitimate children, the title passed to George, and so on to the defendant. The plaintiff contended that if

Stephen's remainder was not an estate in tail, then inasmuch as Stephen died leaving surviving him a child born out of wedlock, he did not in legal contemplation "die without children," and so the contingency provided for in the deed did not happen. The court said: "The first important question is: did Stephen 'die without children?' Unless he did the defendant has no title in any event. By the common law a bastard was filius nullius. He possessed no inheritable blood. The sins of the father were visited upon the child. Modern sentiment as expressed in modern statutes is more merciful to the unfortunate offspring of illicit intercourse. In this state, as in most others, by pursuing statutory methods, a bastard may be legitimated and may acquire rights of inheritance, and some or all of the usual consequences of consanguinity. So it was in the case at bar. Stephen gave his daughter statutory recognition. But that conferred only statutory rights and privileges. We are not concerned with the status of this child under a statute, but are endeavoring to ascertain the legal meaning of the word 'children' in a deed. We do not perceive how that meaning can be enlarged in this case; nor how the interpretation of the word can be aided by reference to a statutory condition which was created many years after the deed was executed. Unless there is something in this deed, and there is not, to show that the grantor contemplated that his son Stephen would become the father of a bastard child, and intended that child to be included in the term 'children,' we must give to the word its ordinary, common-law signification. The authorities are to the effect that the word 'child' in a will or deed means a legitimate child. . . . We therefore hold that Stephen McIntosh died 'without children,' so far as the construction of the deed is concerned."

In Johnstone v. Taliaferro, 107 Ga. 6, 32 S. E. 931, 45 L.R.A. 95, it appeared that a trust deed gave the residuary estate in trust "for the sole and separate use of Mary M. Barclay, the daughter of my adopted daughter Margaret Marshall, late deceased, for and during the term of her natural life, free from debts, contracts, or control of any husband with whom she may hereafter intermarry, and from and after the death of the said Mary M. Barclay, then in trust for such child or children of the said Mary M. Barclay as she may leave living at the time of her death, share and share alike, if more than one, as tenants in common, their heirs and assigns forever, the representatives of a deceased child to stand in the place of the parent, and to take per stirpes and not per capita." In holding that an illegitimate son was not a "child" of the cestui que trust within the meaning of that term as it was used by the grantor, the court said: "Florence Barclay Johnstone is therefore undoubtedly an heir of his mother, Mary M. Barclay, and as such is entitled to inherit with her other children any property which she may have owned at the time of her death and which would go to her heirs at law upon her demise. But the property in controversy was not vested in Mary M. Barclay in such a way as to be transmissible to her heirs at law. Those who take this property after her death must take as purchasers under the trust deed; and therefore the question to be determined is, whether the plaintiff is a child of Mary M. Barclay within the meaning of that term as it was used by Mrs. Marshall. In other words, was it the intention of Mrs. Marshall when she signed the paper purporting to be a will, and when she afterwards incorporated it in the deed, that the provisions of that paper should be broad enough to embrace within the reach of the benefits therein provided for the illegitimate offspring of Mary M. Barclay, brought into life more than three years after the deed so made? Was it in contemplation of Mrs. Marshall when she made this deed that a child who was undoubtedly the object of her great affection should come to disgrace and have born to her a child out of lawful wedlock? A casual reading of the deed, with its provisions with reference to the care and attention which were to be given to Mary M. Barclay in her rearing and education, is all that is necessary to sufficiently demonstrate that this result was not only not contemplated by Mrs. Marshall, but would have been almost the last thing that would have occurred to her mind. No mother could have been more tender and solicitous about the future of her own child than Mrs. Marshall evidently was about the future of this girl. That the effect of holding that the plaintiff cannot take any interest in the property in controversy under the terms of the deed would be adding sorrows to the life of one already unfortunate and desolate cannot weigh with us in determining what the language of this deed means. We are irresistibly forced to the conclusion that the plaintiff cannot take any interest whatever under this deed as the child of Mary M. Barclay, and that the meaning of the word child cannot be enlarged so as to embrace him, notwithstanding the use of the word issue in another part of the deed."

The word "child" or "children" in a deed of settlement between a man and woman legally incapable of marrying, cannot be construed to include an illegitimate child then en ventre sa mere, nor further illegitimate children not then begotten. In re Shaw [1894] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 573, 63 L. J. Ch. 770, 71 L. T. N. S. 79, 43 W. R. 43.

In the case of Edwards' Appeal, 108 Pa. St. 283, it was held that a son born out of lawful wedlock, though legitimated by an act of assembly, could not take by purchase under a prior deed of trust to "lawfully begotten children."

Although it is a rule of construction that prima facie the word "child" or "children," when used in a deed, means a legitimate child or legitimate children, where it appeared that an illegitimate child was in being at the time the grantor made a deed of trust in favor of her then unmarried daughter, with a remainder to "the child or children" of the daughter, and was the only child of the grantor's daughter in being at that time, it was held that the grantor would be presumed to have made the deed in question with reference to the existence of such grandchild. Wheatcraft v. Wheatcraft, 55 Ind. App. 283, 102 N. E. 42.

The cases determinative of the question whether an adopted child is within the designation of "children" or a similar phrase in a will or deed, are collated in the note to Matter of Leask, 18 Ann. Cas. 516.

In Pleading.

In Tillery v. Tillery, 155 Ala. 495, 46 So. 582, it was held that a bill was not demurrable as failing to show that the complainant was the legitimate child of the decedent, which alleged that the oratrix was the sole heir of the deceased and the daughter and only child of the deceased, as this was a distinct allegation of heirship, and the word "child" carried with it the meaning of legitimate offspring.

In Insurance Policy.

In Shelton v. Minnis, 107 Miss. 133, 65 So. 114, it appeared that the constitution and by-laws of a mutual benefit association stated the objects and purposes of its organization to be as follows: "The purpose for which the Odd Fellows benefit is created, is to insure the lives of the members . . . and provide an endowment fund to be paid only to the following relatives of deceased members of the association . . . viz: husband, wife, children, mother, father, sister, brother, uncle, aunt, nephew, niece, or dependent relatives." It was contended thereunder that the laws of the association did not authorize it to issue a policy on the life of a mother payable to an illegitimate child of the insured, the word "children" in the by-laws referring to legitimate children alone. In denying this contention, the court said: "It seems to us that in determining who is entitled to receive the benefits of mutual benefit associations, wherein the money contributed by its members provides the fund from which the benefits are paid, we should give a liberal construction to the by-laws of the association so as to effect the purposes of the parties to the contract. However the common law may have limited the civil rights of bastards, it seems clear that the public policy of this state expressed in its inheritance laws carries us far away from the harsh rules of the common law. Section 1655, Code of 1906, recognizes fully and unreservedly the more humane rule that all illegitimates shall inherit from their mother. This statute seems to imply that the mother and not the innocent child shall be held responsible for her sins, and, further, that the illegitimate child shall receive from its dead mother the fruits of her labor or fortune. Is it not fair to assume that it was the purpose of this benefit association to accord to all children of a mother member the same rights and privileges the statute laws of the state have, in principle, given them—whether the children be legitimate or illegitimate? A child capable of inheriting would seem to come within the class designated by the by-laws. Certainly the child has an insurable interest in the life of its mother, and it seems equally certain that the by-laws were not designed to discriminate between legitimate and illegitimate children possessing equal rights to inherit from their mother. The mother in this case believed that her illegitimate daughter was one of her children, and so did the officers of the association. We believe they correctly interpreted the meaning of the by-laws."

The meaning of the term "children" as used to designate the beneficiaries in a life insurance policy is the subject of the notes to Roder's Succession, 15 Ann. Cas. 526, and Martin v. Modern Woodmen of America, Ann. Cas. 1913A 299.

In Will.

GENERAL RULE.

There are certain rules which are applicable to the construction of all wills, one of which is that a gift to "children" prima facie imports legitimate children, Hill v. Crook, 7 Moak (Eng.) 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 42 L. J. Ch. 702, 22 W. R. 137, affirming L. R. 6 Ch. 311, 40 L. J. Ch. 216, 24 L. T. N. S. 488, 19 W. R. 649; Dorin v. Dorin, 13 Moak (Eng.) 90, L. R. 7 H. L. 568, 45 L. J. Ch. 652, 31 Times L. Rep. 281, 23 W. R. 570; In re Eve [1909] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 796, [1909] W. N. 86; as much so as if the very word "legitimate" had been introduced before it, Dorin v. Dorin, supra; In re Ayles, 1 Ch. D. (Eng.) 282, 45 L. J. Ch. 223; In re Bolton, 31 Ch. D. (Eng.) 542, 55 L. J. Ch. 308, 34 W. R. 325. This construction will not yield to mere conjecture, or to anything short of the clearest evidence of an opposite intention. Hill v. Crook, supra. And if the testator has legitimate children, parol or extrinsic evidence cannot be received to show that illegitimate children were intended. Ellis

v. Houstoun, 10 Ch. D. (Eng.) 236; Crosby v. Lewis, 2 Edm. Sel. Cas. (N. Y.) 27; Shearman v. Angel, Bail. Eq. (S. C.) 351, 23 Am. Dec. 166. See also Gardner v. Heyer, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 11. In Crosby v. Lewis, supra, the court said: "In this case the question was as to the meaning of the term 'children,' used in the will of the testator, and whether, in the term 'children,' could be included an illegitimate child. In this case there are legitimate children to answer the description contained in the will—and that being so, I think the illegitimate child is not included. There is nothing in the will itself manifesting any intention to include the illegitimate child, and such an intention cannot be inferred from any facts out of the will, nor can evidence of such facts be admitted for the purpose of showing the intention of the testator."

But in a case wherein it appears that a testator had illegitimate children, it is proper to look into circumstances dehors the will, to see whether there are any persons answering the description of the legatees in the legal sense of the term, and if it appears that there are no such persons, it is then allowable to prove the situation of the testator's family, to enable the court to ascertain who were intended by the testator as the objects of his bounty. Wilkinson v. Adam, 1 Ves. & B. 422, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 163, affirmed 12 Price 570; Swaine v. Kennerley, 1 Ves. & B. 469, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 182; Gill v. Shelley, 2 Russ. & M. 336, 9 L. J. Ch. 68, 39 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 422; Gardner v. Heyer, 2 Paige (N. Y.) 11. See also Miller v. Miller, 79 Hun 197, 30 N. Y. S. 116. In the case first cited it appeared that the testator was never married, but for a long time lived and cohabited with M. Smith, in a dwelling house owned or provided by him and furnished at his expense; during which time, between June, 1806, and March, 1815, she had by him five children. All these children were, with the knowledge and consent of the testator, baptized by his name. One of them died in infancy, and the other four, a son and three daughters, were by him placed at school and acknowledged as his children, and were generally reputed as such by his friends. He died a bachelor, and these children by M. Smith are the only persons he ever acknowledged or recognized as his children. By his will he gave to his son John $10,000, to be paid to him when he arrived at the age of twenty-four, the interest in the meantime to be applied to his maintenance and education. He also gave to each of his daughters $3,000, payable at the age of twenty-one, and the interest in the meantime to be applied to their education and support. He directed his executors and trustees to pay $65 to M. Smith quarter yearly during her life, if she remained single and had no more children. He devised and bequeathed all the residue of his real and personal estate to his executors and trustees and the survivor of them in fee, in trust to pay two-thirds of the income thereof to his son John, and one-third to his daughters during their lives, with remainder to their issue. And he gave cross remainders to the survivors in case any of the children should die without issue. The court said: "The testator could not have intended legitimate children which he might have by a future marriage; for one of the objects of his bounty is described as his son John, and the others as his daughters. It would require too great a stretch of credulity to suppose the testator not only contemplated a marriage and the birth of issue, but that he also anticipated he should have but one son, who would be named John, and that all the other children of the marriage would be daughters; that he should die before they arrived of age, and that they would all need testamentary guardians."

For a general discussion of the admissibility of parol evidence in aid of the construction of a will, see the note to Hitchcock v. Home Missions, Ann. Cas. 1915B 1, wherein the construction of words of relationship as including illegitimates is considered at page 61.

The term "children" in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and hence, where there are legitimate children in existence at the time of the making of the will so as to satisfy the words of the bequest or devise in their primary sense, the law is well settled that under a bequest or devise to "children" as a class, illegitimate or natural children are not included, unless the testator's intention to include them is manifest, either by express designation or necessary implication.

In the case last cited it appeared that a testatrix gave and bequeathed her property "one-twelfth to the children of each of my deceased brothers and sisters;" and "in case of the decease of either, . . . I bequeath his or her share to be equally divided among his or her children." The court held that the word "children," as used by her, did not include the illegitimate great-grandchild of a deceased sister, in the absence of any evidence that the testatrix intended to include that child, saying: "If we adopt as the sense in which the word 'children' was used the ordinary meaning attributable thereto, the illegitimate must be excluded. The description 'child,' 'son,' 'issue,' and words of that nature, includes legitimates only. . . . The mere fact of the existence of lawful children does not make it impossible for the term to be construed so as to include illegitimates

if from other parts of the will it is clear that they were intended to be included in the distribution of the testator's bounty. The same rule that includes grandchildren and great-grandchildren in the term 'children' will include illegitimates, adopted children, step-children, or any other class to whom the term may reasonably apply. . . . The rule at common law under which illegitimates were not deemed to have any heritable blood from their father or mother and could not be given any by the marriage of the parents, finds no place in our system. In its stead the more humane policy of the civil law has been adopted—a policy which considers justice to the innocent as outweighing the controlling idea, so called, of the common law, the discouragement of illegitimacy. The importance of the latter is by no means diminished in legal contemplation, but the injustice and futility of punishing the innocent result of illicit commerce as an effectual warning against the sin of it, is recognized in the more practical and intelligent system under which we live. That situation, which we may reasonably assume the testatrix had in mind in making the testamentary disposition of her property, is quite persuasive in determining what she intended. In view of it, less evidence than under the old system will sufficiently show that the intention was to include illegitimate children in giving to a class as children, the mother of the class being the inheritable blood that induced the bequest; but the existence of the policy referred to cannot do away entirely with the rule that the general term cannot include the particular class unless the intention to do so appears by necessary implication. It was not the policy of the common law alone that led to the rule. So we are not permitted to say that, the policy being changed, the rule has ceased to exist. The plain, ordinary meaning of the word still is, presumptively, legitimate children, but the inference arising from its use, unexplained, is somewhat weakened, so that evidence or circumstances of less weight than before are deemed sufficient to rebut it. . . . Now any reasonable evidence that the testator intended to include illegitimates would be sufficient, and where the class, in order to participate, must do so through the mother, less evidence would include illegitimates than if they were reached through the father in the line of descent. . . . It is said by some text writers that the rule of necessary implication no longer exists. In that they are in error. The rule remains but is satisfied by less evidence. It follows from what has preceded that there must be some evidence to supplement the policy of the statute in order to warrant us in saying that the testatrix intended by the term 'children' to include the illegitimate son of Sallie Yerger. We fail to find any such evidence."

In Heater v. Van Auken, 14 N. J. Eq. 159, the court said: "The residuary clause of the will in question, under which the children of Mary Heater claim title, contains no express designation, by name or otherwise, of her illegitimate children. The testator's intention to include them in that devise, if it exist, must appear by necessary implication from other parts of the will. Does it so appear? The testator, after giving to his wife the sole use of all his real estate during her life, so far as necessary for her comfortable support, gives, in the first place, to his wife's daughter, Mary Heater and her 'children,' all the residue of the profits of the real estate. He then declares it to be his will that his wife and her daughter and daughter's 'children' aforesaid shall have the management, use, and profits of all his goods and chattels during the life of his wife. By the residuary clause, the testator, after the decease of his wife, gives all the residue of his estate, both real and personal, to the said Mary Heater during her life, and after her decease to her 'children,' to be divided equally among them. These are the only provisions in the will in favor of the children of Mary Heater, as a class, by the designation of 'children.' None of them contain the least intimation, on the part of the testator, of an intention to enlarge the legal import of the term 'children' used in the will, much less any necessary implication of such intention. If these clauses stood alone there would be no room for question. But the will contains other provisions in favor of the illegitimate children of Mary Heater, which are relied upon as furnishing evidence of an intention on the part of the testator to include them in the general designation of 'children.' After making the provisions already referred to, and giving the use of all the moneys due him to his wife during her life, the testator, after the death of his wife, gives to Mary Heater's son John one hundred and fifty dollars, to be paid to him when he shall arrive at full age, and to the said Mary's second son, William, one hundred dollars, to be paid to him when he shall arrive at full age; and he further orders and directs, that if his wife shall die before the said John and William should arrive at the age of twenty-one, they shall have the interest of the moneys due the testator to assist them in obtaining education until they arrive at full age. These clauses show that John and William were the reputed sons of Mary Heater, and that the testator recognized them as such; and if Mary Heater had then been unmarried, and had no legitimate children, they would have raised a strong presumption that the testator intended to include them under the general designation of children. But at the date of the will Mary Heater was a married woman and had lawful children, who fully answered the designation given to the intended objects of the testator's bounty. In such case the mere fact that the testator has recognized the illegitimate offspring as a son or child will not entitle him to take under a devise to children. . . . But the provisions of this will, so far from raising a necessary implication that the testator intended by the term children to include the illegitimate children of Mary Heater, afford a strong presumption of a directly contrary intention. The testator, by the several clauses of his will, made provision for the 'children' of Mary Heater as a class. These provisions, by their terms, clearly operate in favor of her legitimate children only. He then makes special provision for her two illegitimate sons by name. He gives to each a legacy payable at twenty-one, and in the event of the death of his widow before that time, makes provision for their education. He makes no special provision whatever for either of her legitimate children, who were younger, and as it would seem, in a situation more to require this peculiar provision for their protection. This marked distinction between the two classes of children indicates a discrimination in the testator's mind between them, and an intention not to include the illegitimate sons under the general provisions in favor of the children. It cannot be presumed that the testator intended to make the illegitimate rather than the legitimate children of Mary Heater the favorite objects of his bounty, which must be the result if they share the benefits of the residuary devise."

In Dorin v. Dorin, 13 Moak (Eng.) 90, L. R. 7 H. L. 568, 45 L. J. Ch. 652, 31 Times L. Rep. 281, 23 W. R. 570, the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) said: "My Lords, I adhere to the conclusions which I was able, upon the consideration of the case of Hill v. Crook, L. R. 6 H. L. (Eng.) 265, to draw from the various authorities there cited. According to those conclusions, I feel myself bound to ask whether, with a knowledge of the position, and what are called the surrounding circumstances, at the time the testator made his will, there is anything upon the face of the will which enables me to say that those who in the eye of the law were not his children, were intended by him to take under the general expressions used in his will, namely, 'I leave her' (meaning his wife) 'at liberty to direct the disposal of the property amongst our children, by will, at her death, in such manner as she shall think fit, and should she make no will I desire that the property existing at her death shall be divided as far as it may be practicable to do so equally between my children by her.' The testator who used these expressions had been married to the wife of whom he speaks the day before he made his will. He had had two children by her, who at that time were of age, as I gather, the elder of about eight or nine, and the younger nearly three. They were clearly illegitimate children. I ventured to put to the learned counsel who argued the case at the bar, this question: supposing that it had been in the mind of the testator, and we do not know and cannot know what his mind was except by his own expressions—supposing it had been in his mind not to take any notice of these children in his will, or to make any provision for them by his will, but to make a provision for them in some other way, and to use his will to designate merely his wife and any legitimate children who might be afterwards born, would not every word in the will be satisfied? Undoubtedly every word would be satisfied. Therefore, if that is so, you are not able to say that the will upon the face of it constrains you to depart from what is the ordinary and prima facie legal meaning of the word 'children.' When the case is considered that is the true result. There is no case whatever which would enable us, in the interpretation of this will, to strain the word 'children' beyond its ordinary legal meaning."

In Bealafeld v. Slaughterhaupt, 213 Pa. St. 565, 62 Atl. 1113, it appeared that the testator married a woman who had at the time an illegitimate son about seven years old who was not a son of the testator; that this son lived with the testator and his wife as a part of the family until he was seventeen years old and until shortly before the making of the will in question; that the testator had by this wife seven children who were the plaintiffs or whose interest was owned by the plaintiffs; that in his will the testator gave all his property to his wife, the mother of the children named, for life or widowhood, and at her death the property to be sold by his executor and to be divided share and share alike "among her children and mine." The court said: "We have no doubt that the illegitimate child of the mother can take nothing under the terms of this will, because of the well-established rule of law that the word 'children' and like words are to be applied only to legitimate children unless the illegitimate children are otherwise described so as to leave no doubt that they are to be included."

In Thompson v. McDonald, 22 N. C. 463, it appeared that a testator bequeathed all his property to his two sisters, with an express limitation that if either of them should die without a child or children, living at her death, the whole should pass to the surviving sister. In denying the contention that the limitation over to one sister did not take effect, because the other died leaving an illegitimate child, the court said: "Now, without deciding upon the effect of a bequest explicitly made to the children which a woman may have, whether legitimate or natural, or upon the effect of a limitation, in case a woman should not leave living at her death any child, whether legitimate or natural, it is enough to say, upon the present occasion, that it is perfectly clear that the word 'children' per se imports in law legitimate children; and that none but legitimate children can be understood as embraced therein, unless, upon the instrument to be construed, it manifestly appears that natural children were thereby intended. . . . Nor is this legal import of the term 'children' at all altered by the acts of our legislature, which permit, where a woman dies intestate, and without legitimate children, 'those commonly called illegitimate or natural children' to succeed to the property of their mother. They are not thereby made, in law, the children of their reputed mother, but enabled to take her property where there are none such, under the description of persons 'commonly called illegitimate or natural children.'"

In Hicks v. Smith, 94 Ga. 809, 22 S. E. 153, the court said: "What is the legal status of this plaintiff? Whether he sues as the heir at law of his reputed father, or by virtue of a supposed right as a purchaser under his great-grandfather's will, he cannot recover, because the estate to his father was limited by the express terms of the will to enjoyment by him during his natural life; at his death, the remainder interest in fee was vested in his children, and he having none, in the children of his brother. Does this plaintiff come within the class of persons who could take under this provision of the will? Was he in legal contemplation the child of Thomas A. Parsons? Was he such a child as the testator can be legally presumed to have had in contemplation at the time of the execution of the will? We have seen that, though he might have been of the blood of Thomas A. Parsons, and while he was, at the instance of his reputed father, made legitimate by an appropriate order of the court, yet that the legal effect of such judicial legitimation was only to so far confer upon him a status as a legitimate child as to enable him to inherit from his father. For all other purposes he was still a bastard. He could take by force of the statute as the heir of his father, but he could not thus take as a purchaser under the will of his great-grandfather. There is nothing in the will justifying the inference that it was the intent of the great-grandfather to include him as a legatee thereunder. His rights are referable to strict law. No presumptions will be indulged in his favor, and we will presume that the testator intended to use the word children with reference to its strict legal significance, rather than as in its conventional sense it is occasionally employed. To undertake to presume at this late day that it was the purpose of this testator to provide by his will for all his descendants, legitimate or illegitimate, and that he intended as he employs the term children to apply it indiscriminately to all descendants without reference to antecedents or the circumstances of birth, not only does violence to his express desire legally manifested by the terms of his will, but it may not wholly consist with his idea of the propriety of indiscriminately mixing up descendants. His ideas upon the propriety of begetting illegitimate, and after they were begotten, to what extent the father's obligation to provide for them would justify their adoption, might have greatly differed from those of his grandson. He might have been perfectly willing that this grandson in the high and honorable state of lawful wedlock, without reference to the walks of life from whence his wife might come, should transmit his name and with it his estate to his posterity, while, on the other hand, he might not have been willing that, stepping aside from this honorable estate, this grandson should bring reproach upon his name by conferring it upon one whose only title to estate or name resulted, not from the order of nature operating in accordance with the ordinances of God, but by virtue of the statute in such case made and provided. At any rate, whatever may have been the intention of the testator with respect to such descendants, he used no such language as expressly or by fair implication can justify the inference that he intended to use the word children in other than the sense in which, according to its strict legal significance, it is authorized to be employed. He used no language which would embrace within its meaning the plaintiff or designate him as an intended recipient of his bounty. He therefore took no estate under the will in question, has no interest in the property in controversy."

An illegitimate child of a sister of the testator, although described in the earlier part of the will by the word "nephew," has been held not to take under a subsequent general gift to the "children" of the testator's brothers and sisters. In re Hall, 35 Ch. D. (Eng.) 551. And an illegitimate child referred to as "my grandson" was held not entitled to take under a bequest to "children." Megson v. Hindle, 15 Ch. D. (Eng.) 198. So, under a bequest in an English will to the "children" of an Englishman domiciled in England, who afterwards became domiciled in a foreign country, and there married the mother of his illegitimate children, whereby they became legitimate by the law of that country, such children cannot take under his will in England, on the ground that the word "children" in an English will must be construed to mean children lawfully begotten, unless an intention appears in the will to use the term in a different sense. Boyes v. Bedale, 1 Hem. & M. 798, 71 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 349; In re Wilson, L. R. 1 Eq. 247, affirmed sub nom. Shaw v. Gould, L. R. 3 H. L. 55. See also Goodman v. Goodman, 3 Giff. 643, 66 Eng. (Reprint) 565; Matter of Wright, 2 Kay & J. 595, 69 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 920; Udny v. Udny, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 441.

But the rule that illegitimate children cannot take pari passu with legitimate children, in the absence of specific directions, does not apply to a gift over, and in Smith v. Jobson, 32 Sol. J. (Eng.) 662, 59 L. T. N. S. 397, it was held that an illegitimate child took thereunder.

While not deciding whether the term "children" would generally embrace illegitimate as well as legitimate issue, in Carroll v. Carroll, 20 Tex. 731, it was held that under a devise to "my wife and children," the term included all the children of the wife, had by the testator, whether born before or after their marriage and who were alive at his death, but did not include a son of the wife who was not a child of the testator.

A devise to the "children lawfully begotten" of a son does not include a daughter born out of wedlock but subsequently legitimated by the statute on the marriage of her parents. Honolulu Invest. Co. v. Rowland, 14 Hawaii 271.

QUALIFICATION OF RULE.

Under the fundamental rule in the construction of wills that the intention of the testator, if not inconsistent with some rule of law, must control, and that, to ascertain that intention, the court will look to the circumstances attending the making of the will, and the state and extent of the testator's property and his family, it is held that under a bequest or devise to "children," that word is, when the intention so to interpret it is clearly evinced by him, to be construed as including illegitimate children.

In the leading English case of Hill v. Crook, 7 Moak 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 42 L. J. Ch. 702, 22 W. R. 137, affirming L. R. 6 Ch. 311, 24 L. T. N. S. 488, it was said that there were two classes of cases in which the prima facie interpretation of the word "children" in a will as meaning only legitimate children might be departed from. And this more concrete statement of the rule by the English court is supported, though not in terms, by the decisions of the American courts in the cases cited under the foregoing general rule. One class of cases is that in which it is impossible from the circumstances of the parties that any legitimate children could take under a general bequest to "children" in a will. See as so construing a will under those circumstances, Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, 1 Madd. 430, 56 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 159; Woodhouselee v. Dalrymple, 2 Meriv. 419, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1000; Bayley v. Snelham, 1 Sim. & St. 78, 57 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 31, 5 Ves. Jr. 534, 31 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 721; Hill v. Crook, 7 Moak 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 42 L. J. Ch. 702, 22 W. R. 137, affirming L. R. 6 Ch. 311, 24 L. T. N. S. 488; In re Eve [1909] 1 Ch. 796, [1909] W. N. 86; Clifton v. Goodbun, L. R. 6 Eq. 278; In re Brown, L. R. 16 Eq. 239; In re Frogley's Estate [1905] P. 137, 74 L. J. P. 72, 92 L. T. N. S. 429, 54 W. R. 48, 21 Times L. Rep. 341; Bentley v. Blizard, 4 Jur. N. S. 652; Tuttle v. Woolworth, 74 N. J. Eq. 310, 77 Atl. 684; Howell v. Tyler, 91 N. C. 207. See also Holt v. Sindrey, L. R. 7 Eq. 170, 38 L. J. Ch. 126. Thus, where a testator who was a bachelor, or a testatrix who was a spinster, bequeathed property to "children," it was held that an illegitimate child was meant, and not a legitimate child. Frogley's Estate (Eng.) [1905] P. 137, 74 L. J. 72, 92 L. T. N. S. 429, 54 W. R. 48, 21 Times L. Rep. 341; Clifton v. Goodbun, L. R. 6 Eq. (Eng.) 278; Beachcroft v. Beachcroft, 1 Madd. (Eng.) 430, 56 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 159.

In the case of the Frogley's Estate, supra, it appeared that a testatrix, who died a spinster, left a will by which she gave all her property to her sister, in trust for all the children who might "belong to" her (the testatrix) at the time of her death, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, to and for their own sole use and benefit, and if there should be only one child "belonging to" her at the time of her decease, then for the sole use and benefit of that child. And, in the event of there being no child or children "belonging to" her at the date of her death, the testatrix left all her property to her sister, the said Jane Frogley, absolutely. It also appeared that about two years after the date of the will, the testatrix gave birth to an illegitimate daughter, who married and survived her. Bargrave Deane, J., said: "I am of opinion that the grant should go to the illegitimate-daughter of the testatrix. In my view there is a great distinction to be drawn between gifts, whether by deed or will, by a man in favor of illegitimate children and gifts by the mother of an illegitimate child or children. It may well be argued that, in the former case, there is an immoral consideration; but I cannot see that such an argument applies in the case of gifts by the mother. . . . Therefore, as the child in the present case did undoubtedly 'belong to' the testatrix, that child is the person she intended to benefit, and there is nothing in the policy of the law to affect this gift. The grant will, therefore, go to Gertrude Smith, and my order to this effect will include a declaration that, on the true construction of this will, the said Gertrude Smith being the only child belonging to Sarah Eggar Frogley, the testatrix, at the date of the death of the said Sarah Eggar Frogley, is entitled to the property passing under the will."

So, where a testator devises or bequeaths property to the "child" or "children" of another person, knowing that that person has then illegitimate and no legitimate children, it has been held that it was his intention to convey a present benefit to the illegitimate children then existing, as it would not be presumed that he intended a present benefit to a person who did not then exist and might never come into being. Woodhouselee v. Dalrymple, 2 Meriv. 419, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1000; Bayley v. Snelham, 1 Sim. & St. 78, 57 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 31, 5 Ves. Jr. 534, 31 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 721; In re Brown, L. R. 16 Eq. (Eng.) 239; Bentley v. Blizzard, 4 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 652; Tuttle v. Woolworth, 74 N. J. Eq. 310, 77 Atl. 684; Howell v. Tyler, 91 N. C. 207. See also In re Horner, 37 Ch. D. (Eng.) 695, 57 L. J. Ch. 211, 58 L. T. N. S. 103, 36 W. R. 348. In Tuttle v. Woolworth, supra, the following facts appeared: The testator devised to the trustees a house and lot, which they were directed to permit his daughter to use and occupy during her natural life, with this direction: "And after her death to convey the same to her children, or if it shall be deemed more desirable by my executors, and for the interest of said children, then to sell the said house and lot and divide the proceeds thereof among said children, share and share alike, but should the said Caroline die without issue her surviving, then I direct my said executors to sell and convey the said house and lot and distribute the proceeds thereof among her heirs," etc. The testator likewise gave to his executors and trustees certain bonds and stocks upon the trust that they should collect the income therefrom and use the same for the purpose of paying all expenses incidental to the maintenance of the above-mentioned house and lot, and if there was any balance of the said income remaining unexpected for that purpose, to pay the same to his said daughter during her natural life and upon her separate individual receipt; "and after her death to set off the said bonds and stock to her children or theirs; if the said Caroline shall die without issue her surviving or children of such issue, then said bonds and stock shall revert to my estate," etc., one of the portions to his executors in trust for the use of his daughter Caroline during her natural life, "the income of said part to be paid to my said daughter Caroline upon her separate individual receipt; and after her death the principal of said part is to be distributed among her children, if any shall her survive. If she shall leave no child or children surviving or issue of such child or children who shall likewise be entitled, then such part shall go to my son and remaining daughter [naming them]." Some time prior to the execution of this will the testator's daughter Caroline had joined a semi-religious and sociological society, whose members rejected the ideas of the marriage relation which are prevalent and lawful in this country. She there contracted an alliance with a man who became the father of her only child, which child now claims the fund in the hands of the complainant as the child or issue of the testator's daughter Caroline, and as one who came within the terms of the will as such child or issue. This so-called child, now the claimant of the fund in question, was born in October, 1870, prior to the execution of the will under the terms of which the fund is to be distributed. It appeared that, notwithstanding the usual course of life which the daughter Caroline had chosen, the friendly and filial relations between her and her father and the other members of the family were never broken. The testator was a man of large wealth and of wide business experience. He was president of a large and successful banking institution, and a man of intelligence and high character. Some correspondence between the father and this daughter was in evidence; it was filled with expressions of respect and affection on the part of both. When her child was born she reported the fact to her father (on November 17th, 1870) by a letter, in which she gave the name of the child's father, and stated that she had given to the child himself for his middle name the family name of the testator's family, and that name the claimant still bears. It was manifest from the evidence that the testator knew that his daughter had contracted an illicit alliance with the man who was the father of her child, and that the child which was the fruit of this irregular relationship was illegitimate, and that he was her only child, her only issue, and that this knowledge came to him before the execution of his will. In fact, it appears that he had executed a prior will, which was in force at the time of the birth of the child, and that he destroyed it and executed the present will after that event and after his knowledge of it, and it is claimed, on the part of the claimant, that a proper construction of the document will award to him the whole fund, the income of which was by the will given to the daughter (his mother) for life, for the reason that the testator must by necessary implication have intended to benefit this illegitimate child, there being no legitimate issue to answer the demonstration of the will. The court said: "When the facts in this case are considered, it is quite evident that the testator meant to make provision for the only child of his daughter who was living at the date of the will, of whom he had any knowledge, or for a class of her children who might be born to her during her association with the society of which she was a member, which membership for ought he knew would continue during the remainder of her life. He could have had in contemplation, under the circumstances disclosed by the testimony, nothing but illegitimate children, because at the time he made his will there was no probability that she would ever be the mother of children born in lawful wedlock. It must therefore be implied from the terms of the will and the circumstances surrounding its execution that the testator meant that the remainder of the share of his estate in question should go to the then living illegitimate child, or to any other illegitimate children that might be the fruit of her irregular relationships in the society which she had joined."

In Bentley v. Blizard, 4 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 652, it appeared that the bequest in that case "was so expressed as clearly to exclude all but illegitimate children."

In Holt v. Sindrey, L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 170, 38 L. J. Ch. 126, it appeared that a testator believing his daughter's marriage to one John Lattimer to be lawful, and the children of the union legitimate, whereas the contrary was the fact, gave certain property in trust during the life of his daughter Mary, the wife of John Lattimer, for her sole use, exclusive of her then present or any future husband, and after the death of his said daughter to pay the same unto all and every child or children of his said daughter begotten or to be begotten, in equal shares if more than one, and if there should be but one child then the whole to be in trust for such one child, and to be vested in the same children when they attained twenty-one, or died under that age leaving issue. And in case there should not be any such child of his said daughter Mary Lattimer, or in case all such children (if any), should die under twenty-one without leaving issue, then the testator gave the fund in trust for other persons. In holding that the children took thereunder, the court said: "Where a gift is made to a child or to children as a class the natural and proper meaning of the word 'child' or 'children' is legitimate child or legitimate children; but if the object of a gift is clearly described and clearly ascertainable from the words of the will, it matters nothing whether the object of the gift be legitimate or illegitimate, because an illegitimate child, or a number of illegitimate children as a class, if properly described, may be a legatee or legatees just as well as legitimate children. But in the construction of a will the primary and proper signification of every word is to be attributed to it. In this case it has been argued that the testator must be taken to have meant legitimate children only, and that as there are no legitimate children to answer the description this gift must altogether fail. I think it is perfectly clear upon the face of this will that the testator understood that his daughter Mary Lattimer was the wife of John Lattimer. It appears upon the face of the will that he believed her to be the lawful wife of John Lattimer.

It also appears upon the face of the will, from his referring to children 'begotten', that he knew there were in existence children born of the body of his daughter, and that they were known to him as children of this marriage. The fact that from an unknown circumstance that marriage was not a lawful marriage, though believed by the testator to be a lawful marriage; and the fact that from that unknown circumstance the children begotten of Mary Lattimer were, although the testator did not know it, illegitimate, seems to me to have nothing to do with the question whether they are or are not sufficiently described in the will. If there had been any legitimate children begotten of the body of Mary Lattimer, the description would properly apply to those children; but when it is an ascertained fact that there are no other children but the children begotten of the marriage with Lattimer; and when it is certain that children begotten of the testator's daughter are the objects of his bounty, and that there are none other to answer the description but the children of the marriage with Lattimer, I cannot say that these children were not clearly and properly described on the face of this will as the objects of the testator's bounty. The words of the will are in themselves intelligibly construed in their natural sense by reference to what it is certain the testator knew, viz., that there were children begotten of the marriage of his daughter with Lattimer." To the same effect see In re Lowe, 61 L. J. Ch. (Eng.) 415, 40 W. R. 475.

Likewise, under the presumption which obtains in England that a woman past a certain age is incapable of bearing children, it has been held that a bequest to the "children" of a widowed sister who was within a month of the age of sixty-eight years at the date of the will, and who then had two illegitimate and no legitimate children, was held to be a bequest to the illegitimate children. In re Eve [1909] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 796, [1909] W. N. 86, wherein Swinfen Eady, J., said: "I propose merely to state the law as laid down by the highest authority and apply it to the case. The term 'children' in a will prima facie means legitimate children, and if there is nothing else, the circumstances that the person whose children are referred to has illegitimate children will not entitle those illegitimate children to take. Then Lord Cairns said in Hill v. Crook, L. R. 6 H. L. 282: 'But there are two classes of cases in which that prima facie interpretation is departed from. One class of cases is where it is impossible from the circumstances of the parties that any legitimate children could take under the bequest. A familiar example of that might be given in this way:—Suppose there is a bequest "to the children of my daughter Jane," Jane being dead, and having left illegitimate children, but having left no legitimate children. There, inasmuch as the testator must be taken to have known the state of his family, and must be taken to have intended to benefit some children of his daughter Jane, and inasmuch as she had no children who could be benefited except illegitimate children, rather than that the bequest should fail altogether the courts will hold that those illegitimate children are intended, and they will take under the term "children." Applying that statement of the law to this case, I have to ask myself who could the testatrix have meant when she made this gift to the children of Mary Ann Burns, the old widowed sister who was then living with her. There were two illegitimate children whom she knew all about, and there never could be any other or legitimate children who could take under this bequest. Lord Cairns said that one class of cases in which illegitimate children may take is, where there is a gift to children and it is impossible that legitimate children should take. That is this case. In the circumstances which existed at the date of the will it was impossible that any legitimate children should take. There were none and never could be any. It is impossible to come to any other conclusion than that the testatrix intended these two children to take, and I must give effect to that intention—an intention which I arrive at not from any conjecture as to what the testatrix meant, but from the will itself with the assistance of such surrounding circumstances as I am bound to look at. I therefore decide that the two illegitimate children of Mary Ann Burns are entitled to shares in the residue." See also In re Horner, 37 Ch. D. (Eng.) 695, 57 L. J. Ch. 211, 58 L. T. N. S. 103, 36 W. R. 348.

Compare Matter of Overhill, 1 Smale & G. (Eng.) 362, 17 Eng. L. & Eq. 323, 22 L. J. Ch. 485, 17 Jur. 342, 65 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 159, wherein the court said: "Now, the only circumstances, to create any doubt here, were the age of Mary Bentley at the date of the will [46], and the circumstances under which the testatrix made her will; that she knew that Mary Bentley had children, and believed her to be the wife of the individual whom she mentions as her husband. All that supports the view taken . . . in favor of the illegitimate children, but is contradicted, . . . for it is impossible not to see that this lady might have had legitimate children, and they could not have been excluded from the benefit of this gift. However improbable the contingency, if there had been legitimate children of Mary Bentley, they undoubtedly would have taken. According to the argument in favor of the only children which she had, they would have been entitled to take with the others, and under the same description. That is forbidden by the rule of law; and therefore, with great regret, I must hold that they are not entitled under this bequest."

The other class of cases referred to as exceptional in Hill v. Crook, 7 Moak 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 42 L. J. Ch. 702, 22 W. R. 137, affirming L. R. 6 Ch. 311, 24 L. T. N. S. 488, is that wherein there is, on the face of the will itself, and on a just and proper construction and interpretation of the words used in it, an expression of the intention of the testator to use the term "children," not merely according to its prima facie meaning of legitimate children, but according to a meaning which will apply to, and which will include, illegitimate children. See as applying that rule, Wilkinson v. Adam, 1 Ves. & B. 422, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 163, affirmed 12 Price 470; Meredith v. Farr, 2 Y. & C. Ch. 525, 63 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 235; *Hill v. So, an illegitimate child will take under a subsequent gift to "children," where there has been a sufficient description of the child in the first part of the will to show the testator's intention to include that child. In re Humphries, 24 Ch. D. (Eng.) 691; In re Bryon, 30 Ch. D. (Eng.) 110, 55 L. J. Ch. 30; In re Smilter [1903] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 198, [1902] W. N. 236.

In the case last cited it appeared that a testator gave certain property to the children of a nephew "including amongst such children and child Samuel Smilter Revell, the illegitimate son of my said nephew." It was held that that illegitimate son was to be considered as one of the children for all the purposes of the will, and was included in a later bequest in the same will to the children of the testator's nephews and nieces, though not specifically mentioned therein.

Where a clause of a testator's will directed the trustees at the death of either of his daughters to pay to each of the children of the deceased daughter an equal portion of her share, discharged of said trust, the lineal descendants of any deceased child to take the part of such share as their parent would have taken if alive, it was held that the testator intended by this devise to the children of his deceased daughter to include illegitimate as well as legitimate children, especially where he presumably had full knowledge of the existence of an illegitimate child of his daughter at the time of the execution of his will. Eaton v. Eaton, 88 Conn. 269, 91 Atl. 191.

In the case of In re Horner, 37 Ch. D. (Eng.) 695, 57 L. J. Ch. 211, 58 L. T. N. S. 103, 36 W. R. 348, it appeared that the testator described his sister as "the wife of Thomas Horner," when he knew well that she was not and could not be legally the wife of the person named. Hence, it was held that his use of the correlative term "children" meant the children or offspring born of that connection, and therefore, the sister having no legitimate children, it was inferred that the testator meant her illegitimate children.

In Hughes v. Knowlton, 37 Conn. 429, it appeared that a testator's will provided that the remainder of his property, after the payment of his debts, should be divided equally between his two daughters, "meaning and intending that all the children that have been or may be born of their bodies shall become heirs to the same." It was held that the daughters took a fee, and that the words quoted had reference to the fact that both daughters had illegitimate children, and were meant to express the testator's disapprobation of the rigorous common-law rule as to the incapability of bastards to take property by descent.

In Meredith v. Farr, 2 Y. & C. Ch. (Eng.) 525, 63 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 235, it appeared that a testator bequeathed one-half of his estate to the children of his daughter Mary, and the other half to the children of his daughter Catherine. At the date of his death, his daughter Mary had six children born in lawful wedlock and two illegitimate children, while his daughter Catherine had one legitimate and three illegitimate children. These latter three illegitimates were named in the will in another bequest to them. It was held that the legitimate children of Mary were entitled to one-half the bequest, and that all the children of Catherine, whether legitimate or not, took the other half.

Where a testatrix devised property to her daughter for life and at her death to "all the children of her body," and it appeared that at the time these words were written there had been born of the body of her daughter two legitimate and four illegitimate children, it was held that the latter were to be considered as included in the words "all the children of her body," and in addition two other illegitimate children born after the death of the testatrix were to be included. Sullivan v. Parker, 113 N. C. 301, 18 S. E. 347. Compare, as to the holding with respect to after-born illegitimate children, In re Harrison [1894] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 561, 63 L. J. Ch. 385.

A devise of property to a daughter for life, and at her death to "be equally divided amongst her children," was held in Bennett v. Toler, 15 Grat. (Va.) 588, 78 Am. Dec. 638, to include an illegitimate son. The court said: "And so adhering to the principle of the rule, when the law makes the bastard child of a woman her child; endows him with every attribute of a child born in wedlock; includes him in the very class designated as children, to whom her estate is to pass in the vent of her dying intestate; a testator speaking of her children, the words must be construed to include in the class all who in law are her children."

The right of illegitimates to inherit from or through their mother is discussed in the note to Barron v. Zimmerman, Ann. Cas. 1914D 574.

In a few instances it has been held that the word "children," as used by a testator, meant his illegitimate children, to the exclusion of his legitimate children by a former wife. Lepine v. Bean, L. R. 10 Eq. (Eng.) 160; Elliott v. Elliott, 117 Ind. 380, 20 N. E. 264, 10 Am. St. Rep. 54; Gelston v. Shields, 16 Hun 143, affirmed 78 N. Y. 275. Thus, in Elliott v. Elliott, supra, it appeared that a testator devised his property to his wife in fee "that she may dispose of the same as she may think best for herself and my children." The court held that by the words "my children" the testator meant his illegitimate children, to the exclusion of his legitimate children by a former wife. The court said: "Here are two classes of persons to whom the words will apply, viz., two legitimate children in England, and four illegitimate children in this country. It may be conceded that when a man speaks of his children, he is ordinarily understood to mean his legitimate children. But where it is plain from the surrounding circumstances that he used the words in a different sense, they cannot be given that meaning. . . . Fourteen years prior to his death George Elliott abandoned his wife and children in England and came to America, where he married another woman, by whom he had four children. In his will he bequeathed all his property, both real and personal, to the woman whom he married in America, in trust for the support of herself and his children, to be sold, and the proceeds expended as she might, in her judgment, deem best. So far as appears from the record in this case she had no knowledge of the existence of the plaintiff in this case; indeed, the legal presumption is that she had no knowledge that George Elliott ever had another wife, for had she possessed such knowledge she would be chargeable with the crime of living in open and notorious adultery. No such charge is made. The plaintiff, at the time of the death of his father, was about fifteen years of age, while the defendants herein were small children. In the light of these surrounding circumstances can it reasonably be said that George Elliott, by his will, intended to provide for the plaintiff, and leave his children here unprotected for and unprotected? The case of Gelston v. Shields, 78 N. Y. 275, is, in its facts, similar to this case. In that case Henry Shields, the testator, by his will, bequeathed certain of his property to his wife, Catharine, and bequeathed the remainder to his children, without naming them. After his death one Jane Shields, or Jane Valentine, appeared, and, claiming to be his widow, instituted suit for a dower interest in his estate, and succeeded. She had two children, who claimed to be the legitimate children of Henry Shields, deceased; but the court, construing the will in the light of the surrounding circumstances, held that the testator, in bequeathing his property to his children, must have intended to bequeath it to his children by Catharine Shields, who was designated in the will as his wife. Great stress was placed upon the fact that the will named Catharine Shields, as the guardian of the minor children of the testator. So, in this case, we think one strong circumstance in the case tending to show the intention of the testator, is the fact that George Elliott constituted Mary Ann Elliott the trustee of his property, to be expended by her for the support of his children. In our opinion the words 'my children' in the will in question mean the children of George Elliott by his wife Mary Ann Elliott."

While a general bequest to "children" may be good as a gift to illegitimate children as a class, provided it clearly appears that they were intended to be the objects of the gift, no gift, however express, to unborn illegitimate children is allowed by law, nor under a gift, good as to illegitimate children as a class, will after-born illegitimate children be permitted to take. Pratt v. Mathew, 22 Beav. 328, 52 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 1134, 4 W. R. 418, affirmed 2 Jur. (N. S.) 1055, 25 L. J. Ch. 886, 4 W. R. 772; Hill v. Crook, 7 Moak (Eng.) 1, L. R. 6 H. L. 265, 42 L. J. Ch. 702, 22 W. R. 137, affirming L. R. 6 Ch. 311, 24 L. T. N. S. 488; Crook v. Hill, 3 Ch. D. 773, 46 L. J. Ch. 119; Howarth v. Mills, L. R. 2 Eq. 389; Holt v. Sindrey, L. R. 7 Eq. 170, 38 L. J. Ch. 126. And see the dicta to this effect in the majority of the cases cited throughout this note. Compare Sullivan v. Parker, 113 N. C. 301, 18 S. E. 347.

Thus in Howarth v. Mills, L. R. 2 Eq. (Eng.) 389, it was held that a bequest by a spinster who had gone through the form of marriage with the widower of her deceased sister to her "children, legitimate or otherwise," did not include after-born children, and that only the child living at the date of the will took thereunder.

The rule last stated is subject to the exception found in those cases which have construed the word "children" to mean illegitimate children begotten before the death of the testator, as children born after the date of the will and before the death of the testator, or children born in due time after his death, or en ventre sa mere. Gordon v. Gordon, 1 Meriv. (Eng.) 148, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 628; Wilkinson v. Adam, 1 Ves. & B. 422, 35 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 163, affirmed 12 Price 470; Occleston v. Fullalove, L. R. 9 Ch. (Eng.) 147, 43 L. J. Ch. 297, 22 W. R. 305; Crook v. Hill, 3 Ch. D. 773, 46 L. J. Ch. 119; In re Hastie, 35 Ch. D. (Eng.) 728, 56 L. J. Ch. 792, 57 L. T. N. S. 168, 35 W. R. 692; In re Loveland [1906] 1 Ch. (Eng.) 542, [1906] W. N. 46; Holt v. Sindrey, L. R. 7 Eq. (Eng.) 170, 38 L. J. Ch. 126; Dilley v. Matthews, 11 Jur. N. S. (Eng.) 425, 13 W. R. 676. See also In re Bolton, 31 Ch. D. (Eng.) 542, 55 L. J. Ch. 398, 34 W. R. 325; Earle v. Wilson, 17 Ves. Jr. 528, 34 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 205. Compare Mortimer v. West, 3 Russ. 370, 38 Eng. Rep. (Reprint) 615; In re Lowe, 61 L. J. Ch. (Eng.) 415, 40 W. R. 475. In Gordon v. Gordon, supra, Lord Chancellor Eldon said: "There are two questions in this case. Upon the first of these, which is the general question, I remain of my former opinion, that it is possible to hold, consistently with the doctrine of Lord Coke, that, if an illegitimate child en ventre sa mere is described so as to ascertain the object intended to be pointed out, it may take under that description. Then, with regard to the application of that principle to the present case, I studiously abstain from expressing any opinion as to what it would be if the words were 'to my child,' while I decide that, the words being only 'the child with which A. B. is now pregnant,' those words will do so as to give effect to the intention in its favor. . . . I repeat that this is not to be taken as governing either the question of what would be my decision if the words were 'to my child,' or that which would arise out of a bequest to an illegitimate child not only unborn, but not in esse, even though it may be sufficiently pointed out as the child of a particular mother."

The general question whether a gift to "children" and the like includes a child en ventre sa mere, is treated in the notes to Villar v. Gilbey, 7 Ann. Cas. 130, and In re Salaman, 12 Ann. Cas. 199.

In several instances it has been held that an illegitimate child who has been subsequently legitimated is entitled to take under a general bequest to "children." In re Andros, 24 Ch. D. (Eng.) 637, 52 L. J. Ch. 793, 32 W. R. 30; In re Grey [1892] 3 Ch. (Eng.) 88; Harness v. Harness, 50 Ind. App. 364, 98 N. E. 357; Gates v. Seibert, 157 Mo. 254, 57 S. W. 1065, 80 Am. St. Rep. 625; Morton v. Morton, 62 Neb. 420, 87 N. W. 182; Smith v. Lansing, 24 Misc. 566, 53 N. Y. S. 633; Bennett v. Toler, 15 Grat. (Va.) 588, 78 Am. Dec. 638. In Gates v. Seibert, supra, it was held that a statute (R. S. Mo. 1899, § 2917) making antenuptial children legitimate, though a part of the statute of descents and distributions, was not limited in its effect to inheritance in case of intestacy but applied to those claiming to take as purchasers under a will. Thereunder, it was held that a child born out of wedlock but legitimated by the subsequent marriage of the parents and the father's recognition of her as his child shared in a devise by the father to his "children," with the legitimate children of the marriage.

It has been several times held that where a will definitely refers to illegitimate children as "children of the testator," a subsequent use of the word "children" will be deemed to include such illegitimates. In re Parker [1897] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 208, 76 L. T. N. S. 421; In re Walker [1897] 2 Ch. (Eng.) 238, 66 L. J. Ch. 622, 77 L. T. N. S. 94, 45 W. R. 647; Lobb v. Lobb, 21 Ont. L. Rep. 262, 16 Ont. W. Rep. 200, affirmed 22 Ont. L. Rep. 15, 17 Ont. W. Rep. 212, 2 Ont. W. N. 44. For a general discussion of the construction to be applied to words repeated in a will, see the note to Roskrow v. Jewell, Ann. Cas. 1914B 63.

v.

JORDAN.

Kansas Supreme Court—February 10, 1917.

99 Kan. 814; 163 Pac. 188.

Intoxicating Liquors — Regulation of Transportation — Validity.

Under the laws of this state cities of the first class have power to pass ordinances regulating the transportation of intoxicating liquors for legal purposes and prohibiting such transportation for illegal purposes.

Ann. Cas. 1918B.—18.

[See note at end of this case.]

Municipal Corporations — Ordinances — Subject and Title.

The ordinance attacked contains but one subject, and that subject is clearly expressed in the title.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912C 192.]

Intoxicating Liquors — Regulation of Transportation — Validity.

A city ordinance regulating the transportation of intoxicating liquors for legal purposes, and prohibiting such transportation for illegal purposes, is consistent with the law of this state regulating the transportation and delivery of intoxicating liquors.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such an ordinance as is mentioned in section 1 of this syllabus is not an unlawful regulation of interstate commerce.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such an ordinance as is mentioned in section 1 of this syllabus is a law of this state within the meaning of the United States Constitution, and of the Webb-Kenyon Act (Part 1, 37 U. S. Stat. at Large, ch. 90, p. 699, 4 Fed. St. Ann. (2d ed.) 593).

[See note at end of this case.]

Municipal Corporations — Offense under Ordinance — Negating Exceptions.

In charging an offense under a city ordinance, it is not necessary to plead any of the exceptions named in the ordinance, where such exceptions are not contained in the clause which creates the offense.

[See 6 Ann. Cas. 726; 13 Ann. Cas. 364; Ann. Cas. 1913B 135.]

Intoxicating Liquors — Regulation of Transportation — Validity.

An ordinance which attempts to regulate the transportation of intoxicating liquors within the city for legal purposes, and to prohibit such transportation for illegal purposes, but which does not permit the transportation of such liquors for all of the purposes recognized as legal by the law of the state, is invalid; and a judgment quashing a complaint drawn under such an ordinance will be sustained.

[See note at end of this case.]

(Syllabus by court.)

Appeal from District Court, Wyandotte county: HUTCHINGS, Judge.

Prosecution of Harry Jordan for violation of municipal ordinance. Judgment for defendant. Municipality appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Hugh J. Smith, Lee Judy and Thomas M. Van Cleave for appellant.

Thomas A. Pollock, R. J. Ingraham and L. E. Durham for appellee.

William H. McCamish, as amicus curiae.

[815] MARSHALL, J.—The plaintiff appeals from a ruling of the trial court quashing a complaint drawn under a city ordinance. The ordinance, including its title, is as follows:

"ORDINANCE No. 11,500.

"An Ordinance relating to the suppression of the sale and delivery of intoxicating liquors; declaring property used in connection therewith nuisances, and providing for the abatement of such nuisances.

"Be it Ordained by the Board of Commissioners of the City of Kansas City, Kansas.

"SECTION 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation to drive or operate upon any boulevard, street, avenue, alley, public highway, or public ground of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, any car, wagon, truck, or vehicle, the cargo of which consists wholly or partly of any intoxicating liquor; excepting as hereinafter provided in Section 6.

"SECTION 2. The driving or operating upon any boulevard, street, avenue, alley, public highway or public ground of said City any car, wagon, truck or vehicle, the cargo of which consists wholly or partly of any intoxicating liquor, and such car, wagon, truck or vehicle, and the cargo thereon, and any animal or animals drawing the same, are hereby declared to be common nuisances, excepting as hereinafter provided in Section 6.

"SECTION 3. The driving or operating upon any boulevard, street, avenue, alley, public highway or public ground of said city of any car, wagon, truck or vehicle, upon which is inscribed, lettered, pasted, or upon which is carried so as to be exposed to the public view, the name of any person, firm or corporation engaged in the manufacture, sale or distribution of intoxicating liquors, or upon which vehicle or cargo appears any word, sign, emblem, device or object which indicates in any way that the cargo of such vehicle above mentioned and referred to consists wholly or partly of intoxicating liquors, is hereby declared to be unlawful and to constitute a common nuisance.

"SECTION 4. Any person, company, firm or corporation violating any of the provisions of Sections 1, 2 and 3 of this ordinance shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction before the Police Judge shall be fined in any sum not less than One Hundred Dollars ($100.00) nor more than Five Hundred Dollars ($500.00), and be imprisoned not less than thirty days nor more than six months for each offense, and adjudged [816] to payment of costs, and shall be committed to the city jail until such fines and costs are paid.

"SECTION 5. The Chief of Police or any police officer of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, is hereby authorized upon the arrest of any person or persons found in charge of, operating, or assisting to operate any car, wagon, truck or vehicle upon any of the boulevards, streets, avenues, alleys, public highways, or public grounds of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, the cargo of which consists wholly or partly of any intoxicating liquors, or upon which appears any matter prohibited by Section 3 hereof, shall forthwith seize such conveyance or vehicle and an animal or animals drawing the same, and all intoxicating liquors thereon and hold the same until the trial of the person or persons arrested for driving or operating such conveyance or vehicle and upon conviction of such person or persons in the police court and the adjudging of such liquors and property to be a nuisance as defined in Section 1 and 2 hereof, all intoxicating liquors together with their containers so seized shall be forthwith destroyed by direction of the Chief of Police, and other property so seized shall be advertised for sale by the Chief of Police giving ten days' notice in the official city paper of the time and place of sale, and the proceeds derived from such sale shall be applied first, to the expense of the sale, and any surplus shall be applied to the payment of fines and costs of the person or persons convicted of operating such nuisance if the property belonged to such person or persons; and if such property belonged to any person or persons not a party to the suit, such proceeds shall be paid to the owner of the property; provided, that any person may have a trial as to his rights of property in any of the articles so seized by serving a notice in writing to that effect upon the Chief of Police at any time before the trial of the person from whom such property was taken, whereupon, the Police Judge shall set the same down for trial and may hear and determine the same so far as it affects the right of the officer to seize and hold the same for a violation of this ordinance, which trial may be had in connection with or separately from, the trial of the person from whom the property or goods were taken.

"SECTION 6. Nothing in this ordinance shall be construed to prevent any person from bringing into the city, personally, intoxicating liquors purchased outside of the State of Kansas, nor to prevent any such purchaser from receiving through a common carrier within the city intoxicating liquors purchased by any such person outside of the State of Kansas and to which intoxicating liquors the title vested in the purchaser outside of the State of Kansas, when such intoxicating liquors are intended to be possessed and received by such purchaser for his personal use.

"SECTION 7. All persons, firms or corporations doing business outside of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, which shall sell in such outside state or territory any intoxicating liquors to residents of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, shall file daily with the City Clerk of the City of Kansas City, Kansas, a carbon copy of each and every order taken upon [817] which such intoxicating liquor is sold, and also shall file with the city clerk the names and addresses of every purchaser to whom such intoxicating liquor is consigned, and a failure to so report such sales shall be a misdemeanor and upon conviction of such failure any person so failing shall be fined in any sum not less than five dollars nor more than twenty-five dollars."

The count of the complaint against which the motion to quash was filed is as follows:

"Before the Police Court, J. H. Brady, Judge, J. M. Dunlavy complains of Harry Jordan, and being duly sworn, on oath says that he, the said Harry Jordan, at and in the city of Kansas City, county of Wyandotte and State of Kansas, and on or about the 2nd day of November, 1915, did unlawfully drive and operate upon the streets, avenues, boulevards, alleys and public highways of said city, a certain truck or wagon, the cargo of which then and there consisted of intoxicating liquors, to wit, about eleven (11) empty and sixteen (16) full cases of beer, the said Harry Jordan not being engaged in any manner as a common carrier delivering liquors previously purchased outside of the state of Kansas, but was transporting said beer about the streets for an unlawful purpose, in violation of Section 1 of Ordinance No. 11500 of the ordinances of the City of Kansas City, Kansas."

The grounds of the defendant's motion to quash the complaint are that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute an offense, and that the ordinance is invalid for a number of stated reasons.

1. The defendant insists that the ordinance is void because no power to enact it has been delegated to the city. The defendant argues that, because section 5532 of the General Statutes of 1915 authorizes cities to pass ordinances prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquor and suppressing common nuisances, and no other authority is specifically given, the city has no power to pass any other ordinance having for its object the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquor.

Section 1221 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads:

"The mayor and council may levy and collect a license tax upon and regulate any and all callings, trades, professions and occupations conducted, pursued, carried on or operated within the limits of such city, including . . . express companies and agencies,

. . . and all wagons and other vehicles transporting merchandise or passengers for pay."

This statute is a part of the charter powers of cities of the first class operating under the mayor and council form of government, [818] and is retained in the charter powers of such cities operating under the commission form of government. (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 1665.) Under both forms of government cities of the first class have power—

"To make all needful police regulations necessary for the preservation of good order and the peace of the city, and to prevent injury to or the destruction of or interference with public or private property." (Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 1094, 1508.)

This is known as the general welfare clause. Broad and varied powers are granted by this clause. A brief statement of these powers is found in section 895 of volume 3 of McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, where the author says:

"Specifically, under the general welfare clause, or by virtue of general grant of power (as will clearly appear from the sections which follow), municipal corporations are authorized to enact appropriate and reasonable ordinances, to preserve the health and provide necessary and desirable sanitary regulations for the local population, to abate nuisances and regulate various kinds of occupations that may become nuisances or detrimental to the public health; to provide for the public safety by preventing obstructions of the streets, public ways and places, regulating the use of vehicles thereon, the storing of explosives, blasting, the movement of street cars and railroad trains, the erection of buildings and other structures by establishing fire limits, and forbidding wooden buildings in designated portions of the corporate area; to preserve the morals of the inhabitants by forbidding certain acts offensive to just ideas and sentiments of decency and propriety of conduct; to establish and regulate markets, hucksters, hawkers, etc., regulate milk inspection and prevent adulteration of foods; to provide for the weighing and measuring of articles sold to the inhabitants; and finally to require or prohibit the doing of many other things incident to congested centers, to the end that the public welfare may be advanced.

"In brief, under this general grant of power, ordinances may be passed which are necessary and beneficial, and they will be adjudged valid by the courts, provided they are reasonable and consonant with the general powers and purposes of the local corporation, and not inconsistent with the laws and policy of the state."

Section 5505 of the General Statutes of 1915 imposes on mayors, marshals, police judges, and police officers of cities the duty to notify the county attorney of any violation of the intoxicating liquor law of this state, and prescribes severe punishment and forfeiture of office for failure to comply with the statute. Sections 686a to 686o of the code of civil procedure (Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 7603-7617), provide a simple and effective method for the removal of city officers who fail to [819] perform any duty enjoined on them by law. Section 5559 of the General Statutes of 1915 provides:

"That every wife, child, parent, guardian or employer, or other person, who shall be injured in person or property or means of support by any intoxicated person, or in consequence of intoxication, habitual or otherwise, of any person, shall have a right of action in his or her own name against any incorporated city of this state wherein the intoxicating liquors were sold, bartered or given away in violation of law which caused the intoxication of such person, for all damages actually sustained, as well as exemplary damages."

It would not be reasonable to impose these serious consequences on cities and on city officers and at the same time to deprive cities of the right to exercise every legitimate power to suppress the illegal traffic in intoxicating liquors. Sections 1094, 1221, 1508 and 1665 of the General Statutes of 1915, when construed with the statutes of this state concerning intoxicating liquors, and with those imposing heavy duties and severe penalties on cities and city officers, should be held to grant power to cities to pass ordinances regulating the transportation of intoxicating liquors for legal purposes, and prohibiting such transportation for illegal purposes. Such ordinances may properly specify the class of persons that may engage in such lawful transportation, may license or otherwise authorize them to engage therein, and may impose such restrictions and conditions as will secure their obedience to the laws of the state and to city ordinances. For the purposes of transportation, intoxicating liquors should not be classed with harmless and useful articles of trade and commerce. Such liquors should be classed with those articles that are known to be dangerous and over which cities have control for the preservation of the peace and for the protection of the health, morals and safety of the city. In other words, intoxicating liquors should not be classed with flour and clothing, but should be classed with explosives, poison, diseased animals, and articles that spread contagion and disease among men, and should be treated accordingly. Much of the reasoning found in State v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. 96 Kan. 609, Ann. Cas. 1917A 612, 152 Pac. 777, is applicable here. The city has authority to regulate the legal transportation in intoxicating liquors and to prohibit their illegal transportation. O'Neal v. Harrison, 96 Kan. 339, 150 Pac. 551; Kansas City v. Henre, 96 Kan. 794, 153 Pac. [820] 548; Desser v. Wichita, 96 Kan. 820, 153 Pac. 1194, L.R.A.1916D 246; and Kleinhein v. Bentley, 98 Kan. 431, 157 Pac. 1190, support the conclusion that the city has authority to pass such an ordinance.

2. It is urged that the ordinance is void because the subject thereof is not clearly expressed in its title, and because the ordinance contains more than one subject. An examination of the ordinance and of its title shows that neither of these contentions can be rightfully upheld.

3. It is argued that the ordinance is void because it is repugnant to the provisions of sections 5544 to 5554 of the General Statutes of 1915. These sections of the statutes regulate the transportation and delivery of intoxicating liquors in this state, and are commonly known as the Mahin law. Section 5544 reads:

"It shall be unlawful for any railroad company, express company or other common carrier, or for any person, company or corporation to carry any intoxicating liquor into this state or from one point to another within the state for the purpose of delivery, or to deliver the same to any person, company or corporation within the state except for lawful purposes."

Ordinances regulating the transportation of intoxicating liquors for purposes recognized as legal by the laws of this state, and prohibiting the transportation of such liquors for all illegal purposes, are entirely consistent with the Mahin law. Such ordinances are valid when the purposes for which intoxicating liquors may be lawfully transported within this state are recognized.

4. The defendant argues that the ordinance is a regulation of lawful interstate commerce and therefore void. Omitting that part of the Webb-Kenyon law which is irrelevant to the subject now under consideration, the title and text of the act are as follows:

"An act divesting intoxicating liquors of their interstate character in certain cases.

"That the shipment or transportation, in any manner or by any means whatsoever, of any spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor of any kind, from one state, territory, or district of the United States, . . . which said spirituous, vinous, malted, fermented, or other intoxicating liquor is intended, by any person interested therein, to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used, either [821] in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such state, territory, or district of the United States, . . . is hereby prohibited."

(Part 1, 37 U. S. Stat. at L. ch. 90, p. 699; 4 Fed. St. Ann. [2d ed.] 593.)

Under that act, there is no interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors except as the law of the state may recognize the legality of their sale or transportation. In a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered January 8, 1917, in Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland R. Co. 242 U. S. 311, 37 S. Ct. 180, that court said:

"As the state law forbade the shipment into or transportation of liquor in the state whether from inside or out, . . . and as the Webb-Kenyon act prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of all liquor 'intended to be received, possessed, sold or in any manner used, either in the original package or otherwise, in violation of any law of such State,' there would seem to be no room for doubt that the prohibitions of the state law were made applicable by the Webb-Kenyon Law." (p. 321.)

That decision completely disposes of the defendant's contention concerning interstate commerce.

5. The defendant insists that the ordinance is not a law of the state within the meaning of the Webb-Kenyon act. Kansas City is an agency of the state in the exercise of governmental functions. The city is authorized and commanded to assist in the suppression of the illegal traffic in intoxicating liquors. The ordinances of the city are local laws, passed under the authority of the state. In New Orleans Waterworks Co. v. New Orleans, 164 U. S. 471, 17 S. Ct. 161, 41 U. S. (L. ed.) 518, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"In view of the adjudged cases, it cannot be doubted that the legislature may delegate to municipal assemblies the power of enacting ordinances that relate to local matters, and that such ordinances, if legally enacted, have the force of laws passed by the legislature of the state and are to be respected by all." (p. 481.)

In New Orleans Water-Works Co. v. Louisiana Sugar Refining Co. 125 U. S. 18, 8 S. Ct. 741, 31 U. S. (L. ed.) 607, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"So a by-law or ordinance of a municipal corporation may be such an exercise of legislative power delegated by the legislature to the corporation as a political subdivision of the state, having all the force of law within the limits of the municipality, that it may properly be considered as a law, within the meaning of this article of the constitution of the United States." (p. 31.)

[822] In North American Cold Storage Co. v. Chicago, 211 U. S. 306, 15 Ann. Cas. 276, 29 S. Ct. 101, 53 U. S. (L. ed.) 795, the court said:

"In this case the ordinance in question is to be regarded as in effect a statute of the state, adopted under a power granted it by the state legislature, and hence it is an act of the state within the Fourteenth Amendment." (p. 313.)

The defendant's argument that the ordinance is an interference with interstate commerce must be based on the proposition that the ordinance is a law of the state within the meaning of the federal constitution. If the ordinance is a law of the state within the meaning of constitutional inhibitions, it must be a law of the state when those inhibitions are removed. It follows that when the constitutional protection of interstate commerce in intoxicating liquors is withdrawn, there is nothing left with which the ordinance can interfere; and it follows that the ordinance, passed under authority given by the legislature, is a law of the state within the meaning of the Webb-Kenyon act.

6. The defendant contends that "the ordinance is not validated by the allegation in the complaint that the defendant was transporting the liquors about the streets for an unlawful purpose, in violation of section 1 of ordinance No. 11500." The complaint alleges more than is necessary. The exceptions named in section 6 of the ordinance are not a part of the clause which creates the offense, and therefore need not be set out in the complaint. In State v. Thompson, 2 Kan. 432, this court said:

"The rule is: If there be any exceptions contained in the same clause of the act which creates the offense, the indictment must show negatively that the defendant, or the subject of the indictment, does not arise within the exception. But if a proviso be in a subsequent clause or statute, or although in the same section, yet if it be not incorporated with the enacting clause by any words of reference, it is in that case matter of defense for the other party, and need not be negatived in the pleading." (Syl. ¶ 2.)

In Kansas City v. Garnier, 57 Kan. 412, 46 Pac. 707, in a prosecution under a city ordinance, this court said:

"In a clause of such an ordinance distinct from the one defining the offense there was a proviso to the effect that it is unnecessary to furnish a description of property purchased from manufacturers or wholesale dealers who have an established place of business, or which has been [823] purchased at an open sale. Held that, the proviso being in a subsequent clause and not incorporated in the definition of the offense, it was unnecessary to negative it in the complaint." (Syl. ¶ 4.)

This rule was followed in State v. Thurman, 65 Kan. 90, 68 Pac. 1081; State v. Buis, 83 Kan. 273, 111 Pac. 189; and in State v.

It was not necessary for the city to plead any of the exceptions named in the ordinance, nor any existing under the laws of this state.

7. Another question presented by the motion to quash, and embraced in the attack on the validity of the ordinance, but not argued by either of the parties to this action, is this: Are the exceptions contained in section 6 of the ordinance broad enough to include the recognized lawful traffic in intoxicating liquors in this state? Section 5499 of the General Statutes of 1915 is as follows:

"Any person who shall directly or indirectly sell or barter any spirituous, malt, vinous, fermented or other intoxicating liquors, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in any sum not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than five hundred dollars, and be imprisoned in the county jail not less than thirty days, nor more than ninety days; provided, that any person, copartnership or corporation engaged in the wholesale drug business and having a stock, exclusive of alcohol, of not less than sixty thousand dollars may sell alcohol for medicinal, mechanical and scientific purposes to registered pharmacists who are actually and in good faith engaged in the retail drug business, such sales to be in quantities of not less than one gallon nor more than five gallons."

This statute gives certain wholesale druggists a legal right to sell alcohol to certain registered pharmacists. If the ordinance does not expressly or impliedly make an exception in favor of all legitimate transportation of intoxicating liquors, it cannot be upheld. In this state, a registered pharmacist who legally purchases alcohol from a wholesale druggist has a right to have that alcohol transported over the streets of the city and delivered to him at his place of business. Because the exceptions in section 6 of the ordinance do not include all transportation in intoxicating liquor recognized as legal by the laws of this state, the ordinance must be held invalid. It follows that the motion to quash the complaint was properly sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

NOTE.

In the reported case the court sustains the validity of an ordinance making it unlawful to drive on any street in the city a vehicle loaded in whole or in part with intoxicating liquors, or bearing the name or advertisement of a manufacturer or a dealer in intoxicants. The court holds that the ordinance is a legitimate exercise of the police power, and that it is a "law of the state" within the meaning of the Webb-Kenyon Act. The subject of state regulation of the transportation of intoxicating liquors is discussed in the note to State v. Missouri Pac. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1917A 612, 622. Whether a municipal ordinance is a "law" is considered in the note to In re Siegel, Ann. Cas. 1917C 684.

MANCHESTER TOWNSHIP SUPERVISORS

v.

WAYNE COUNTY COMMISSIONERS.

Pennsylvania Supreme Court—April 16, 1917.

257 Pa. St. 442; 101 Atl. 736.

Statutes — Repeal — Effect of Repeal of Repealing Act — Revival of Former Act.

County commissioners must keep in repair so much of an abandoned turnpike as passes through a township, as required by Act April 20, 1905 (P. L. 237), and Act April 25, 1907 (P. L. 104), where Act May 10, 1909 (P. L. 499), repealing such prior acts, was itself repealed by Act March 15, 1911 (P. L. 21), since the rule that, where a repealing statute is repealed, the original statute is revived, is not affected by Const. art. 3, § 6, providing that no law shall be revived, amended, or extended by reference to its title only, and that so much as is revived shall be re-enacted and published at length.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Such constitutional provision is restricted in its application to express statutory revivals of prior statutes, and does not abrogate the common-law rule that, when a repealing statute is itself repealed, the first statute is revived without formal words, in the absence of any contrary intention, expressly declared or necessarily implied from the enactment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Court of Common Pleas, Wayne county: SEARLE, Judge.

Action by Supervisors of Manchester Township, plaintiffs, against Commissioners of Wayne county, defendants. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Charles A. McCarty and M. E. Simons for appellants.

E. C. Mumford and J. O. Mumford for appellees.

[444] STEWART, J.—In 1898 the County of Wayne, by proceedings instituted under the Act of June 2, 1887, P. L. 306, which provides for the taking over by counties of turnpike roads, or such parts of them as lay within their respective limits, and freeing the same from tolls, appropriated the Little Equinunk and Union Woods Turnpike Road, which had been constructed through Manchester Township in said county. From that time to the present this turnpike road has been used and maintained as a township road by Manchester Township, free of tolls. In 1916, the supervisors of the township presented their petition to the Court of Common Pleas setting forth the above stated facts and praying that a writ of mandamus issue, directed to the commissioners of the county, requiring them, in relief of the township, to maintain and keep in repair said appropriated turnpike road. An alternative writ followed, to which the commissioners made answer admitting the facts to be as stated, but denying the legal liability of the county for the maintenance and repair of the road. After a full hearing of the case, a peremptory writ was awarded. The appeal is from the judgment so rendered. A brief review of the legislation touching the condemnation and appropriation by counties of turnpike roads is necessary to an understanding of the real issue. The condemnation of this particular road was, as we have said, under the general Act of June 2, 1887, P. L. 306. By the eleventh section of this act it is provided that, "When any turnpike, or portion thereof, shall have been condemned under the provisions of this act, for public use, free of tolls or toll gates, and the assessment of damages therefor shall have been paid by the proper county, such turnpike or portion thereof shall be properly repaired and maintained at the expense of the proper city, township or district as other public roads or streets therein are by law repaired and maintained." As will be observed, by this act, the burden of the maintenance of such turnpike road, after [445] its taking over, except as to such parts thereof as are within the limits of the city, is placed upon the townships through which the road passes. The act makes the turnpike, when paid for, a public road, to be kept and maintained as other public roads. The law so continued until 1905, when by the Act of April 20, 1905, P. L. 237, it was provided that, "When any turnpike or part thereof has been or may hereafter be appropriated or condemned for public use, free of tolls, under any existing laws, and the assessment of damages therefor shall have been paid by the proper county, such turnpike, or part thereof, shall be properly repaired and maintained at the expense of the county, city or borough in which the said turnpike, or part thereof, lies, or the same may be imposed under any existing laws by the said county, city or borough." By the second section of the act, all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the terms of the act were repealed. One certain effect of this act was to relieve the townships of the burden of repair and maintenance of the roads taken over which had been imposed on them by the earlier act. This Act of 1905 was a wholly separate and independent piece of legislation. It was not an amendment of any act, nor did it repeal any act; it did not pretend to do either. It did, however, supersede so much of any existing act as was repugnant to any of its provisions. There was but one existing act—the Act of June 2, 1887, supra,—that could possibly conflict with it, and that only in the one provision in the earlier act that imposed the expense of repair and maintenance upon the township, whereas the later act imposed it on the counties. It follows that the Act of June 2, 1887, remained in full force, unaffected by the Act of April 20, 1905, except in the particular mentioned. Then followed the Act of April 25, 1907, which, as indicated in its title, was amendatory of the Act of April 20, 1905. But the amendment went no further than to bring within the provisions of the earlier act "abandoned turnpikes and turnpikes belonging to [446] companies or associations which had been dissolved, or may hereafter be dissolved," leaving the burden of repairing and maintenance where the Act of April 20, 1905, had placed it, namely, on the counties, except in cities and boroughs. This amending act was without other effect on the Act of June 2, 1887. Then came the Act of May 10, 1909, which, in Section 1, provided as follows: "When any turnpike, or part thereof, has been or may hereafter be appropriated, or condemned for public use, free of tolls, under any existing laws, and the assessment of damages therefor shall have been paid by the proper county, or when any turnpike company or association has heretofore abandoned or may hereafter abandon its turnpike or any part thereof; or when any turnpike company or association owning any turnpike has theretofore been dissolved, or may hereafter be dissolved, by proceedings under any existing laws of this Commonwealth, such turnpike, or part thereof, shall be properly repaired and maintained at the expense of the township, city or borough in which the said turnpike, or part thereof, lies." By the second section of this act, the Acts of April 20, 1905, and of April 25, 1907, are expressly repealed, so too, "all other acts, or parts of acts, in so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of this act." Next came the Act of March 15, 1911, P. L. 27, which in its terms expressly repealed, without more, the Act of May 10, 1909, leaving the general Act of 1887 otherwise unaffected. The effect of this act was to restore to the original Act of June 2, 1887, the eleventh section as it had appeared in the original enactment, but which had been superseded by the Act of 1905.

The present proceeding was begun on the theory that the Act of May 10, 1909, which in express terms repealed the Acts of 1905 and 1907, itself having been repealed by the Act of March 15, 1911, it necessarily resulted that both these repealed acts were revived and restored. If this be a correct view of the law, it must follow that the case was properly ruled in the court below. It is insisted [447] on the part of appellants that no such effect can be given to the repealing Act of 1909, in view of the constitutional provision, Section 6, of Article III, of the Constitution, which declares that, "No law shall be revived, amended, or the provisions thereof be extended, or conferred, by reference to its title only, but so much thereof as is revived, extended or conferred, shall be re-enacted and published at length." If this latter view be correct, then it must result that with the fall of the Acts of 1905 and 1907 fell also the Act of June 2, 1887, as an efficient and operative piece of legislation, inasmuch as the eleventh section of the latter act, as originally passed, imposed the expense of repair and maintenance on the township, and this section having been repealed by Act of 1905, placing the burden on the counties, except as a revival follows of one or other of these acts upon the repealing Act of 1909, the burden of repair and maintenance rests nowhere, and the Act of 1887 is worse than idle. Certainly it could not have been within the legislative intent to produce such result. While legislative intent is properly a subject for consideration in the interpretation of statutes, it counts for nothing when the matter for consideration is the conformity or want of conformity to constitutional requirements. It is the legal consequences of the repeal of the Act of 1909, and that alone, that we have here to consider. Did the repeal of that act operate to revive and renew the several acts which it had repealed? If this question were to be decided on common law principles, it would be of simple solution, since it is a familiar rule governing statutory construction under the common law, that when a repealing statute is itself repealed, the first statute is revived without formal words for that purpose, in the absence of any contrary intention, expressly declared or necessarily to be implied from the enactment. The contention on the part of appellants, however, is that the constitutional provision above quoted has abrogated this common law rule, with the result that since the adoption [448] of the Constitution no act can be revived or renewed, except in the manner there prescribed. That the provision may be so read, without doing violence to the language employed, must be admitted. This, however, is far from conclusive, for if with equal reason a restricted meaning can be derived from the language employed, in the absence of any express repeal of the common law rule, the presumption that none was intended must prevail. We say this in view of the situation that existed previous to the adoption of the Constitution, suggesting, as it does, the mischief that the provision was manifestly intended to remedy. It is a matter of common knowledge, at least among those whose duties have familiarized them with the history of legislation in the State, that prior to the adoption of the present Constitution, it was of so frequent occurrence that statutes were revived, or amended as the case might be, by simple reference to the title, that it became almost a settled custom to so legislate, with the unfortunate result that much legislation was enacted improvidently, without that intelligent consideration and understanding of the matters involved which is so essential to the procurement of wise and wholesome legislation. The purpose of the provision was to put an end to this method of legislating by requiring in every case that the proposed revival or amendment be re-enacted and published at length, to the end that intelligent action might better be secured. "Inseparable from the history of the Constitution and the facts surrounding its creation, and therefore a potent element in the construction of its general terms, is the consideration of the objects and purposes to be accomplished, or the mischiefs designed to be remedied or guarded against. In the interpretation of statutes, these reflections may enlarge or restrict the natural and literal significance of the words used, and they are applicable with the same effect to the interpretation of the Constitution." Endlich on Interp. Stat. Sec. 518.

If we are correct in our statement as to the object and [449] intent to be accomplished by the constitutional provision—and this we think cannot be questioned—it would seem to follow that notwithstanding the general terms employed in the constitutional provision, the plain intent was that it should be restricted in its application to what may be designated as express statutory revivals as distinguished from revisals by operation of law, since the latter could not fall within the mischief the provision was intended to guard against, nor could its requirements as to re-enactment and publication be at all applicable where the revival was by common law. This particular constitutional provision is not peculiar to our State. In one form or other it appears in most state constitutions adopted in recent years. The fact that in many of the states which have adopted the provision a legislative enactment has followed forbidding revival of statutes by the common law rule, shows how general is the conception that more is needed to overcome the common law rule than such a constitutional provision as we are considering, because of the latter's susceptibility to two different constructions. In Pennsylvania we have no such statutes. A very well considered and entirely convincing opinion is to be found in the case of Wallace v. Bradshaw, 54 N. J. L. 175, 23 Atl. 759. The provision in the constitution of the State of New Jersey differs in no material respect from the provision in our own, and exactly the same question we have here was there adjudicated in a reversal of the lower court. In the opinion of the court, as delivered by the Chief Justice, this occurs (176): "The phrase that 'no law shall be revived or amended by reference to its title alone' cannot be forced into a signification that will comprehend any revival that is not a statutory one, for there is not, and cannot be, a revival by operation of law, that can be said to operate on the act revived 'by reference to its title alone.' The clause obviously would have to be interpolated to impart to it that breadth of efficacy claimed for in the decision before us. Thus, it would be necessary [450] to transmute it into some such form as this: 'No law shall be revived by operation of law, nor shall it be revived or amended by reference to its title alone.' And the harmony that would exist in the sentence thus constructed, and its freedom from all tautology, would seem to demonstrate that these methods of revival are diverse and distinct things, and that only one of them is embraced in this constitutional expression. I cannot agree to the proposition that because the people, in their constitution, have declared that a law shall not be revived by a statutory reference to its title, that they have thereby likewise declared that it shall not be revived by the operation of a well-known rule of the common law. And this is plainly the sense in which the provision was expounded."

What is here stated applies with equal force to the provision in the Constitution of this State, since there is no material difference in the language employed, and our conclusion is the same with respect to the latitude to be allowed it.

The judgment is affirmed and the appeal is dismissed.

NOTE.

Effect of Repeal or Amendment of Repealing Statute as Reviving Repealed Statute.

Introductory, 281.

Common-law Rule, 281.

Statutory Rule:

Rule Stated, 283.

Limitations of Rule, 284.

Introductory.

In the great majority of jurisdictions rules of statutory construction have been enacted abrogating the common-law rule that the repeal of a repealing statute operates to revive the original statute. However there are many decisions in those jurisdictions which were rendered prior to the adoption of the statutes, and these have been cited infra, in the subdivision Statutory Rule, for the value they may have as authority in those jurisdictions which still adhere to the common-law rule. In the jurisdictions cited under the subdivision Common-law Rule the only decisions reported treat of the common-law rule, and reference should be had to the statutes of those jurisdictions for possible modifications thereof which have not been passed on judicially.

Common-law Rule.

The rule that by the repeal of a repealing statute the original statute is thereby revived is to be found in the earliest records of the common law and is undisputed. As was said by Sir William Blackstone: "If a statute that repeals another, is itself repealed afterwards, the first statute is hereby revived, without any formal words for that purpose." 1 Blackstone Com. 90. This doctrine is uniformly adhered to except where it has been changed by statute. Harrison v. Walker, 1 Ga. 32; James v. Dubois, 16 N. J. L. 285; Wallace v. Bradshaw, 54 N. J. L. 175, 23 Atl. 759, reversing 53 N. J. L. 315, 21 Atl. 941; Brinkley v. Swicegood, 65 N. C. 626; Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Holliday, 45 Okla. 536, 145 Pac. 786; Buckwalter v. Lancaster County, 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 272; Ex p. Doran, 2 Pars. Eq. Cas. (Pa.) 467; York County v. Wrightsville, etc. R. Co. 7 Watts & S. (Pa.) 236; Lamb v. Cleveland, 19 Can. Sup. Ct. 78. And see the reported cases. See also the cases cited infra in the subdivision Statutory Rule, but decided prior to the adoption of the various statutes, as there pointed out.

The common-law rule is based on the presumption of an intention to revive on the part of the legislature. Thus it was said in Butner v. Boifeuillet, 100 Ga. 743, 28 S. E.

464: "While the general rule seems to be that where the provisions of an act, repealing a prior statute upon the same general subject, are in turn themselves repealed, such repeal operates to restore to their efficacy as law the provisions of the prior repealed statute, such general rule is not without clearly defined and well recognized exceptions. The rule itself rests upon the theory that each expression of the legislative mind represents the legislative intent at the time of that expression, and that the repealing statute indicates a change of the legislative purpose as expressed in the prior law, and, therefore, when the repealing statute is in turn repealed, without any reference to the pre-existing law, the presumption is that the legislature intended by the repeal to restore the order of things existing under the repealed statute."

So where it appears that the legislature did not intend that the original statute should be revived the rule does not apply. Patapsco Guano Co. v. North Carolina Board of Agriculture, 52 Fed. 690, affirmed 171 U. S. 345, 18 S. Ct. 862, 43 U. S. (L. ed.) 191, 43 Fed. 174, wherein it was said: "I am not disposed to deny the truth of the general proposition that the repeal of a repealing law does, in the absence of any special circumstances, revive the law repealed. . . . But the question is one of the intention of the legislature. In the case before the court the legislature of North Carolina had, by the law of 1885, made an appropriation to the industrial school of $5,000 annually. By an act of assembly, passed in 1887, which must be construed to be substituted for the act of 1885, and therefore to be a repealing law, the legislature of North Carolina appropriated to such school all the surplus arising from the proceeds of the tax on fertilizers. In 1891, an act of the legislature was passed, the effect of which, it is conceded, was to repeal the appropriation made to the state industrial school by the act of 1887. It is contended by Mr. Hill, for the plaintiff, that the repeal in 1891 of the act of 1887 revived the act of 1885, and that it results from this revival that $5,000 of the fund arising from the present tax on fertilizers is now appropriated to the state industrial school. The same argument is used to show that by existing legislation $500 of the proceeds of the tonnage tax on fertilizers is annually appropriated to the North Carolina Industrial Association, which is, as the court is informed, a negro agricultural fair. The argument drawn from this contention is that the state to-day appropriates at least $5,500, annually, of the money derived from the tonnage tax to purposes other than the cost of inspection of fertilizers, and that this fact proves that the amount of the tonnage tax was intentionally made larger than was necessary. The court is of the opinion that such was not the intention of the legislature. This court had at its June term, 1890 (43 Fed. 609), decided that the then existing tax upon commercial fertilizers was unconstitutional, and had given as a reason for one of its positions, to wit, that the then existing tax on fertilizers could not be supported on the ground of its being an inspection tax, the fact that a large portion of the proceeds of such tax was appropriated for other than inspection purposes. At the ensuing session of the legislature of North Carolina in January, 1891, an act was passed which has been hereinbefore recited, and which in express terms repeals all laws conflicting with itself. By the first section of this act, which imposes a tax of twenty-five cents per ton on all commercial fertilizers, the legislature declares the purpose of the tax to be for inspection only. The previous law has imposed a tax of $500 per brand upon every brand and description of fertilizer, and declared the same to be a privilege tax. The tonnage tax of twenty-five cents is declared by the first section of the act of 1891 to be substituted for the $500 privilege tax. This court will not infer, simply for the purpose of enforcing an ancient rule of law having for its basis only the presumed intention of legislatures, that the purpose declared in the act of 1891 is falsely declared, and by an implication which contradicts the declared will of the legislature, that the repeal of sections of the code which had been declared unconstitutional should have only the effect of reviving earlier laws equally objectionable with those that were attempted to be repealed."

Where the repealing statute consists of a revision and substitute for the original it is held that no revival results from the repeal of the revision. Butner v. Baifeuillet, 100 Ga. 743, 28 S. E. 464, wherein it was said: "But this rule can have no application in a case where the statute repeals absolutely a prior existing law and substitutes for it another and more comprehensive scheme of legislation, which undertakes to deal with the whole subject to which the prior statute relates. Accordingly . . . the repeal of a statute which was a revision of and a substitute for a former act to the same effect which was, therefore, repealed, cannot be deemed to revive the previous act; for this would be plainly contrary to the intention of the legislature."

So in Cochrane v. King County, 12 Wash. 518, 41 Pac. 922, it was said: "If the act of 1888 had been specially repealed in one not covering its entire subject-matter, such contention of the appellants could be successfully maintained. But it is evident that the effect of a repeal flowing from the fact that the entire subject-matter of the act had been included in a subsequent statute would not have the effect of reviving a former statute, which had itself been repealed in the same way."

Nor does the rule apply where a local or special law is repealed by another local or special law, and the latter is subsequently repealed. In such a case the original statute is not revived if there is a general law governing the subject. In re Hazle Tp. 6 Kulp. (Pa.) 491; Durr v. Com. 3 Pa. Ct. Rep. 525; In re Knox St. 12 Pa. Super. Ct. 534; Compensation for Boarding Prisoners, 20 Pa. Dist. 570.

And where the repealing act is repealed before it takes effect, its repeal does not affect the original act in any way, it never having actually become inoperative. Adam v. Wright, 84 Ga. 720, 11 S. E. 893; Clark v. Reynolds, 136 Ga. 817, 72 S. E. 254.

Statutory Rule.

RULE STATED.

By statute, in the great majority of jurisdictions, it is now provided in effect that the repeal of a repealing statute shall not operate to revive the original statute unless it is expressly so provided in the last repealing statute.

England.—Mount v. Taylor, L. R. 3 C. P. (Eng.) 645, 37 L. J. C. P. 325, 18 L. T. N. S. 476, 16 W. R. 866. (But see the following cases decided prior to the adoption of the statute, and in which the common-law rule was applied: Tattle v. Grimwood, 3 Bing. 493, 13 E. C. L. 62; Fuller v. Redman, 26 Beav. (Eng.) 600.)

United States.—U. S. v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52, 7 S. Ct. 413, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 559.

California.—Yolo County v. Colgan, 132 Cal. 265, 64 Pac. 403, 84 Am. St. Rep. 41; Suydam v. Los Angeles R. Co. 27 Cal. App. 157, 149 Pac. 55.

Illinois.—Sullivan v. People, 15 Ill. 233; People v. Sweitzer, 266 Ill. 459, Ann. Cas. 1916B 586, 107 N. E. 902.

Indiana.—Teter v. Clayton, 71 Ind. 237; Baum v. Thoms, 150 Ind. 378, 50 N. E. 357, 65 Am. St. Rep. 368. (But see the following cases decided prior to the adoption of the statute and applying the common-law rule: Doe v. Naylor, 2 Blackf. (Ind.) 32; Lindsay v. Lindsay, 47 Ind. 283; Longlois v. Longlois, 48 Ind. 60.)

Kansas.—Renter v. Bauer, 3 Kan. 503; State v. Prather, 84 Kan. 169, 112 Pac. 829, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084.

Kentucky.—Lowe v. Phelps, 14 Bush (Ky.) 642; Rice v. Com. 61 S. W. 473, 22 Ky. L. Rep. 1793.

Louisiana.—Tallamon v. Cardenas, 14 La. Ann. 514; Witkouski v. Witkouski, 16 La. Ann. 232.

Michigan.—Dykstra v. Holden, 151 Mich. 289, 115 N. W. 74; Grand Rapids, etc. R. Co. v. Cheboygan Circuit Judge, 159 Mich. 210, 123 N. W. 591.

Minnesota.—State v. Otis, 58 Minn. 275, 59 N. W. 1015.

Missouri.—State v. Huffsachmidt, 47 Mo. 73; State v. Stewart, 47 Mo. 382; State v. Slaughter, 70 Mo. 484.

New Mexico.—State v. Elder, 19 N. M. 393, 143 Pac. 482. (But see the following cases decided prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1912, and applying the common-law rule: Milligan v. Cromwell, 3 N. M. 327, 9 Pac. 359; Seewald v. Reynolds, 3 N. M. 344, 9 Pac. 376.)

New York.—People v. Steuben County, 183 N. Y. 114, 75 N. E. 1108, affirming 93 App. Div. 604, 87 N. Y. S. 1144, affirming 41 Misc. 590, 85 N. Y. S. 244; Matter of Remsen Ave. 153 App. Div. 418, 138 N. Y. S. 594. (But see the following cases decided prior to the adoption of the statute, and applying the common-law rule: Merchants' Bank v. South Carolina.—Addison v. Sujette, 50 S. C. 192, 27 S. E. 631; Lyles v. McCown, 82 S. C. 127, 17 Ann. Cas. 430, 63 S. E. 355.

West Virginia.—State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. 470; State v. Wirt County Ct. 63 W. Va. 230, 59 S. E. 684, 981.

Wisconsin.—Smith v. Hoyt, 14 Wis. 252; Goodno v. Oshkosh, 31 Wis. 127.

In several jurisdictions there seem to be no decisions involving the effect of the repeal of a repealing statute since the adoption of statutes providing that such a repeal cannot operate to revive the original statute. However prior to the adoption of these prohibiting statutes the common-law rule was in force, as appears from the following cases: Janes v. Buzzard, Hempst. 259, 13 Fed. Cas. No. 7,206 b. (construing the law of the Territory of Arkansas); Middlesex Turnpike Co. v. Freeman, 14 Comm. 85; People v. Wintermute, 1 Dak. 63, 46 N. W. 694; Coe v. Aroostook County Com'rs, 64 Me. 31; Com. v. Mott, 21 Pick. (Mass.) 492; Com. v. Churchill, 2 Metc. (Mass.) 118; Hastings v. Aiken, 1 Gray (Mass.) 163.

In the United States courts the common-law rule prevailed until the passage of the Act of Feb. 25, 1871 (Rev. Stat. § 12, 7 Fed.

St. Ann. 136), which declared that "whenever an act is repealed, which repealed a former act, such former act shall not thereby be revived unless it shall be expressly so provided." U. S. v. Philbrick, 120 U. S. 52, 7 S. Ct. 413, 30 U. S. (L. ed.) 559.

In State v. Elder, 19 N. M. 393, 143 Pac. 482, it was said: "Prior to the adoption of our constitution, there was nothing in the organic act or in the laws of Congress relating to the territory of New Mexico which forbade the repeal of an act repealing a law and the revival of the original law by such repeal."

It is not material whether the repealing act is repealed expressly or by the enactment of a repugnant act. Milne v. Huber, 3 McLean 212, 17 Fed. Cas. No. 9,617, wherein the court construing the Ohio act abrogating the common-law rule said: "By a general act, passed 14th of February, 1809 [Laws 1809, p. 162], it is provided, 'that whenever a law shall be repealed, which repealed a former law, the former law shall not thereby be revived unless specially provided for.' This provision, it is contended, applies only to laws expressly repealed, and not to an appeal by the repugnancy of the latter act. That the repugnancy does not repeal, but suspends the prior act, which is restored to its full vigor on the repeal of the repugnant act. This distinction seems not to be sustained. Whether the repeal be express or by reason of a repugnant act, subsequently passed, cannot be material in regard to this question. If the repealing act be repealed, it cannot, under the statute cited, give life to the act first repealed."

Statutes providing that the repeal of a repealing act shall not have the effect to revive the original act unless expressly so provided are prospective and not retroactive in their nature and apply only to future and not to past repeals. Teter v. Clayton, 71 Ind. 237.

LIMITATIONS OF RULE.

A statute abrogating the common-law rule as to the revival of an act by the repeal of the repealing act, has no application where the effect of an act is not to abrogate entirely a former act but merely to withdraw from the operation of the earlier act a portion of the cases included within its terms, leaving the earlier act still in force except as to the cases specifically provided for by the later one. Under such circumstances the repeal of the later act has the effect of again bringing the cases provided for by it within the operation of the original act. Mount v. Taylor, L. R. 3 C. P. (Eng.) 645, 37 L. J. C. P. 325, 18 L. T. N. S. 476, 16 W. R. 866; Brown v. Barry, 3 Dall. 365, 1 U. S. (L. ed.)

638 (interpreting the Virginia act); Savings Bank v. Collector, 3 Wall. 495, 18 U. S. (L. ed.) 207; Heinssen v. State, 14 Colo. 228, 23 Pac. 995; People v. Sweitzer, 266 Ill. 459, Ann. Cas. 1916B 586, 107 N. E. 902; Edworthy v. Iowa Sav. etc. Assoc. 114 Ia. 220, 86 N. W. 315; State v. Prather, 84 Kan. 169, 112 Pac. 829, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1084; Dykstra v. Holden, 151 Mich. 289, 115 N. W. 74; McConiha v. Guthrie, 21 W. Va. 134; State v. Wirt County Ct. 63 W. Va. 230, 59 S. E. 884, 981; State v. Sawell, 107 Wis. 300, 83 N. W. 296.

In Smith v. Hoyt, 14 Wis. 252, it appeared that a general statute required the defendant in civil actions to answer in twenty days. An act adopted in 1858 (Laws 1858, c. 113) gave the defendant in foreclosure six months in which to answer. This was repealed by a still later act. It was contended that the first statute was repealed by the act of 1858 as to foreclosure suits, and that on the repeal of that act the statute abrogating the common-law rule of revival prevented the revival of the statute first named. In answer to this contention the court, after declaring that the act of 1858 did not strictly repeal the first or general statute but merely excepted a class of cases from its operation, said: "That being so, where the statute creating the exception is repealed, the general statute which was in force all the time would then be applicable to all cases according to its terms. And this would be no violation of the rule of construction before referred to, that the repeal of a repealing act should not revive the act repealed. The act of 1858 was equivalent to a proviso attached to the general rule, that it should not be applicable to foreclosure defendants. But if a proviso creating an exception to the general terms of a statute should be repealed, courts would be afterwards bound to give effect to it according to those general terms, as though the proviso had never existed. And this could not be said to revive a repealed statute. The rule against this relates to cases of absolute repeal, and not to cases where a statute is left in force, and all that is done in the way of repeal is to except certain cases from its operation. In such cases the statute does not need to be revived, for it remains in force, and the exception being taken away, the statute is afterwards to be applied without the exception."

In State v. Mines, 38 W. Va. 125, 18 S. E. 470, the court holding the statute respecting the effect of the repeal of a repealing act inapplicable to the repealing act under consideration said: "Section 20 of chapter 35 of the code was broad and comprehensive applying every statute of limitation against the state. The act of 1875 only changed or modified to a certain extent—that is, prevented its operation as to judgments and claims of the state, leaving it in all other respects operative—simply made an exception to the generality of the operation of the statute; and when that act was itself repealed, and the exception or limitation was no longer in force, said section 20 operates free of that exception. It was only a partial abrogation of section 20. It would have been different, had it been a total abrogation.”

So in Pepin Tp. v. Sage, 129 Fed. 657, 64 C. C. A. 169, it appeared that a statute defining the boundaries of a township and city was nullified by the enactment of a statute placing a part of the territory within the limits of a village. It was held that under the Minnesota constitutional provision prohibiting the revival of a repealed statute by the repeal of the repealing act, the statute was not revived by the repeal of the village act. Applying the exception as set out above the court said: “We think these provisions are not applicable to the act dissolving the village. Originally the township and city included the territory in question, and the special acts which placed it within the village contain no reference whatever to the township or city, or to their boundary lines, or to the statutes defining them. The statutes creating the township and the city were not at any time repealed, but were left in force. The township and the city were not at any time extinguished, but remained in existence under the operation of those statutes. The effect of the special acts creating the village and defining its boundaries was to except the territory covered by it from the township and the city and from the operation of the statutes creating them. Subject to that exception, the legislative will, as at all times registered and expressed in living, operative, and valid statutes—not enactments entirely repealed, either expressly or by implication—placed this territory in the township and city. When the special acts which by implication put that exception upon these statutes were repealed, the exception was at an end. These statutes and their definitions of the boundaries of the township and city were then operative as if there had been no exception. They did not need to be revived because they had not been repealed.”

In Cassell v. Lexington, etc. Turnpike Road Co. (Ky.) 9 S. W. 502, it was said: “The argument of counsel that the last-mentioned act did not operate to restore to the state the right to vote at the elections, because its construction must be controlled by section 22, c. 21, Gen. St., we think is also unsound. That section is as follows: ‘Where a law which may have repealed another shall be repealed, the previous law shall not be revived unless the law repealing it be passed during the same session of the general assembly.’ That provision, we think, has no application to this case, for the Act of May 15, 1886, as has been before said, did not, nor was intended to, repeal that part of the original charter giving the right to the state to vote at the election of officers, but simply to suspend the exercise of that right; and consequently, when the corporation ceased, in the language of the repealing act, ‘to be subject to the provisions of the Act’ of May 15, 1886, eo instante the right was revived. Moreover, the intention of the legislature to have the elections held in the same manner as they were previous to that act being clearly shown, the right of the state to cast its votes at such election necessarily follows.”

But compare State v. De Bar, 58 Mo. 395, wherein it was held that the repeal of an act excepting the city of St. Louis from the operation of the general law in relation to the regulation of bawdy houses did not operate to revive the general law in St. Louis.

Where the first repealing act operates by way of implication and does not directly or expressly repeal the original act the constitutional provision abolishing the doctrine of statutory revivor does not apply. Home Ins. Co. v. Taxing Dist. 4 Lea (Tenn.) 644; State v. King, 104 Tenn. 156, 57 S. W. 150; Zickler v. Union Bank, etc. Co. 104 Tenn. 277, 57 S. W. 341. In State v. King, supra, the court in setting out the constitutional provision abolishing the doctrine of statutory revivor said: “In view of this provision of the constitution, it is contended that the doctrine of statutory revivor no longer obtains in this state, and that therefore the act of 1890, repealing the act of 1895 does not revive the original law placing Montgomery county in the eighth chancery division; that, consequently, that county is left unprovided for, since the legislature failed, or refused, to pass any other act providing her with chancery court privileges. Without going into a general discussion of the doctrine of revivor, because not necessary for a proper and correct determination of the case before us, we simply say that the act of 1895 detaching Montgomery county from the eighth chancery division, and the act of 1899 repealing same, do not fall within the constitutional provision requiring that acts repealing, reviving, or amending acts shall specify in their caption, or otherwise, the law repealed, revived, or amended, for the reason that the act of 1895 was an act which merely repealed, by implication, the original law placing Montgomery county in the eighth chancery division. Whatever may be the law as to the revival of laws which have been expressly repealed by repealing the repealing act, it has been held in this state, and we think upon sound principle, that when a law has been repealed by implication merely, the repeal of the act which thus impliedly repeals the former law, revives such former law, and this for the reason that such former law was never, in fact, repealed, but its operation merely suspended or interrupted by the adoption of another rule."

But the contrary rule has been announced in Texas. Stirman v. State, 21 Tex. 734, wherein the court in construing the Texas statute of 1840 said: "This rule has been abolished by the provision of the Act of January, 1840 (Art. 2348), to the effect that when one law, which shall have repealed another, shall itself be repealed, the former law shall not be revived without express words to that effect. The law makes no distinction between express and implied repeals, and it would not be convenient, nor are we authorized, to give an effect to one different from that attached to the other."

It has been held that a statute of the kind under consideration did not apply where the act repealed was merely amendatory of the original act by adding further prohibitions and did not repeal it. Hannibal v. Guyott, 18 Mo. 515, wherein it was said: "The Act of the 16th of February, 1847, did not repeal the act of 1835; it was declared to be amendatory of this act; it did not profess to repeal this act, nor was it the design of the legislature to repeal the act of 1835, which had been incorporated in the digest of 1845, but to add other and further restraints to the provisions of this act. The principle, therefore, invoked in this case, of the repeal of a repealing statute not reviving the original law, does not apply. In order to apply this rule of construction, the statute must, at least, repeal or profess to repeal the former law, or some clause or provision of it. The legislature designed to change the English rule of construction, which was, that the repeal of a repealing statute was the revival of the statute first repealed. If we are correct, in supposing that the act of 1847 did not repeal the act of 1835 and 1845, respecting inns and taverns, but that it only added a further restraint to those already contained therein, then it must follow, that the removal of this additional restraint by the repeal of the act of 1847, left the act of 1835 and 1845 as it originally stood."

Where it is clear that the legislature intended the original act to be revived, the court will so construe the statute as to give effect to that intention. Manlove v. White, 8 Cal. 376, wherein it was said: "The learned counsel for appellant contends that the fifty-fifth section of the Act of 29th April, 1857, repealed the thirty-ninth section of the Act of 29th April, 1851, and that the supplementary Act of April 30, 1857, did not revive it, and could not do so, under the provisions of the Act of March 14th, 1853, which provides that the repeal of a repealing act does not revive the act repealed, without express words. (Com. L. 214.) There is certainly a great deal of force in the position of counsel. The language of the act in regard to repealing statutes is certainly very strong and explicit, that the repealed act can only be revived by express words. But if we take the construction contended for as correct, for the sake of the argument, the legitimate result would be this: that neither the old or the new sheriff would be authorized to collect the unpaid taxes. For it is clear that the supplemental act must, under any construction, modify the Act of April 29th, 1857; and, therefore, the former sheriff would not be compelled to deliver over the assessment-roll to the new sheriff, and the latter would have no means and no authority to make the collections. The intention of the legislature, in passing the supplementary Act of April 30, 1857, is too clear to admit of any doubt. The reason that induced the passage of this supplementary act would seem to be the fact, that the then present incumbents were elected with the thirty-ninth section of the act of 1851 in force, and looked to the completion of the collections as a part of their duties. It was considered by the legislature in the nature of a contract, binding in good conscience upon the state. The case is a special one, under the circumstances, there being no doubt as to the true intention of the legislature."

KINNEY.

Ohio Supreme Court—November 28, 1916.

95 Ohio St. 64; 115 N. E. 505.

Constitutional Law — Liberty of Contract.

Liberty of contract is not an absolute and unlimited right, but upon the contrary is always subservient to the public welfare.

Contracts — Public Policy.

The public welfare is safeguarded not only by constitutions, statutes and judicial decisions, but by sound and substantial public policies underlying all of them.

Master and Servant — Contract Limitation of Liability — Validity.

A contract between an employer and an employee, which nullifies or lessens any legal duty that the employer owes to the employee relative to safeguarding the life, limb, safety, health or welfare of the latter, is contrary to public policy, and, therefore, null and void. Such void contract between employer and employee is not validated by any subsequent assignment, whereby the assignee is relieved or acquitted from liability for any or all negligent acts causing death or any personal injury to said employee, though with full knowledge of all the facts to all the parties.

[See note at end of this case.]

Mary Kinney, a car cleaner, entered into a contract of employment in writing with the Pullman Company, in which contract it was provided, among other things, that Mary Kinney, in consideration of her employment and wages therefor by the Pullman Company, would assume all risks of accident or casualty incident to such employment and would release the Pullman Company from all liability therefor. Said contract further recited that the Pullman Company had a contract of carriage with the railway company, whereby the Pullman Company had promised and agreed to protect the defendant railway company from any and all liability arising out of the negligence of the defendant railway company, or its employees, in causing death or injuries to any of the employees of the Pullman Company. Said contract between Mary Kinney and the Pullman Company recited the substantial terms of such release in the contract between the railway company and the Pullman Company, and further contained the provision that the Pullman Company might assign its release on the part of Mary Kinney to any railroad company carrying the Pullman Company's cars. Held: Said contract between Mary Kinney and the Pullman Company, so far as it undertook to release the latter, or any railroad company, from negligent acts causing death or injury to said Mary Kinney, was invalid because contrary to public policy.

(Syllabus by court.)

Error to Court of Appeals, Hamilton county.

Action by Mary Kinney, plaintiff, against Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago and St. Louis Railway Company, defendant. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. The facts are stated in the opinion. AFFIRMED.

Mortimer Matthews, Mitchell Wilby and Maxwell & Ramsey for plaintiff in error.

Thomas L. Michie and John W. Sadlier for defendant in error.

[65] WANAMAKER, J.—On July 8, 1912, Mary Kinney, a woman 42 years of age, entered the employment of the Pullman Company as a car cleaner at a wage of $1.25 per day.

On the 16th day of October, 1912, in the course of her employment, she was seriously injured by a movement of one of the trains of The Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railway Company. Thereupon Mary Kinney brought suit against the railway company, in the court of common pleas, for damages by reason of said injuries, averring in her petition in substance that on said 16th day of October, 1912, she was on one of the Pullman Company's cars known as the "Montgomery," and that while about to alight from the car the railway company, without any warning or [66] notice, and without giving her time and opportunity to alight therefrom, carelessly and negligently started the car with force and violence and with a jerk; whereby plaintiff was then and there thrown to the ground and permanently and severely injured.

The defendant railway company answered, setting up the defenses of a general denial, contributory negligence and exclusive negligence of the plaintiff; and for a special defense, known as Number 4, pleaded that Mary Kinney at the time of her injuries had entered into a contract with the Pullman Company wherein it was agreed that she, the said Mary Kinney, in consideration of employment and wages therefor by the Pullman Company, would assume all risks of accident or casualty incident to such employment and service, and would forever release, acquit and discharge said Pullman Company from all liability therefor.

The railway company further answered, averring the fact to be that the Pullman Company had promised and agreed to protect the defendant railway company and hold it harmless from all and any liability it might be under to employees of the said Pullman Company, or for any injuries sustained by them while so cleaning said sleeping cars, whether injuries were caused by negligence of the defendant railway company or its employees, or otherwise.

The defendant railway company further pleaded that the said agreement between Mary Kinney and the Pullman Company recited the fact of the agreement between said Pullman Company and the railway [67] company, and that she, the said Mary Kinney, had ratified the contract between said Pullman Company and the defendant railway company, and did agree to protect, indemnify and hold harmless the said Pullman Company in respect to any and all sums of money it might be compelled to pay in consequence of any injury or death happening to her, and that she did agree that said agreement between her and said Pullman Company might be assigned to the defendant railway company, or any other corporation, and used in its defense.

Upon trial had in the court of common pleas Mary Kinney recovered a judgment for $4,000. This judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals. Error is here prosecuted to reverse that judgment.

The one big question in this case for the consideration of this court grows out of the fourth defense, to which the plaintiff demurred, which demurrer was sustained by the trial court and exemptions taken. The question here is as to the sufficiency of that defense.

The ground upon which the demurrer was sustained was that that part of the contract between Mary Kinney and the Pullman Company, pleaded as a fourth defense by the defendant railway company, was null and void upon the ground that the same was contrary to public policy.

What is the meaning of "public policy?" A correct definition, at once concise and comprehensive, of the words "public policy" has not yet been formulated by our courts. Indeed the term is as difficult to define with accuracy as the word "fraud" [68] or the term "public welfare." In substance it may be said to be the community common sense and common conscience, extended and applied throughout the state to matters of public morals, public health, public safety, public welfare and the like. It is that general and well-settled public opinion relating to man's plain, palpable duty to his fellowmen, having due regard to all the circumstances of each particular relation and situation.

Sometimes such public policy is declared by constitution; sometimes by statute; sometimes by judicial decision. More often, however, it abides only in the customs and conventions of the people—in their clear consciousness and conviction of what is naturally and inherently just and right between man and man.

It regards the primary principles of equity and justice and is sometimes expressed under the title of social and industrial justice, as it is conceived by our body politic.

When a course of conduct is cruel or shocking to the average man's conception of justice, such course of conduct must be held to be obviously contrary to public policy, though such policy has never been so written in the bond, whether it be constitution, statute or decree of court.

It has frequently been said that such public policy is a composite of constitutional provisions, statutes and judicial decisions, and some courts have gone so far as to hold that it is limited to these. The obvious fallacy of such a conclusion is quite apparent from the most superficial examination.

[69] When a contract is contrary to some provision of the constitution, we say it is prohibited by the constitution, not by public policy. When a contract is contrary to a statute, we say it is prohibited by a statute, not by a public policy. When a contract is contrary to a settled line of judicial decisions, we say it is prohibited by the law of the land, but we do not say it is contrary to public policy.

Public policy is the cornerstone—the foundation—of all constitutions, statutes and judicial decisions; and its latitude and longitude, its height and its depth, greater than any or all of them. If this be not true, whence came the first judicial decision on matter of public policy? There was no precedent for it, else it would not have been the first.

This is recognized in three well-known and well-considered Ohio cases, Central Ohio Salt Co. v. Guthrie, 35 Ohio St. 666; State v. Bell Telephone Co. 36 Ohio St. 296, 38 Am. Rep. 583, and Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. v. Spangler, 44 Ohio St. 471, 8 N. E. 467, 58 Am. Rep. 833.

The state has a high and vigilant regard for the life, health and safety of its citizenship, as is evidenced by the variety and number of its laws specially enacted to conserve the same. A person may not take his own life. A person's life cannot be wrongfully taken by another; that is prohibited by the statutes against homicide. One person may not deprive another of limb, or assault him, from the slightest to the most aggravated degree, without incurring the penalties of the law.

[70] Coming now more specifically to the large class of persons involved in the case at bar, the employer and the employee:

As undoubted evidence of this broad humanitarian policy of the state to safeguard the life, limb, health and safety of its people employed in the industrial world, the people of Ohio in 1912 by an overwhelming vote adopted an amendment to the Ohio Constitution known as Section 34, Article II, which reads: "Laws may be passed fixing and regulating the hours of labor, establishing a minimum wage, and providing for the comfort, health, safety and general welfare of all employees; and no other provision of the constitution shall impair or limit this power."

Another amendment of the same nature was adopted by the people at the same time, known as Section 35, of said Article II, providing among other things for workmen's compensation, "and taking away any or all rights of action or defenses from employees and employers; but no right of action shall be taken away from any employee when the injury, disease or death arises from failure of the employer to comply with any lawful requirement for the protection of the lives, health and safety of employees."

Statute after statute has been enacted imposing the duty upon the employer to provide a reasonably safe place for the employee to work, reasonably safe ways to and from such place of employment, reasonably safe tools and appliances, reasonably safe protection from dangerous machinery, and the like, together with numerous provisions for light, heat, [71] sanitation, etc., all with a view of safeguarding the life, limb, health and safety of the employee. All these constitutional provisions and statutes are bottomed upon that broad humanitarian public policy, to wit, the state's high and vigilant regard for the safety of life, limb, health and general welfare of its people, particularly the working class.

The irresponsible taking of human life or limb or health is not allowed by the state, or any of its agencies, when the same is directly and deliberately attempted by any individual or class of individuals as against any individual or class of individuals. Such a proposition is so atrocious and offensive that all men must recoil therefrom and repudiate the same. If such a course of conduct between individuals may not prevail directly and deliberately, by what species of judicial jugglery shall it be permitted to result from the indirect and passive methods known as negligence, carelessness, failure to take any regard whatsoever for the safety, life or limb of others, even though such be expressly provided for in the so-called contract of employment.

Why should a court recognize in any person, artificial or natural, the right to do a wrong to some other person? How can it be said to be the right of one person, whether by contract or otherwise, to take the life or limb of another person wrongfully and negligently, and wholly without liability or responsibility for such wrongful and negligent act?

If a contract between employer and employee, whereby the employee assumes all risks no matter [72] how negligent the employer may be, must be upheld by courts as a valid contract, the enormous increase in industrial casualties, the loss of life and limb that would suddenly and inevitably follow, would be almost inconceivable. We would have a veritable army of crippled unfortunates and maimed dependents, deprived of life's joys and blessings, filling our almshouses as paupers and charges upon the state's financial resources, entailing a burdensome system of taxation. Wholly apart from the higher humanitarian questions involved, the increased burden thus placed upon the state for charitable purposes would be, in and of itself, sufficient to affect contracts of this character with a vital public interest. Courts should not hesitate to hold such contracts wholly null and void.

Therefore, upon the general fundamental principles of public policy upon which the Ohio Constitution and its laws are founded, as well as from the spirit of many of our constitutional principles, such a policy as is contained in the Pullman Company contract in the case at bar is clearly in conflict with the sound and humane public policy of the state.

But it is claimed that contracts of this character are no longer open to doubt; that they have been adjudicated and held valid by the federal courts. The chief case relied on by plaintiff in error to sustain this contention of validity is that of Robinson v. Baltimore, etc. R. Co. 237 U. S. 84, 35 S. Ct. 491, 59 U. S. (L. ed.) 849. The opinion is by Mr. Justice Hughes.

Plaintiff in error claims that that case is squarely in point and decisive of this cause in favor of plaintiff in error. An examination of that case [73] discloses the fact that the suit was brought for personal injuries "under the Employers' Liability Act." That act applied only to employers and employees in railway service engaged in interstate commerce, and the question was whether or not a person employed by the Pullman Company was an employee of the railroad company within the purview of said act. This is apparent from the second and third paragraphs of the syllabus, which respectively read:

"A contract between the Pullman Company, as employer, and its employee releasing the employer, and also all railroad corporations over whose lines the employer's cars were operated, from all claims for liability in personal injury sustained by the employee, held in this case valid unless the employee of the Pullman Company was also the employee of the railroad company, in which case that provision of the contract would be invalid under § 5 of the Employers' Liability Act."

"Congress in legislating on the subject of carriers by rail was familiar with the situation and used the term employee in its natural sense and did not intend to include as employees of the carrier persons on interstate trains engaged in various services for other masters."

It is quite apparent that that suit being brought under the employers' liability act was governed by the provisions of that act and that the word "employee," as therein used, did not include persons who were not employees of the railway company, and therefore that the act did not include and protect a [74] porter, employed by the Pullman Company, in charge of a Pullman car.

The opinion is brief and clear and fully discloses the fact that the whole question turned upon the construction of that statute and the use of the word "employee" therein. No question of public policy seems to have been raised in that case, at least it is in no wise discussed in the opinion. The Robinson case has no application here.

It may be said in passing that it is also claimed in the case at bar that Mary Kinney was at least a de facto employee of the plaintiff in error, the railway company, and that, therefore, by virtue of Section 9013, General Code, said contract was invalid.

That section reads as follows:

"No railroad company insurance society or association, or other person shall demand, accept, or enter into an agreement or stipulation with a person about to enter, or in the employ of a railroad company whereby he stipulates or agrees to surrender or waive any right to damages against a railroad company, thereafter arising for personal injury or death, or whereby he agrees to surrender or waive in case he asserts such right, any other right."

As in the Robinson case, under the federal statute, so in this case, under the Ohio statute, the employee is clearly not within the terms of the statute. She was not an employee of a railroad company, and, as such, the statute in and of itself has no application.

[75] The case, however, particularly relied upon by plaintiff in error as controlling and decisive of the case at bar, is known as the Voigt case, reported in 176 U. S. 498, 20 S. Ct. 385, 44 U. S. (L. ed.) 560. The opinion is by Mr. Justice Shiras. The syllabus in the latter publication reads as follows:

"An express messenger occupying an express car, in charge of express matter, in pursuance of a contract between the railroad company and the express company, is not a passenger within the meaning of the rule of public policy which denies the validity of contracts limiting the liability of a carrier to a passenger for negligence, and cannot recover of the railroad company for injuries sustained in a collision, where the contract between the companies exempts the railroad company from such liability, while his own contract, voluntarily entered into as a condition of employment, assumes all such risks and stipulates that he will indemnify and hold his employer harmless from all liability for such accident or injury."

If this is sound doctrine it would seem at first blush to sustain the claims of plaintiff in error. In the opinion Justice Shiras says, at page 505:

"The Circuit Judge thought the case could not be distinguished from the case of New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood, 17 Wall. 357, 21 U. S. (L. ed.) 627, where a recovery was maintained by a drover injured whilst travelling on a stock train of the New York Central Railroad Company proceeding from Buffalo to Albany, on a pass which certified that he had shipped sufficient stock to give him a right to pass free to Albany, but which provided that the acceptance of the pass [76] was to be considered a waiver of all claims for damages or injuries received on the train. This court held that a drover travelling on a pass, for the purpose of taking care of his stock on the train, is a passenger for hire, and that it is not lawful for a common carrier of such passenger to stipulate for exemption from responsibility for the negligence of himself or his servants. This case has been frequently followed, and it may be regarded as establishing a settled rule of policy. . . .

"The principles declared in those cases are salutary, and we have no disposition to depart from them."

Mr. Justice Shiras continuing, on page 506, says:

"Upon what principle, then, did the cases relied on proceed, and are they applicable to the present one? They were mainly two. First, the importance which the law justly attaches to human life and personal safety, and which therefore forbids the relaxation of care in the transportation of passengers which might be occasioned by stipulations relieving the carrier from responsibility. This principle was thus stated by Mr. Justice Bradley in the opinion of the court in the case of New York Cent. R. Co. v. Lockwood: 'In regulating the public establishment of common carriers, the great object of the law was to secure the utmost care and diligence in the performance of their important duties—an object essential to the welfare of every civilized community. Hence the common law rule which charged the common carrier as an insurer. Why charge him as such? Plainly, for the purpose of raising the most stringent motive for the exercise [77] of carefulness and fidelity in his trust. In regard to passengers the highest degree of carefulness and diligence is expressly exacted. In the one case the securing of the most exact diligence and fidelity underlies the law, and is the reason for it; in the other, it is directly and absolutely prescribed by the law. It is obvious, therefore, that if a carrier stipulate not to be bound to the exercise of care and diligence, but to be at liberty to indulge in the contrary, he seeks to put aside the essential duties of his employment. And to assert that he may do so seems almost a contradiction in terms.'

"The second fundamental proposition relied on to nullify contracts to relieve common carriers from liability for losses or injuries caused by their negligence is based on the position of advantage which is possessed by companies exercising the business of common carriers over those who are compelled to deal with them. And again we may properly quote a passage from the opinion in the Lockwood case as a forcible statement of the situation:

"The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higgle or stand out and seek redress in the courts. His business will not admit such a course. He prefers, rather, to accept any bill of lading, or sign any paper the carrier may present; often, indeed, without knowing what the one or the other contains. In most cases he has no alternative but to do this, or abandon his business. . . . If the customer had any real freedom of choice, if he had a reasonable or practicable alternative, and if the employment [78] of the carrier were not a public one, charging him with the duty of accommodating the public in the line of his employment, then, if the customer chose to assume the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair, and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed. The business is almost concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it. They do, in fact, control it, and impose such conditions upon travel and transportation as they see fit, which the public is compelled to accept. These circumstances furnish an additional argument, if any were needed, to show that the conditions imposed by common carriers ought not to be adverse, to say the least, to the dictates of public policy and morality."

Justice Shiras continues:

"Upon these principles we think the law of to-day may be fairly stated as follows: 1. That exemptions claimed by carriers must be reasonable and just, otherwise they will be regarded as extorted from the customers by duress of circumstances, and therefore not binding. 2. That all attempts of carriers, by general notices or special contract, to escape from liability for losses to shippers, or injuries to passengers, resulting from want of care or faithfulness, cannot be regarded as reasonable and just, but as contrary to a sound public policy, and therefore invalid."

Justice Shiras further continues:

[79] "But are these principles, well considered and useful as they are, decisive of, or indeed applicable to, the facts presented for judgment in the present case?"

"We have here to consider not the case of an individual shipper or passenger, dealing at a disadvantage, with a powerful corporation, but that of a permanent arrangement between two corporations embracing within its sphere of operation a large part of the transportation business of the entire country. We need not, in this inquiry, examine the nature of the business of an express company, or rehearse the particular services it renders the public."

In the Voigt case the United States Express Company had a contract with the Baltimore & Ohio Southwestern Railway Company very similar to the contract in the case now before this court.

Justice Shiras undertakes to distinguish between a contract made by the railroad company as on employer with its employee and a contract made between an express company and railway company, or between the Pullman Company and a railway company.

He says, at page 512, "that Voigt, the defendant in error, had agreed in writing to indemnify the express company against any liability it might incur by reason of said agreement between the companies, so far as he was concerned, and further agreed to release the railroad company from liability for injuries received by him while being transported in the express cars; that, in consideration of such agreement on his part, Voigt was employed [80] as an express messenger, and while so employed, and while occupying as such messenger a car assigned to the express company, received injuries occasioned by a collision, on December 30, 1895, between the train which was transporting the express car and another train belonging to the same railroad company."

Mr. Justice Shiras continues:

"It is evident that, by these agreements, there was created a very different relation between Voigt and the railway company than the usual one between passengers and railroad companies. Here there was no stress brought to bear on Voigt as a passenger desiring transportation from one point to another on the railroad. His occupation of the car, specially adapted to the uses of the express company, was not in pursuance of any contract directly between him and the railroad company, but was an incident of his permanent employment by the express company. He was on the train, not by virtue of any personal contract right, but because of a contract between the companies for the exclusive use of a car. His contract to relieve the companies from any liability to him, or to each other, for injuries he might receive in the course of his employment, was deliberately entered into as a condition of securing his position as a messenger. His position does not resemble the one in consideration in the Lockwood and similar cases, where the dispensation from liability for injuries was made a condition of a transportation which the passenger had a right to demand, and which the railroad companies were under a legal duty to furnish."

[81] Mr. Justice Shiras, in reviewing the Lockwood and other cases, bottoms the judgment of the court, holding that such contracts are invalid because contrary to public policy, upon the two following propositions:

"First, the importance which the law justly attaches to human life and personal safety.

"Second, advantage which is possessed by companies exercising the business of common carriers over those who are compelled to deal with them."

Justice Shiras bases these propositions very largely upon the reasoning of Mr. Justice Bradley in the Lockwood case, which he again quotes, as follows:

"The carrier and his customer do not stand on a footing of equality. The latter is only one individual of a million. He cannot afford to higggle, or stand out and seek redress in the courts. . . . In most cases, he has no alternative but to do this, or abandon his business. . . . If the customer had any real freedom of choice, if he had a reasonable and practicable alternative, and if the employment of the carrier were not a public one, . . . then, if the customer chose to assume the risk of negligence, it could with more reason be said to be his private affair, and no concern of the public. But the condition of things is entirely different, and especially so under the modified arrangements which the carrying trade has assumed. The business is mostly concentrated in a few powerful corporations, whose position in the body politic enables them to control it."

[82] Now Mr. Justice Shiras attempts to make some surface distinctions between the contract that the railroad company had with the express company as to its messenger in the Voigt case and the contract which the railroad company had with the drover in the Lockwood case. These distinctions are at the most surface distinctions, technical distinctions. At the bottom there is no real difference in principle. Can it be said "that the importance which the law justly attaches to human life and personal safety" applies to a drover but does not apply to an express messenger, and does not apply to an employee such as the car cleaner, Mary Kinney? This sort of leopard-spot public policy which Justice Shiras attempts to lay down in the Voigt case is wholly indefensible and unconscionable.

The law regards with equal tenderness and concern the life of the passenger, rich or poor, the life of the drover, the life of the express messenger, the life of a Pullman porter, the life of a car cleaner. It may and should recognize different degrees of care, dependent upon the relation and circumstances of the parties, and the law does recognize such distinctions, but to say that the parties may so contract as to permit one to avoid and escape all thought or care for the safety of the life, limb or health of the other is as barbarous a policy as was ever suggested in any court of justice.

Does the state's regard for human life and its conservation, with consequent liability for its wrongful loss or impairment, rest on one public policy for a drover, another public policy for an expressman, another public policy for a Pullman [83] porter, and yet another public policy for a car cleaner?

Richard Hooker, in his definition of law, used these immortal words, among others:

"All things in Heaven and earth do her [the law] homage, the very least as feeling her care and the greatest as not exempt from her power."

The quoted language of Justice Bradley in the Lockwood case applies with no more force there than it does in the Voigt case, or than it does in the Kinney case at bar. Substitute for "drover" the word "expressman," or, as in this case, the words "car cleaner" or the word "employee," and you have the same public policy—varying in circumstances, it is true, but nevertheless the same public policy for which Justice Bradley so ably and vigorously contends, to wit, the state's high regard for the safety of human life.

Now applying the second ground of that public policy recognized by Justice Bradley in the Lockwood case, to wit, the inequality of the parties to the contract, if here we substitute for the word "drover" the word "porter," "expressman" or "car cleaner," is there not indeed a greater inequality in the case at bar between Mary Kinney, the car cleaner, and the Pullman Company than there was in the Lockwood case between the shipper, called the drover, and the railway company? Indeed the very doctrine announced by Mr. Justice Bradley in the Lockwood case, and quoted with high approval by Mr. Justice Shiras in the Voigt case, should have persuaded the court in the latter case to a judgment absolutely contrary to the one rendered.

[84] Abraham Lincoln in his great message to the federal congress, delivered on July 4, 1861, among other things said that "the leading object of government . . . is to elevate the condition of men." To that paramount purpose and policy all the agencies and branches of government, including the judiciary, are thoroughly committed. We are now asked to substitute for that fundamental policy a contractual doctrine that endangers the condition of men, makes widows of their wives, orphans of their children, destroys or impairs their usefulness as citizens and their earning capacity as workers, and all because it has been so written in a contract, the parties to which are upon such unequal terms that there is no more liberty of contract in this case—indeed not as much—than there was in the Lockwood case between the drover and the railway company. That contract was found invalid as against Lockwood. This contract should be likewise held invalid as against Mary Kinney.

Judgment affirmed.

NOTE.

By the great weight of authority a contract by which a servant undertakes to release his master from liability for future negligence is void as against public policy. See the notes to Johnston v. Fargo, 6 Ann. Cas. 1, and Shohoney v. Quincy, etc. R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1912A 1143. The decisions are in conflict as to the validity of a contract whereby a railroad company is released from liability to the employees of a sleeping car company whose cars it hauls. See the notes to Denver, etc. R. Co. v. Whan, 12 Ann. Cas. 732; Coleman v. Pennsylvania R. Co. Ann. Cas. 1915B 529; and Louisville, etc. R. Co. v. Church, 130 Am. St. Rep. 29, 47. The decisions sustaining the latter class of contracts rest on the view that the carriage of employees of a sleeping car company is not one of the legal duties of a railroad company. See Denver, etc. R. Co. v. Whan, supra. The reported case involves a contract between a sleeping car company and one of its employees, which not only released the employer from liability for future negligence, but, reciting an agreement between the employer and a railroad company, provided that the employee's release should inure to the benefit of the railroad company. This contract the court holds to be void as against public policy and to afford no defense to an action against the railroad company for a negligent injury to the employee.

v.

NEW DELLS LUMBER COMPANY.

Wisconsin Supreme Court—October 26, 1915.

161 Wis. 370; 154 N. W. 640.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Disease as Accident — Typhoid from Impure Drinking Water.

Under Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, §§ 2394—1-2394—31), § 2394—3, declaring that liability for the compensation provided for in lieu of other liability shall exist against an employer for any personal injury accidentally suffered by an employee, where an employee is performing a service growing out of and incidental to his employment, the right to compensation for the death of an employee resulting from typhoid fever caused by the furnishing of polluted drinking water falls within the act; the disease being incurred as an incident to the employment.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where an employee contracts typhoid fever by reason of impure drinking water furnished by the master, his death from the disease is an "accident," within St. 1913, § 2394—3, making the employer liable for injuries proximately caused by accident; the term "accident" being used in its popular significance, as including injuries produced by negligence.

[See note at end of this case.]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Eau Claire county: HIEBEE, Judge.

Action by Frieda Vennen, administratrix of estate of Gerhard Vennen, plaintiff, against New Dells Lumber Company, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. AFFIRMED.

[371] This is an action to recover damages alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff as administratrix of her husband's estate and as his widow on account of her husband's death.

The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Wisconsin. The deceased, Gerhard Vennen, was employed by the defendant during the spring and early summer of the year 1914. The defendant was engaged in operating a manufacturing lumber establishment located on the Chippewa river in the city of Eau Claire, Wisconsin. In connection with its establishment the defendant maintained an outhouse and two toilets for its employees working there and a toilet in its principal office building. All of the sewage from these toilets was discharged into the river near defendant's establishment. The pleadings allege that the defendant in supplying water for its boilers not only secured water from the city waterworks, but also used water from the river, which was obtained by means of intake pipes; that the defendant was negligent in placing its intake pipes in such location that they carried into the boilers water that was contaminated by the sewage, and that this water through defendant's negligence became mixed with the water from the city waterworks because of improper connecting pipes. It is further alleged that the defendant negligently permitted and caused the employees to drink of this polluted water and thereby caused the deceased, Gerhard Vennen, to become sick with typhoid fever, which resulted in his death on July 25, 1914.

The defendant alleges and claims that the court had no jurisdiction of the matter because the defendant at the time [372] here in question had more than four employees engaged in a common employment and that it had filed notice of election to accept the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation

Act, and that the plaintiff's intestate had never filed any election not to accept the provisions thereof.

Plaintiff demurred to this defense on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense. The circuit court ordered that the demurrer be overruled. From such order this appeal is taken.

Fred Arnold and Daniel H. Grady for appellant.

Sturdevant & Farr for respondent.

SIEBECKER, J.—This appeal presents an important question as to the liability and nonliability of employers under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The ruling upon the demurrer to the answer assumes that the facts stated in the pleading exist as alleged, regardless of evidence in respect thereto. Sub. (3) sec. 2394—3, Stats., provides that where the right to compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act exists for personal injury or death, it shall be the exclusive remedy against the employer for such injury or death. Milwaukee v. Althoff, 156 Wis. 68, 145 N. W. 238, L.R.A.1916A 327; Smale v. Wrought Washer Mfg. Co. 160 Wis. 331, 151 N. W. 803.

By sec. 2394—3 it is enacted:

"Liability for the compensation herein after provided for, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall exist against an employer for any personal injury accidentally sustained by his employee, and for his death, in those cases where the following conditions of compensation concur: . . .

"(2) Where . . . the employee is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment. . . .

[373] "(3) Where the injury is proximately caused by accident, and is not intentionally self-inflicted."

The facts alleged show that the parties to the action were subject to the Compensation Act. The inquiry then is, Was Vennen's death proximately caused by accident while he was "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment"? The inference from the alleged facts is reasonably clear that Vennen at the time of the alleged injury resulting in his death was "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment." The contention that an injury resulting from carelessness or negligence is not one that can be said to have been accidentally sustained in the sense of the Compensation Act is not well founded. As declared in Northwestern Iron Co. v. Industrial Commission, 154 Wis. 97, Ann. Cas. 1915B 877, 142 N. W. 271, L.R.A.1916A 366, "In giving construction to such statutes words are to be taken and construed in the sense in which they are understood in common language, taking into consideration the text and subject matter relative to which they are employed." The words should be given, as intended by the lawmakers, their popular meaning. Sadowski v. Thomas Furnace Co. 157 Wis. 443, 146 N. W. 770. "A very large proportion of those events which are universally called accidents, happen through some carelessness of the party injured, which contributes to produce them. . . . Yet such injuries, having been unexpected and not caused intentionally or by design, are always called accidents, and properly so." Accidents without negligence are rare as compared to accidents resulting from negligence. Opinion of Paine, J., in Schneider v. Provident L. Ins. Co. 24 Wis. 28, 1 Am. Rep. 157. The intention of the legislature to include accidental injuries resulting from negligence within the language of the Compensation Act is so manifest that there is no room to indulge in construction of the language employed. In the popular sense the words as used in the Compensation Act, referring to a [374] personal injury accidentally sustained by an employee while performing services growing out of and incidental to his employment, include all accidental injuries, whether happening through negligence or otherwise except those intentionally self-inflicted.

The inquiry is, Was the disease from which it is alleged Vennen died proximately caused by accident? Do the facts and circumstances alleged in the case set forth the conditions to entitle an employee to compensation "for any personal injury accidentally sustained" which was "proximately caused by accident" while "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment?" We have already noticed that the alleged injury was, under the facts stated in the pleadings, received by deceased while in plaintiff's employ and while he was "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment." Whether or not the alleged accidental injury caused Vennen's death is sufficiently pleaded and remains a question for determination from the evidence at the inquest of the case. There remains the important inquiry. Do the allegations state a case showing that Vennen's death is attributable to "accident" in the sense of the Compensation Act? It is urged that the contracting of typhoid disease, under the facts and circumstances stated, does not show that his death was due to an accidental occurrence. The term "accidental," as used in compensation laws, denotes something unusual, unexpected, and undesigned. The nature of it implies that there was an external act or occurrence which caused the personal injury or death of the employee. It contemplates an event not within one's foresight and expectation, resulting in a mishap causing injury to the employee. Such an occurrence may be due to purely accidental causes or it may be due to oversight and negligence. The fact that deceased became afflicted with typhoid fever while in defendant's service would not, in the sense of the statute, constitute a charge that he sustained an accidental injury, but the allegations go [375] further and state that this typhoid affliction is attributable to the undesigned and unexpected occurrence of the presence of bacteria in the drinking water furnished him by the defendant as an incident to his employment. These facts and circumstances clearly charge that Vennen's sickness was the result of an unintended and unexpected mishap incident to his employment. These allegations fulfil the requirements of the statute that the drinking of the polluted water by the deceased was an accidental occurrence while he was "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment." It is alleged that the consequences of this alleged accident resulted in afflicting Vennen with typhoid disease, which caused his death. Diseases caused by accident to employees while "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment" are injuries within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation Act. This was recognized in the case of Heileman B. Co. v. Industrial Commission, 161 Wis. 46, 152 N. W. 446, and Voelz v. Industrial Commission, 161 Wis. 240, 152 N. W. 830. The English Compensation Act made employers liable to employees for "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment." Under this act it has been held that contraction of a disease may be caused by accident. See the following cases: Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. 230. A workman became infected through a bacillus from the wool which he was assorting, resulting in giving him the disease of anthrax of which he died, and it was held that it was a case of "injury by accident." Alloa Coal Co. v. Drylie [1913] 1 Scots L. Times 167, 4 N. & C. C. A. 899. Drylie, a workman in a coal pit, through accident was exposed to icy cold water up to his knees and became chilled which made him sick, resulting in pneumonia of which he died. Upon the evidence adduced the court found that the pneumonia was caused by the chill and that death resulted from "injury by accident." The cases wherein liability has been found distinguish between [376] disease resulting from accidental injury and disease which results from an idiopathic condition of the system and not attributable to some accidental agency growing out of the employment. The latter class of diseases are held not to be within the contemplation of the act.

We are of the opinion that the decision of the trial court holding that the facts pleaded show that Vennen's death was caused by accident while performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment is correct and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

BY THE COURT.—The order appealed from is affirmed.

BARNES, J. (dissenting).—By sec. 2394—3 liability exists under the Compensation Act, where employer and employee are under it, (1) for "any personal injury accidentally sustained" by the employee while "performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment, . . . where the injury is proximately caused by accident, and is not intentionally self-inflicted," and (2) for death where the employee is performing such service and where the injury causing death is "proximately caused by accident" and not intentionally self-inflicted.

To justify recovery under this statute, where death does not ensue, there must be a personal injury actually sustained, which injury is proximately caused by accident. Where recovery is sought for death, the statute does not in express terms say that a personal injury must actually be sustained, but only that there must be an injury "caused by accident."

I think it is very improbable that the legislature intended to give compensation where death resulted from an accident and deny it in case of mere disability, and that by fair implication it was intended to allow compensation for death only where it resulted from "personal injury." In other words, if recovery can be had in case of death from typhoid fever, then indemnity should be allowed for disability and [377] medical attendance in case of recovery. If this be so, then two things must occur as a condition precedent to recovery: there must be a personal injury and it must be caused by accident. If the taking of typhoid germs into the system is a "personal injury" and an "accident" within the meaning of the law, then the decision is right. If there can be a recovery in the case of typhoid fever, then the same result would follow for tuberculosis, pneumonia, smallpox, anthrax, ordinary colds, and other diseases, where the sick employee was able to trace the cause of his sickness to some unusual conditions in the surroundings in which he worked. If I understand the opinion correctly, most if not all diseases may be accidental, and recovery may be had on account of the same, except those of an "idiopathic" character. Idiopathy is defined as "a morbid state or condition not preceded and occasioned by any other disease; an individual or personal state of feeling; a mental condition peculiar to one's self." Idiopathic is defined as "of or pertaining to a morbid state; not secondary or arising from any other disease; as an idiopathic affection." Cent. Dict.

The peculiar concern of this court is to get at the legislative intent. When the court ascertains that intent, it has no only performed its full duty but has exhausted its legitimate powers. It has no right to curtail or extend the provisions of any statute.

The Compensation Act as now construed by the court will, I think, add materially to the liabilities popularly supposed to exist under the act, if it does not double them. If the legislature so intended, well and good. I cannot bring myself to believe that it did so intend.

It is a matter of common knowledge that cases of sickness and disease are much more numerous than cases of what are commonly known as accidents. The Compensation Act was passed after an exhaustive study of the subject of industrial insurance by a committee of the legislature which covered a [378] period of two years. There were two classes of acts in operation in other jurisdictions, one covering diseases and accident, the other, not in terms at least covering disease. If it had been the purpose of the legislature to include the large class of cases that would result from sickness, it is fair to presume that it would have done so in express and unmistakable terms, and not by the use of language that is at least popularly understood not to include them. In the numerous discussions on the proposed law before the legislature, which are fresh in mind, it does not appear to have occurred to anyone that diseases were included or intended to be included. In the four years that have elapsed since the original act was passed thousands of cases of sickness other than those of an "idiopathic" character must have arisen where there was ground for claiming that the sickness was contracted in the course of employment, and yet this is the first case where the claim was made that the Compensation Act applies to sickness. Even the representative of the deceased is not making such a claim here. On the contrary she is resisting it and insisting that she is free to pursue her common-law remedy.

Now the words "personal injury" are words commonly and ordinarily used to designate injury caused by external violence, and they are not used to indicate disease. Neither do we speak of sickness as an "accident" or an "injury." When we hear that someone has suffered an accident we at once conclude that he has suffered some more or less violent external bodily injury. It is in this sense, I think, that the words "personal injury" and "injury . . . caused by accident" are used in the statute. When our neighbor has typhoid fever, we do not think of classifying his ailment as an "accident," an "injury," or a "personal injury." It is only by an extremely far fetched and I believe illogical construction of the words referred to that they can be held to include disease not resulting from some external violence.

It is well nigh a demonstrable certainty that the legislature [379] never intended to provide compensation for sickness not resulting from external bodily violence. Wisconsin was one of the pioneers in this kind of legislation. It was known that it would entail large burdens on our manufacturers, who would thus be placed at a disadvantage in competing with employers in other states where no such law was then in existence. The law was an optional one and is so yet. As was expected, there was a great deal of hesitancy on the part of employers about coming under it. Had it been supposed that it provided compensation for disease or sickness, it is probable that the purpose of the law would have been practically nullified. The effect of the decision in this case is of course conjectural, but it is not without the range of possibilities that some at least of those who are now under the act will exercise their election not to remain under it. It is now a generally accepted truism that many diseases attack those who are physically weak and run down rather than those who are strong and able to throw off unwelcome disease germs. The weak must work as well as the strong or else be taken care of by the public, and should they be discriminated against in the matter of securing employment much harm would follow. The question whether we should or should not have insurance against sickness is one of legislative policy. The manner of paying such insurance, if decided upon, is also a question of legislative policy within constitutional limits. I do not question the power of the legislature to pass an option law such as we have providing for indemnity against disease. What I do say is, that the legislature has not done so, and that the act passed has been stretched by construction so as to add to it, in all probability, as large a class of claims and liabilities as that actually included in the original act.

The great weight of authority is contrary to the decision in this case. In Fenton v. Thorley [1903] A. C. 443, it is said that the words "by accident" are used to qualify the word "injury," confining it to certain classes of injuries [380] and excluding other classes, as, for instance, injuries by disease or injuries self inflicted by design. In Broderick v. London County Council [1908] 2 K. B. 807, 15 Ann. Cas. 885, the inhalation of sewer gas by which an employee contracted enteritis was held not to be a personal injury by accident. Paralysis resulting from exposure to contact with lead was held not to be an injury caused by accident. Steel v. Cammell [1905] 2 K. B. 232, 2 Ann. Cas. 142. An abscess in the hand produced by continuous rubbing of a pick handle held not to be an injury produced by accident. Marshall v. East Holywell Coal Co. 93 L. T. N. S. 360. Working with a blistered finger among red lead and oil which produced an inflammation and swelling not an injury produced by accident. Walker v. Lilleshall Coal Co. [1900] 1 Q. B. 488. Copper poisoning resulting from contact with dust produced by filing is not an injury produced by accident. Hichens v. Magnus Metal Co. 35 N. J. Law J. 327. Death from anthrax from handling animals that died from this disease held not injury caused by accident. Sherwood v. Johnson, 5 B. W. C. C. 686.

The Michigan court has held that since an accident is an unforeseen event occurring without design, the Compensation Act of that state (which is similar to ours on the point under discussion) does not cover occupational diseases, which are diseases arising from causes incident to certain employments. Adams v. Acme White Lead, etc. Works, 182 Mich. 157, Ann. Cas. 1916D 689, 148 N. W. 485, L.R.A.1916A 283.

Kindred cases dealing with the subject under consideration have arisen under policies of accident insurance. They hold that disease not resulting from or produced by external violence is not an accident for which recovery can be had under such contracts. Bacon v. U. S. Mutual Acc. Assoc. 123 N. Y. 304, 25 N. E. 399, 20 Am. St. Rep. 748, 9 L.R.A. 617; Smith v. Travelers' Ins. Co. 219 Mass. 147, 106 N. E. 607, L.R.A.1915B 872; Sinclair v. Maritime Passengers' Assur. Co. [381] 3 El. & El. 478, 107 E. C. L. 478; Dozier v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 46 Fed. 446.

By sec. 2394—11, Stats. it is provided that no claim to recover compensation under secs. 2394—3 to 2394—31, inclusive, shall be maintained unless, within thirty days after the occurrence of the accident which is claimed to have caused the injury or death, notice in writing be given to the employer stating the time and place of the injury. This must mean that the legislature had in mind something definite and tangible, something that could be located as to time and place, where it used the word "accident." I do not see how this statute can be complied with in a typhoid fever case.

The New Jersey court, following what it conceives to be the English rule, holds that "where no specific time or occasion can be fixed upon as the time when the alleged accident happened, there is no injury by accident within the meaning of the compensation act." Liondale Bleach, etc. Works v. Riker, 85 N. J. L. 426, 80 Atl. 929.

The latest expression of the English courts on the subject to which attention has been called is Eke v. Hart-Dyke [1910] 2 K. B. 677. There a laborer died from ptomaine poisoning caused by the inhalation of sewer gas. It was held that this was not an injury caused by accident, one of the concurring judges saying that there could be no recovery for injury by accident where you cannot give a date, and adding: "It is hardly a lawyer's question."

In Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 230, 2 Ann. Cas. 137, cited in the majority opinion is discussed in Eke v. Hart-Dyke, where it is referred to as an extreme case, the logic of which could be approved only on the theory that the anthrax germ which was floating in the air and which lodged in the eye of the deceased produced an abrasion which developed infection. In the decision the case is compared with a spark flying from an anvil and injuring the eyesight.

The Scotch case cited in the opinion (Alloa Coal Co. v. Drylie [382] [1913] 1 Scots. L. Times 167, 4 N. & C. C. A. 899) is authority for affirming the decision in the present case, but is much more restricted in its application than is the present decision. The opinion of Lord Dundas, which was concurred in by a majority of the judges, states:

"The present case could never be fairly cited in the future as indicating that the court is willing to hold that a mere ordinary disease (e. g. pneumonia) entitles a workman to compensation. The court must be satisfied . . . that the disease was attributable to some particular event or occurrence of an unusual and unexpected character incident to the employment, which could, in the light of the decisions, be fairly described as an accident."

I think this is the only decided case to which attention has been called which tends to support the decision of the court, while the cases to the contrary are numerous. In the two Wisconsin cases cited the disease for which recovery was allowed was proximately caused by an injury resulting from external violence.

I. Introductory.

The purpose of this note is to review the recent decisions involving the question of disease as an accident. For a discussion of the earlier cases on the subject see the notes to Brintons v. Turvey, 2 Ann. Cas. 137; Broderrick v. London County Council, 15 Ann. Cas. 885; Sullivan v. Modern Brotherhood of America, Ann. Cas. 1913A 116; and Paul v. Travellers' Ins. Co. 8 Am. St. Rep. 758. The note includes all cases passing on the question whether compensation may be recovered for disease under a workmen's compensation act which applies only to injuries received "by accident." The question whether disease is within an act allowing compensation for "injury" or "personal injury" is discussed in the notes to Hurle's Case, Ann. Cas. 1915C 619; and Stertz v. Industrial Ins. Commission, reported post, this volume, at page 354.

In discussing the question whether disease is within the purview of a policy of accident insurance, this note excludes the construction of a clause in an accident insurance policy excepting death caused by disease, that question being considered in the notes to White v. Standard L. etc. Co. 5 Ann. Cas. 83; Rathman v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. Ann. Cas. 1917C 459; and Cary v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 115 Am. St. Rep. 997. As to whether an intentional exertion causing a strain or other internal injury is an "accidental" means of injury, see the notes to In re Scarr, 1 Ann. Cas. 787; Stone v. Fidelity, etc. Co. Ann. Cas. 1917A 86; and Horsfall v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 98 Am. St. Rep. 846.

II. Under Accident Insurance Policy.

1. ACCIDENT CAUSING DISEASED CONDITION.

Where an accident causes a diseased condition which results in the disability or death of the insured under a policy of accident insurance the accident is considered the cause of the injury or death and the insurer is liable on the policy. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Stacey, 143 Fed. 271, 6 Ann. Cas. 955, 74 C. C. A. 409, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 657, reversing 137 Fed. 1012; Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. v. Patterson, 213 Fed. 595, 130 C. C. A. 175; *Aetna L. Ins. Co. v. Thus in Continental Casualty Co. v. Mathis, 150 Ky. 477, 150 S. W. 507, an action on an accident policy insuring against total disability from accident, it appeared that the insured scratched his thumb on a carpet tack and that blood poisoning developed from the wound. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff the court said: "In the case at bar the assured was wholly disabled for three days. Then, incited by his desire to be at his work, he was permitted by his physician to go, under caution as to prudence and care. He did not and could not do all his work, and after three days of it, again went to bed for months of illness. During all the time he had blood poison. The processes of nature were at work within his body begetting the sure and certain result of the accident, as the infection had at once happened. To hold that these three days of partial activity, while the poison was developing, broke the immediacy or the continuity of the accident, would be to hold that an accident policy does not cover blood poisoning from accident; for always there must be the interim of time for the disease to incubate. The provision in the policy is to have a natural and reasonable interpretation. The technical position of the company would avoid the policy for about every purpose save the collection of premiums. Within the intent of the policy, sound reason, and the opinions supra, the insured suffered an immediate and continuous disability. Notwithstanding the fact that the blood poison resulted from the accident, the company contends that the disability resulted from illness, not accident—the precise position upon which the elder Matthis says the agent refused payment. The issue of accident was submitted to the jury aptly. Further, it is to be noted that the policy in express terms provides that peritonitis, carbuncles, ulcers, and certain other denominated ills, are illnesses within the terms of the policy, no matter what may have brought them on. Blood poison is not among them. If the company so desired to classify this common resultant from accident it should have done so with equal express care. In accident insurance jurisprudence, blood poison resulting from accident is regarded as a part of the accident, and an injury or death from it as an accidental injury or death. . . . The insured was in intense pain for months, delirious much of the time. Tubes were kept in different parts of his body for long periods to drain away the pus and poison. Even upon his recovery he was afflicted as if he had locomotor ataxia. That he recovered at all is considered by his physicians as little short of the miraculous. His troubles were the direct result of an accident, against which the company had insured him.”

In Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. v. Patterson, 213 Fed. 595, 130 C. C. A. 175, an action on a policy insuring against death resulting directly, independently and exclusively from bodily injury effected solely through accidental means, it appeared that the insured was injured by a fall while attempting to crank an automobile, and that at a subsequent operation it was found that the left kidney of the insured was covered with large cysts. It was found on conflicting evidence that the condition was caused by the fall. The court said: “We agree that, when a man is injured while doing merely what he intends to do, he is not injured by an accident, unless the course of his action has been interrupted or deflected by some unforeseen and unintended happening. To illustrate from the facts before us: Since the deceased was attempting to start the engine of his car by turning the crank, whatever injury he might sustain from the ordinary strain of that operation would properly be regarded as a result of what he intended to do, and therefore would not be accounted accidental. But we can hardly suppose that he intended to slip and fall in the course of the operation, and therefore if he did slip and fall, and sustained injury as the direct result thereof, the happening would be unforeseen and unintended, and the injury would be accidental. Now, unquestionably, direct testimony was given that the deceased did slip and fall, and medical testimony was also given connecting the fall directly with his subsequent death. And this may serve to bring us to the first assignment of error. The plaintiff's declaration set forth that while the decedent was—‘cranking the engine or motor of, and attempting to start, a certain automobile, the surface of said street, avenue, or highway, gave way and caved in beneath and away from the feet of the said Walter L. Patterson, causing the said Walter L. Patterson to slip, stumble, and lose his footing, whereby he was subjected to a violent wrench, strain, and shock, whereby he sustained bodily injuries which resulted directly, independently, and exclusively of any and all other causes, and which said bodily injuries were effected solely through accidental means, in the death of the said Walter L. Patterson, etc.’ The evidence at the trial did not go so far as to show that the surface of the street had ‘caved in’ beneath the feet of the deceased, but it did tend to show that the surface was loose and had ‘given way’ under his feet. In the course of the trial a hypothetical question was addressed to one of the witnesses, which stated, inter alia, that while the deceased was ‘attempting to crank an automobile on the 5th day of August, 1911, the crank slipped suddenly out of the socket throwing him suddenly and violently to the ground, and that immediately afterwards he arose slowly and apparently with difficulty, and complained of pain in the back, etc.’ The defendant's counsel objected on the ground that the question was not framed in accordance with the averments of the declaration, but was predicated upon a different state of facts. He therefore alleged surprise, and this, of course, was equivalent to a motion that the trial should be continued; the argument being that the plaintiff was attempting to compel the defendant to answer a case different from the case sued upon. . . . To state the argument briefly: the policy provides that recovery for a death can be had only when the insured dies from bodily injuries effected through accidental means, as a direct result of the accident, and when the death results solely from such accident, independently and exclusively of any and all other causes. Therefore, if disease existing at the time of the accident was one cause of the death, the plaintiff cannot recover. The jury was properly instructed to that effect, and the verdict therefore establishes that there was an accident, that the accident was the direct and the only cause of death, and that the insured was not diseased at the time of the accident. With these facts established by sufficient evidence, the cases relied on by the company cease to be applicable, and need not be discussed. The charge as a whole was clear and satisfactory, and we see no serious objection to the illustration complained of in the sixth assignment. And, in the absence of sufficient medical evidence concerning the difficult—and, we think we may add, the somewhat obscure—subject of the effect of a predisposition to the particular disease in question, we discover no error in the court's instruction on this subject."

In National L. etc. Ins. Co. v. Cox, 174 Ky. 683, 192 S. W. 636, a suit on a policy insuring against loss of life, limb, etc., resulting directly and independently of all other causes from a bodily injury effected accidentally and through external, violent and accidental means, etc., the court said: "Obviously, the . . . provision of the policy, specifying the ground of the insurance company's liability, is susceptible of but one construction. Its meaning is that in order for the beneficiary to recover upon the policy for the death of the insured, the evidence must show that the death was produced by external, violent, and accidental means independent of other causes. In other words, the accident and injury resulting therefrom must be the proximate cause of the death to make the insurance company liable. . . . There is, however, no contrariety of evidence as to the facts, that down to the time of his receiving the fall the decedent was apparently in perfect health, that immediately following the accident his body was found to contain various contusions, and his lower limbs paralyzed, and that but a day or two later he became a victim of pneumonia. When to these facts is added the weight and effect to be given the testimony of various witnesses, several of them medical experts, that the paralysis, pneumonia and his death cannot be reasonably attributable to any other cause than the injuries he sustained in the fall in the apartment house, we can readily understand how the jury arrived at the conclusion expressed in the verdict returned by them. In other words, the evidence strongly concluded to prove that the accident and consequent injuries resulting to the decedent constituted the proximate cause of his death. It follows from the conclusion we have expressed as to the weight and effect of the evidence that the ruling of the trial court in the matter refusing the peremptory instruction for a directed verdict, asked by appellee, was not error."

In National L. etc. Ins. Co. v. Singleton, 193 Ala. 84, 69 So. 80, an action on an accident policy insuring against loss caused by "external, violent and accidental means," it appeared that the insured cut his lip while shaving and that infection supervened. In affirming a judgment for the plaintiff the court said: "There was evidence sufficient to carry to the jury the question whether or not the death resulted from, or was caused by, a gash cut in the lip of the insured while he was shaving, there being evidence to show that a gash was so cut, and that it became infected, and that infection spread from this small gash to his entire face and neck, and to other portions of his body, and that death was the result of this infection. Empire L. Ins. Co. v. Gee, 178 Ala. 492, 60 So. 90; Birmingham Ry. etc. Co. v. Hinton, 158 Ala. 470, 48 So. 546. If death did so result from the cutting of the lip of insured while shaving, whether he was shaving himself or was being shaven by another, we hold that the death would be within the terms of the policy which provides against 'bodily injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means.' There was no evidence whatever to show that the insured, or any other person, intentionally cut the gash; but all the evidence shows that the scar, cut or gash was an accident, and within the risk of the policy. See Bacon v. U. S. Mut. Acc. Assoc. 44 Hun 599. As before stated, there was no evidence tending to show an intentional injury, either by the insured or by a third party. The case therefore does not fall within the rule of cases in which the evidence does tend to show an intentional injury. These cases were discussed and reviewed by this court in the case of Continental Casualty Co. v. Cunningham, 188 Ala. 159, 66 So. 41, L.R.A.1915A 538."

In General Acc. etc. Assur Corp. v. Meredith, 141 Ky. 92, 132 S. W. 191, an action on an accident policy containing the requirement that the injuries insured against must be effected through external, violent and accidental means, it appeared that the insured, a physician, received a jolt, in stepping down from a pavement about eight inches high, which resulted in intussusception and death. In holding that he had sustained an accident within the meaning of the policy the court said: "If the deceased got a fall as above stated, when he stepped from the pavement, and this fall produced the injury to the bowel which caused his death, his life was lost from a bodily injury effected through external, violent and accidental means."

appeared that the insured, under an accident policy containing the provision that the bodily injuries insured against must be effected through external, violent and accidental means, sustained an injury to his hand by allowing it to rest on the bed rail for a long time while asleep, and that periostitis supervened. In holding that there was evidence to support a verdict for plaintiff the court said: "It appears from the testimony that on July 31, 1902, appellee, being much fatigued from an extended business trip, retired about 8 o'clock P. M. As he was somewhat restless, he placed his left hand between the pillow and his head, in order to raise it higher. The hand was placed on edge, with the thumb next to the head, and he fell asleep in that position. Sometime during the night, while asleep, he moved so that his hand, with his head continuing upon it as before, rested upon the edge of the bed rail, and he continued to sleep in that posture until 4 o'clock A. M., when he awoke. He found that his hand was wholly numb, and it continued in that condition for the space of half an hour. There was a black mark upon it, where it had rested upon the rail, and this mark existed for sometime thereafter. The hand pained him a great deal during the following day, and during the next night he was compelled to call a physician. The testimony of the latter, as well as that of the family physician, who took charge of the case upon returning from a vacation, shows that the pressure on the hand while upon the bed rail resulted in an inflammation of the periosteum of the metacarpal bones lying back of the third and fourth fingers, a condition which made an operation necessary and caused a protracted illness. The expert evidence shows that cases of inflammation of the periosteum, or, as the difficulty is technically termed, periostitis, are traumatic, at least for the most part, and that it is the opinion of the medical profession that all such cases are due to some injury, perhaps forgotten. The principal contention of counsel for appellant on the question of the sufficiency of the evidence is that appellee's loss of time was due to disease, and not to an injury within the terms of the contract. We hold that the policy in suit was an insurance against loss of business time by disease, provided that the disability was proximately caused by a bodily injury occasioned through external, violent and accidental means. It is the general understanding that this class of policies insures against diseases so occasioned, and where medical science reveals the fact that back of the disease stands a proximate cause, answering in all respects to the terms of the policy, it will not suffice to discharge the company that the consequence is accounted a disease. The insured cannot know what may befall him as the result of possible injuries, and it must be taken to have been the understanding of the parties that loss of time occasioned by disease was insured against, where the disability was proximately occasioned by an injury within the provisions of the contract. It will be time enough to deal with the difficult cases suggested by appellant's counsel, involving subtle, external causes of disease, when they arise. There was no evidence tending to show that the inflammation from which appellee suffered was due to any cause other than that of the long-continuing force exerted by the weight of the head. . . . We are not here called on to consider a case where the result is one which follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, and in which the only element of unexpectedness lies in the fact that the pursuit of the means unexpectedly brings about a physical condition which makes disease possible. Here the element of volition was wholly absent, and the fact that during the period of unconsciousness there was a distinct and long-continued force applied, which compressed the tissues and blood vessels surrounding the bones, and thereby caused the inflammation, marks the case as one of accident. We are also of opinion that the injury was a violent one within the terms of the policy. The degree of violence is not always a controlling consideration. . . . There were present in this instance, in a substantial sense, all of the elements necessary to bring the proximate cause of the disability within the requirement that the loss of time must result from a bodily injury effected through external, violent and accidental means. The only thing that was extraordinary about the case was the result; but this will not relieve, for the company was paid for its undertaking to provide a conventional measure of indemnity against the fortuitous, provided that it proximately proceeded from such an injury as the policy describes. We hold that the evidence was sufficient to support the verdict."

In French v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 135 Wis. 259, 115 N. W. 869, 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1011, it appeared that the insured struck his leg against a small iron safe in a baggage car, and that septic poisoning resulted causing his death. The policy contained the "external, violent and accidental means" clause. In reversing a judgment for the defendant the court said: "It is urged on behalf of the respondent in support of the judgment that it does not appear that the death of the insured was the result of 'bodily injuries sustained through external, violent, and accidental means, independently of all other causes.' The proof is undisputed that the insured received the accidental injury to his leg causing an abrasion of the skin, that an infection started at this place, and that he died fifteen days later from erysipelas or blood poisoning. The contention is that the accidental injury of itself would not have resulted fatally, but that death was due to an independent intervening cause, namely, the germs which entered the system through the wound. It must be apparent, however, that but for the accidental injury there would have been no cause for infection; that but for the abrasion the disease germs could not have entered and produced the fatal result. The wound produced by the accident was therefore the proximate and sole cause of death. Cary v. Preferred Acc. Ins. Co. 127 Wis. 67, 106 N. W. 1055. Counsel for respondent insists that the words 'independently of all other causes' do not mean the 'sole proximate cause;' that there was an independent intervening cause, which resulted in the death of the insured, and therefore the defendant is not liable. We cannot adopt this interpretation of the language or the conclusion sought to be drawn from the testimony. . . . We must hold, therefore, that where death results from disease which follows as a natural, though not the necessary, consequence of an accidental physical injury, it is within the terms of the accident policy, the death being deemed the proximate result of the injury and not of the disease as an independent cause."

In Woodmen's Acc. Assoc. v. Hamilton, 70 Neb. 24, 96 N. W. 989, wherein it appeared that the insured under an accident policy died from a complication of diseases after the injury to the liver in a runaway accident, the court said: "The other question, as to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, is given very little attention by plaintiff in error and seems hardly to have merited more. It is true that the death of the insured on June 10 was the result of a complication of diseases, but the evidence tends very strongly to indicate that they resulted from a violent injury to his liver, which came from the runaway accident of March 26. We do not feel disposed to disturb the finding of the jury in reference to this matter."

In Railway Mail Assoc. v. Dent, 213 Fed. 981, 130 C. C. A. 387, L.R.A.1915A 314, the court said: "While in the woods in the suburbs of St. Paul, Minn., Dent accidentally came in contact with poison ivy, with the result that an eruption appeared between his fingers two or three days afterwards, and grew until it covered his limbs and body and in about seven weeks caused his death. The essentials of a recovery by Mrs. Dent—so far as any contentions advanced make these a matter for present consideration—are that her husband's death was caused by 'accident,' that the accident alone resulted in producing 'visible external marks of injury,' and that his death did not result from poison or other injurious matter 'taken or administered' accidentally or otherwise. His contact with the poison ivy happened by chance, and was in ignorance of its character, was unintentional and involuntary, and the result from his conscious act was unexpected. This would seem to make it an accident within the customary meaning, as clearly as if he had been stung by a poisonous insect or bitten by a poisonous reptile. U. S. Mut. Acc. Assoc. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 9 S. Ct. 755, 33 U. S. (L. ed.) 60; Western Commercial Travelers' Assoc. v. Smith, 20 C. C. A. 223, 85 Fed. 401, 40 L.R.A. 653; Omberg v. U. S. Mutual Acc. Assoc. 101 Ky. 303, 40 S. W. 909, 72 Am. St. Rep. 413. The phrase 'injury by accident' in the English workmen's compensation act was held by the House of Lords to include an infection with anthrax while handling wool. In Brintons v. Turvey [1905] App. Cas. (Eng.) 230, the Lord Chancellor said: 'I think in popular phraseology, from which we are to seek our guidance, it [the act] excludes, and was intended to exclude, idiopathic disease; but when some affection of our physical frame is in any way induced by an accident, we must be on our guard that we are not misled by medical phrases to alter the proper application of the phrase "accident causing injury" because the injury inflicted by accident sets up a condition of things which medical men describe as disease. Suppose in this case a tack or some poisoned substance had cut the skin and set up tetanus. Tetanus is a disease; but would anybody contend that there was not accident causing damage?' This has especial bearing on the argument that Dent died of a disease, that is, blood poisoning, and not from accident. The testimony was that contact with ivy operates much like a burn, in that when the eruption covers the body it seals the skin against the natural discharge of secretions, and blood poisoning results. The ultimate effects of many injuries indisputably external and accidental might be similarly described. A like contention was before this court in Western Commercial Travelers' Assoc. v. Smith, supra. Next, the accident alone must have produced 'visible external marks of injury.' There is no doubt that contact with the ivy directly and alone caused the condition described; no other cause is suggested. Nor is it disputed that the eruption, first on the hands and then on the limbs and body, was both visible and external. True, it did not appear until two or three days after the contact; but it was not provided it should show at once. It came soon and in the natural course, and was of a character that left no doubt of the immediate cause."

However in McAuley v. Casualty Co. of America, 37 Mont. 256, 96 Pac. 131, an action on a policy insuring against injuries effected through external, violent and accidental means, it appeared that the insured sustained an injury to his leg while descending from a street car, and that erysipelas entered the wound and death resulted. In holding that the evidence was insufficient to support a recovery the court said: "The motion for a nonsuit should have been sustained. The plaintiff failed to prove the cause of the death of his wife. His contract with the defendant provided that the company should become liable only in the event that injuries, effected solely through external, violent and accidental means, should, directly and independently of all other causes, result in loss of life. In order to recover the plaintiff was bound to prove that the death of his wife was caused by such an injury. This he failed to do. The only positive testimony produced by him was to the effect that the cause of the death of Mrs. McAuley was erysipelas. Whether the disease was introduced into her system through the scratch she received, or whether its baneful properties slumbered in her blood prior to that time, whether it was communicated to her body from her clothing or a bandage, or from some projecting portion of the car, we do not know, the doctors did not know, and the jury could not know. As actions like this are founded upon express contract, it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to prove, by some substantive testimony, that the event has occurred, upon the happening of which defendant has agreed to become liable. Having failed in this regard, the plaintiff should have been nonsuited. Several authorities are cited by the respondent to the effect that where death results from blood poisoning, following as a natural, but not the necessary, consequence of a wound, however slight, as from the prick of a pin or a lead pencil, the wound will, in insurance cases like the one at bar, be deemed the proximate cause of death. In this case, however, there was no testimony, not even a medical opinion, that the erysipelas was caused or aggravated by the wound on Mrs. McAuley's leg; that is to say, there is no testimony to the effect that the erysipelas germ was communicated to the deceased through the abrasion on her leg, nor is there any evidence that the abrasion caused the disease to become manifest. For aught we know the erysipelas was entirely independent of the abrasion, and the result would have been the same had no abrasion of the skin existed. The failure to call a physician until the patient was almost dead probably destroyed all chance of making this proof."

2. PRE-EXISTING DISEASE NOT CONTRIBUTING TO INJURY.

If a pre-existing disease does not contribute with the accident which results in the disability or death of the insured under a policy of accident insurance the accident is considered the proximate cause and the insurer is liable under the policy. Collins v. Casualty Co. of America, 224 Mass. 327, 112 N. E. 634, L.R.A.1916E 1203; Driskell v. U. S. Health, etc. Ins. Co. 117 Mo. App. 362, 93 S. W. 880; Fetter v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 174 Mo. 256, 73 S. W. 592, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 61 L.R.A. 459. Thus in the case first cited the court said: "Considered in connection with the other provisions, it is clear that defendants undertook to insure the deceased against death resulting from bodily injuries received from an external, violent and accidental agency. If plaintiff's injury was inflicted in the manner alleged, that is, by the chance injection of scalding water into his ear, it certainly was accidental, violent and external, and we need waste no words in defining these terms. The important question that may arise under certain possible phases of proof is this: What is meant by the term, 'If death should result solely from such injuries?' We think the only reasonable interpretation to be placed upon this clause is to say that the injury must stand out as the predominant factor in the production of the result and not that it must have been so virulent in character as necessarily and inevitably to have produced that result regardless of all other conditions and circumstances. People differ so widely in health, vitality and ability to resist disease and injury, that what may mean death to one man would be comparatively harmless to another and, therefore, the fact that a given injury may not be generally lethal does not prevent it from becoming so under certain conditions; and if, under the peculiar temperament or condition of health of an individual upon whom it is inflicted, such injury appears as the active, efficient cause that sets in motion agencies that result in death, without the intervention of any other independent force, then it should be regarded as the sole and proximate cause of death. The fact that the physical infirmity of the victim may be a necessary condition to the result does not deprive the injury of its distinction as the sole producing cause. In such case, disease or low vitality do not arise to the dignity of concurring causes, but, in having deprived nature of her normal power of resistance to attack, appear rather as the passive allies of the agencies set in motion by the injury."

In Fetter v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 174 Mo. 256, 73 S. W. 592, 97 Am. St. Rep. 560, 61 L.R.A. 459, wherein it appeared that the insured died from a hemorrhage resulting from the rupture of the healthy tissue of a partly cancerous kidney, caused by a fall, in affirming a judgment for the plaintiff the court said:

"There is no question but that the fall of the insured against the table, striking his side heavily against its edge, was accidental, that it produced the rupture of the kidney which caused the hemorrhage which caused his death. All the witnesses concur in that. They also concur in the opinion that, conceding the previous existence of the cancer, the man would not have died as and when he did if the accident had not occurred; that whilst death from the cancer might have resulted, it would probably have been deferred several years. But the contention of the defendant is that the accident would not have resulted in the rupture if the cancer had not been there; as defendant's witness Dr. Hall said: 'The exciting cause of the hemorrhage was the injury and the predisposing cause was the cancer.' On this testimony the defendant says that the death was not the result of the accident 'independent of all other causes.' If we should give to those qualifying words of the policy the meaning that is now claimed by defendant they were intended to have, there would be scarcely any limit to their nullifying influence. Dr. Hall said in explanation of what has just been quoted, of his testimony: 'The predisposing cause is the remote cause.' If, therefore, there could be discovered in a man's body after his death any condition, before undiscovered and unsuspected, that, under scientific tests, would render him more amenable to accidents or less capable of resisting their influence, the policy would not cover the case. The fact that a man is sixty-nine years old, yet with an activity of body ordinarily found only in one much younger, might have something to do both with the fact of an accident and its result, and thus his age and unusual activity could be said to be a predisposing cause—remote, perhaps, as the learned witness designated the cancer in this case—still, in such case, in that sense, the accident could not be said to have been the cause of the death 'independent of all other causes.' The causes referred to in the policy are the proximate or direct, not the remote causes. This was evidently the view of the trial court when it modified the second instruction asked by defendant, inserting the word 'direct' before the word 'cause,' thereby directing the jury that they could not find for the plaintiff unless they found that 'the accident was the sole and only direct cause of the death of the insured,' and that view of the law was correct."

In Collins v. Casualty Co. of America, 224 Mass. 327, 12 N. E. 634, in holding that recovery could be had for the effects of a rupture, on a finding that the insured's predisposition to rupture did not cause the accident, the court said: "The more difficult question arises however under the defendant's contention that there was no evidence that the death of the insured resulted 'directly and independently of all other causes' from the accidental fall which the assured suffered on December 15, 1910. So far as we know the true construction of that provision of the policy is a question of novel impression. The provision of the policy in question in Cheswell v. Fraternal Accident Association [199 Mass. 267] ubi supra, was that the company would agree to pay to the beneficiary 'the sum of twelve hundred fifty dollars if the death of the certificate holder shall result from such injuries alone' within ninety days from the date of said accident. And there was a similar provision in Freeman v. Mercantile Mut. Acc. Assoc. 156 Mass. 351. But the decisions in those cases do not go far as a help in the decision of the case at bar. Neither the plaintiff nor the defendant has brought to our attention any case involving a consideration of the proper construction of such a clause in a policy of accident insurance and no case of that kind has come to our attention. The defendant has not laid stress upon the provision of the policy that the death must result 'directly' from the injury in question. This may be because of the provision that the injury need not cause 'immediate' disability. Under these circumstances we do not stop to consider that provision and proceed to the consideration of the provision that death must result from the injury 'independently of all other causes.' We are of opinion that, in a case where a surgical operation becomes necessary in order to deal properly with the effects of an injury within the policy of accident insurance and the insured dies as a result of the operation, death results 'independently of all other causes from such injuries.' Although he dies from some 'obscure physiological poisoning due to certain unknown changes in the bodily functions brought about by etherization,' it is plain, and in fact it was testified to by one of the doctors, that 'the operation consisted of etherization, just as essentially as it did of my [the] operation on him, cutting with the knife.' If the jury found in the case at bar (as indeed they must have found) that the occasion of the death was an 'obscure physiological poisoning due to certain unknown changes in the bodily functions brought about by etherization,' they were bound, or at least they were warranted in finding that that was a mere incident of the operation, which operation again was the only proper way of dealing with the rupture which was caused by 'accidental means' within the terms of the policy. If they did so find the insured came to his death from an incident of what was a proper treatment of the injury (which injury was within the policy). If this effect of etherization was an incident of the operation and that was found to be a necessary or proper result of the injury, it was not another outside cause but an incident of a cause within the policy and in that case death resulted 'directly and independently of all other causes from such [the] injuries.'

3. PRE-EXISTING DISEASE CO-OPERATING WITH ACCIDENT.

Where pre-existing disease co-operates with an accident to produce the disability or death of the insured under a policy of accident insurance the accident cannot be considered the sole and exclusive cause and the insurer is not liable under the policy. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. Shields, 155 Fed. 54, 85 C. C. A. 122; Maryland Casualty Co. v. Morrow, 213 Fed. 599, 130 C. C. A. 179, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1213; Crandall v. Continental Casualty Co. 179 Ill. App. 330; Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Assoc. 107 Ia. 538, 78 N. W. 252, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 43 L.R.A. 693; Rathman v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 186 Mich. 115, Ann. Cas. 1917C 459, 152 N. W. 983, L.R.A.1915E 980; Appel v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 86 App. Div. 83, 83 N. Y. S. 238, affirmed 180 N. Y. 514, 72 N. E. 1139; Niskern v. United Brotherhood, etc. 93 App. Div. 364, 87 N. Y. S. 640. See also Stout v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 130 Cal. 471, 62 Pac. 732. Thus in New Amsterdam Casualty Co. v. Shields, supra, the court said: "The policy provides: 'Loss of life by accident as used in this policy shall be deemed to mean death from bodily injuries not intentionally inflicted by the assured, which independently of all other causes are effected solely and exclusively by external, violent and accidental means and which shall result in the death of the assured within ninety days of the event causing the injury.' In this case it is conceded that the disease of appendicitis, with its consequences and complications, caused the death of the insured, but the real question of fact lies farther back, and is, whether the fall against the dashboard, acting independently of any other cause, produced this disease. If the insured recovered from his former attacks of this disease, so that it no longer existed in his body, and there was only a susceptibility to have it in case a proper exciting cause should arise, and in this case the fall against the dashboard proved to be such exciting cause, the case would be for recovery under the policy; but if because of the former attacks there was not merely a susceptibility to a further attack, but the actual disease itself existed, liable to be rendered active and virulent by an injury such as that suffered by the insured, in that event the active disease which resulted in death would not be regarded as the result of the fall alone, but as the joint result of the fall and the latent disease, and hence there could be no recovery under the policy."

In Rathman v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. 186 Mich. 115, Ann. Cas. 1917C 459, 152 N. W. 983, L.R.A.1915E 980, an action on a policy insuring against the result of injuries effected, independently of other causes, solely and exclusively by accidental means, it appeared that the insured was in a general diseased condition and while returning from Europe jumped or fell overboard and was lost. In holding that the insurer was not liable since the death was contributed to by a pre-existing disease, the court said: "It must be conceded as largely conjectural whether assured's death was accidental or intentional and suicidal. There are evidential facts in the case persuasive of the latter view, while the legal presumptions against self-destruction are in favor of the former. Conceding, however, that it was accidental, plaintiff cannot recover if the accident was caused or contributed to by illness or disease."

In Feder v. Iowa State Traveling Men's Assoc. 107 Ia. 538, 78 N. W. 252, 70 Am. St. Rep. 212, 43 L.R.A. 693, the court said: "The evidence tended to establish the following: The decedent, at the time of his death, was about twenty-six years of age, and had been in Denver, where his death occurred, about nine months. He was suffering from consumption, and went to Denver, and resided there, on account of his health. He was benefited by the change of climate and medical treatment he received, and his health had been considerably improved, and was constantly improving, at the time of his death. During the day of his death he had been as well as usual, and in the evening was with two of his brothers in their office. Preparatory to leaving it, the decedent went to a window to close the shutters. A chair stood in front of the window, and he stood on his toes, and reached over the chair toward the shutters, and, as he did so, blood began to flow from his mouth. He was placed on a lounge, and died within a few minutes. The cause of his death was a hemorrhage from a ruptured artery, and the evidence would have authorized the conclusion that the rupture of the artery was not due to the disease from which he was suffering. There is no evidence that he fell, slipped, lost his balance, failed to catch the shutter when he reached for it, or that it moved at his touch more or less readily than he had expected it would move: in other words, there is no evidence whatever that anything was done or occurred which he had not foreseen and planned, excepting the rupture of the artery, and the consequences which resulted from it." . . . "The certificate in suit made the defendant liable if the death of Feder resulted from an accidental cause. The evidence shows that the cause was the ruptured artery; but that was not accidental, if it was the natural result of an act voluntarily done by Feder. That he did anything but what he intended to do, in attempting to close the shutters, is not shown nor claimed. It is not even shown that he made any unusual exertion in what he did. Had the artery been ruptured while the decedent was sitting quietly in his chair, or while walking at a moderate pace, there would be no ground for claiming that the rupture was accidental; and we do not think that, because the act of closing the shutters may have required a little more exertion than would have been required to remain seated or to walk leisurely, the rupture was accidental. So far as is shown, it may have been, and probably was, due to a weakened or diseased condition of the artery. But, however that was, we are satisfied that there was no evidence which would have authorized the jury to find that the rupture was accidental, within the meaning of the certificate. We conclude that the district court was right in directing a verdict for the defendant, and the judgment rendered is therefore affirmed."

In Appel v. Aetna L. Ins. Co. 86 App. Div. 63, 83 N. Y. S. 238, affirmed 180 N. Y. 514, 72 N. E. 1139, an action on a policy containing the "external, violent and accidental means" provision, it appeared that while the insured was riding a bicycle the regular movement of a muscle injured a diseased appendix and septic peritonitis intervened. The court said: "We can conceive of no theory upon which it can be said, from the facts disclosed by the evidence, that the death of the insured resulted from 'bodily injuries, effected . . . through external, violent, and accidental means,' within the meaning of the policy. Riding the bicycle was in no sense an accident or accidental; the insured planned for and deliberately entered upon the project, and, so far as appears, it was carried out precisely as intended. He sustained no fall or shock, came into collision with nothing, he went where he chose, selected his route, his wheel at all times under perfect control, and he brought into play such muscles of the body, and only such, as he willed. The result of such ride, while extraordinary, in no manner proves that it was accidental. If the deceased had had a weak heart, and had deliberately and in the usual way walked rapidly up a hill, which caused the heart action to stop, could it be said that death was the result of accident? It might have been unwise to undertake to reach the top of the hill on foot, and of course the result was not anticipated, but there was no accident about it. The most that can be said in such cases, and in the case at bar, is that the result was accidental, but the means which produced it were not accidental. As we have seen, the evidence wholly fails to show that the deceased did anything which he did not fully intend to do, or that what he did was not done precisely as intended; therefore the result of such acts—his death—was not produced by 'accidental means.' . . . Our attention has not been called to any case which holds, and we have failed to discover any authority for the proposition, that a result which is produced by means all of which, and every detail of which, was intended, can be said to have been produced by accidental means, simply because the result which followed the employment of such means, exactly in the manner intended, was different from the result anticipated. In order that the plaintiff may succeed in the case at bar, it is necessary that we should assent to that exact proposition. We think that is not the proper construction or true meaning of the language of the policy in suit."

In Stokely v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 193 Ala. 90, 69 So. 64, L.R.A.1915E 955, a death resulting from a fit of coughing following a surgical operation was held not to be accidental, the court saying: "There would have been no stitches nor any rupture but for the disease and the wound it made necessary."

However in some cases recovery has been allowed where pre-existing disease co-operated with an accident. Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Meyer, 108 Ark. 91, 152 S. W. 995, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 493; Hall v. General Acc. Assur. Corp. 16 Ga. App. 66, 85 S. E. 600; Continental Casualty Co. v. Lloyd, 165 Ind. 52, 73 N. E. 824; Mitchell v. Fidelity, etc. Co. 35 Ont. L. Rep. 280, 26 Dominion L. Rep. 784, 9 Ont. W. N. 341, affirmed in 37 Ont. L. Rep. 335, 28 Dominion L. Rep. 361, 10 Ont. W. N. 311. Thus in Fidelity, etc. Co. v. Meyer, supra, the court said: "While standing in a wagon preparatory to seating himself, he was thrown backwards by the sudden and unexpected start of the horse, which caused him to fall on his back or right side in the region above the hip and strike an iron handhold upon the wagon seat. He threw both hands to his side and at once complained of the injury. The evidence tends to show that he continued to complain of the injury, and was confined to his bed from that time until his death, which occurred several weeks later. A few days after the accident he began to have hemorrhages from the mouth, which continued at intervals until his death. A short time after the accident he also commenced having hemorrhages from the bowels, and these continued until death. Prior to the accident he had every appearance of being a healthy man, and gave no evidence of having a fatal disease; but a post mortem held several days after his death revealed the fact, according to some of the testimony, that there was a diseased condition or tumorous growth on the head of the pancreas which enveloped the duodenum. Some of the surgeons gave opinions that the growth was a cancer of at least several months standing. While this was not directly disputed by other testimony, there is evidence to the effect that the physical condition of the man was inconsistent with the long continued presence of a malignant cancer and that, therefore, the tumorous growth was dormant rather than malignant, or that it might have been the result of the blow at the time of the accident. The autopsy developed the fact that the hemorrhage from the bowels resulted from a rupture of the duodenum or of the pancreas which enveloped it, but the testimony leaves a doubt as to whether this did not result from the erosion caused from the alleged cancerous growth or from the blow at the time of the accident. The evidence is sufficient, we think, to warrant the finding that the rupture was caused by the blow and that death resulted from this injury."

In Continental Casualty Co. v. Lloyd, 165 Ind. 52, 73 N.E. 824, recovery was allowed where a cerebral hemorrhage was caused by a fall, although a pre-existing tumor of the brain was a remote concurring cause, the court saying: "Here it is shown, without dispute, that there was a tumor upon Lloyd's brain. But it does not necessarily follow that it was a proximate cause of his death. Dr. Ohlmacher, a pathologist of learning and experience, and who conducted the autopsy for appellant, and appeared as a witness in its behalf, testified that the autopsy disclosed that a blood clot, or thrombus, had formed within the walls, and effectually plugged the artery at the point where the channel was narrowed by the tumor. He further testified, in effect, that at the point of obstruction the tumor had contracted the caliber of the artery to about one-half its normal size, which, however, in capacity, in the absence of thrombus, would be sufficient to nourish the brain and prolong life indefinitely, and perhaps for years, without marked inconvenience to the individual; that blood outside its natural sphere, or when it comes in contact with any other matter other than the peculiar substance of which the inner coating of the blood vessels is composed, speedily coagulates, or forms an organized clot; that when death came to Lloyd the tumor had penetrated and weakened the walls of the vessel, and a rupture of the inner coating at the point of stricture, thereby bringing the blood in contact with the matter of the outer wall, would conduce to thrombus, which, in fact, is the usual way in which clots from injury are formed. The substance of this testimony of Dr. Ohlmacher is that at death, excluding the blood clot, the tumor on Lloyd's brain had not reached a fatal stage, and probably would not have produced death for years to come, and, furthermore, that the fatal clot might have been caused by a rupture of the inner coating of the artery by a sudden influx of blood into the narrowed duct from a violent exertion of the heart. This evidence, when considered together with the testimony of Dr. Schleiker, the insured's age, his weight, the unexpectedness and severity of his fall, the speedy development thereafter of symptoms of brain pressure, the total absence of all premonitory symptoms of tumor or brain disorder prior to the fall, leaves no room for argument but that the jury had before it legal evidence, both direct and indirect, in support of its conclusion that Lloyd's death was caused by accident, independently of all other causes. And it makes no difference whether it found that the cause closest the death was hemorrhage of the brain, or an organized blood clot within the walls of the cerebral artery. It had the right to find that the accidental fall was the cause that put his life in jeopardy, because it incited the fatal energy of the tumor, which was at least dormant, and would have remained so for an indefinite period, and, perhaps, until death from some other cause would have supervened. The tumor had impaired the resisting strength of the artery, but had not effected immediate danger to life. It was proper under the evidence for the jury to view the impairment as a condition, and not as a cause, and to find that the fall was the originating, efficient, direct and proximate cause of death; that is, that the fall set in motion a force that progressed upon present existing conditions in natural, usual sequence to effect the fatal result. Twelve bricks are set in a row, eight inches apart. By accident the first is toppled and falls against number two, which in turn falls against and throws number three, and so on until number twelve is cast down by number eleven, and inflicts injury. With a proper footing number twelve might, or might not, have fallen. In such case could it be said that because brick number twelve had a weak and imperfect footing such imperfection was the direct, dominant, proximate cause of the injury? Who knows that the artery would not have been ruptured by the fall if it had been in a normal condition? Or who can tell that the insured would not have died from some other cause if the fall had not animated and accelerated the energy of the tumor. In fact, Dr. Ohlmacher testified that the autopsy disclosed in the vital organs of the deceased, in addition to the tumor, 'some affection of the mitral valve of the heart, some consequent enlargement of the heart, a beginning broncho-pneumonia, a beginning acute Bright's disease, and a moderate fatty change in the liver.' From these considerations it seems clear that the jury, in its search for the proximate cause of death, had the right to conclude that even though the fall would not have produced death but for the impaired artery, the tumor at most was a remote and not a proximate, efficient cause."

In Hall v. General Acc. Assur. Corp. 16 Ga. App. 66, 85 S. E. 600, wherein it appeared that the acceleration of an incurable chronic disease of the kidneys was caused by a fall, the court said: "To our minds, the fact that Judge Hall may have had an incurable disease, which by the acceleration of its influence and effect may have caused the death, would not necessarily preclude a right of recovery, although it was stipulated in the contract of insurance that the amount stipulated should be paid only when death resulted solely and exclusively from the injury. Presumably the company knew from the application of Judge Hall, which was made twenty-six days before the accident, that he was suffering from an incurable affection of the kidneys. If they did not know it, they could have known it, for there is no change in the answer that there was any concealment on the part of Judge Hall of his true condition at the time the application was made. To hold in any case that a contract which stipulates that the loss for death should be payable only when the loss results solely and exclusively from an injury, would be to hold that death must, in every case, be instantaneous and the immediate effect of the injury in question, for it is a matter of common knowledge that almost every human being has some weak spot in his organism which might to a larger or smaller degree contribute to bring about death in a particular way in that particular case, although another person under the same circumstances might not have died. Except in the case of a human being who is in perfect health, or unless the death is instantaneous, death never supervenes when it cannot be said that there was perhaps more than one cause which contributed to the fatality. If a company which writes accident insurance insures one who is suffering from a number of maladies against loss of life solely and exclusively due to the accident, and an accident happens which perhaps would not have caused the death of a normally healthy person, and yet which, by precipitating the baneful effects of the maladies, shortens the life of the person in question by any appreciable length of time, no matter how short, the injury, as the underlying essential proximate cause, must at least be said to have produced the result which otherwise would not have happened at the time and place at which it occurred. In the present case the insured was in many respects a vigorous man; he was afflicted with an incurable disease of the kidneys which sooner or later was certain to have terminated his life. How long he might have lived but for the injury which accelerated the effects of his disease is immaterial. The true question in the case is whether he would have died at the time that he did die if he had not received the injury, conceding the injury to have been the result of an accident. If the jury should find that his fall was due to disease, and not an accident due to his misplacing his foot or miscalculating the distance to be descended from the edge of the sidewalk to the roadway of the street, or other accidental cause, there would be no right of recovery, because the loss, in that event, would not be due solely and exclusively to an accident as the proximate cause, but might be due to the disease. This is the first fact for a jury to determine. However, if on the other hand the assured accidentally slipped and fell upon the street, the mere fact that the fall hastened his death by aggravating the disease so that he only lived a week, when even if he had not fallen he might not have lived as much as a month, would not defeat a recovery on the policy. It may be granted that the words of the policy which restrict the indemnity for death losses to those resulting solely and exclusively from bodily injuries through external, violent, and accidental means might avoid the contract in the present case if consideration be given only to the matter of predominance of the various causes which may have contributed to Judge Hall's death, instead of focusing the investigation upon the ascertainment of the proximate and primary cause, but for which death might or might not have resulted at the time that it occurred. In the view most strongly favorable to the defendant, the testimony showed that Judge Hall's tenure of life was more than ordinarily uncertain, but it did not show that he would have died when he did if he had not fallen, for, on the contrary, there was evidence that the fall, by aggravating the complaint from which he was suffering, probably hastened his death. In our view of the case, it is for a jury to declare, from all the facts in proof, what was the proximate cause of the death of the insured. If there was only one proximate cause of the bodily injury and this was brought about by 'external, violent, and accidental means,' such as an accidental slipping and falling, the insurance company would be liable upon its contract without regard to the fact that the assured was badly diseased and that the results of the fall in his case would naturally be more serious than if he had been in perfectly good health and a young man."

III. Under Workmen's Compensation Act.

I. SUPERVENING DISEASE RESULTING FROM OR RENDERED POSSIBLE BY INJURY.

a. In General.

Where a supervening disease is directly caused by an accidental injury received in the course of the employment and results in incapacity or death, the incapacity or death is held to be caused by an accidental injury, within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act.

Thus in Newcomb v. Albertson, 85 N. J. L. 435, 89 Atl. 928, it appeared that a chauffeur suffered a Colle's fracture of the right arm when cranking an automobile, and that during the course of treatment an abscess of the fleshy part of the thumb developed which resulted in ankylosis of the thumb, due to the abrasion and an infection of the skin from the rubbing or pressure of an unguarded or unpadded splint. In holding that the condition of the thumb was an injury caused by accident, the court said: "Section 2 of the workmen's compensation act provides for compensation for personal injuries to an employee by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. The defendant expressly confines his argument to the award of compensation for the injury to the thumb and two fingers. The only question for us is whether those injuries were due to the accident. The question is not, strictly speaking, whether the accident was the proximate cause of the ankylosis of the thumb or whether the infection was the natural result of the accident. Those questions are presented under section 1, placitum 1, of the statute, but the language in section 2 is markedly different, omitting any reference to natural and proximate cause. If we were to go into the scholastic distinctions, we might say that the cause of the injury under section 2 was the cause sine qua non, as distinguished from the proximate cause.

In the present case, it is said that the chain of causation is broken because the infection was due to the failure of the physician to take proper precautions. There is no finding to that effect and the evidence is not before us. We cannot assume that the infection could be caused only by the negligence of the physician, and it is therefore unnecessary to decide whether such negligence would amount to such a break in the chain of causation that the employer would not be liable. We think the trial judge was right in finding that the injury in fact resulted from the accident and in holding the employer liable."

In Great Western Power Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 69, 151 Pac. 1136, L.R.A. 1916A 281, it appeared that a workman accidentally suffered an abrasion of the skin and subsequently became disabled by blood poisoning, poisonous germs having entered through the abrasion. In holding that the claimant was entitled to compensation under the workmen's compensation act, the court said: "Dreyer was injured while in the employment of the petitioner and in the course of said employment. The only point made against the award is the claim that the accident was not the proximate cause of the disability for which the award was made. Dreyer was engaged in shaving and painting poles for the petitioner. On July 1, 1914, while at work, he accidentally caught his left hand between one of the poles and another piece of timber, thereby bruising the flesh and knocking a small piece of skin off the back of the hand. For the next two days, July 2d and July 3d, he continued his work, but used the other hand only. On the third day the injured hand began to pain him severely. The 4th came on Saturday and no work was carried on. On Monday he was unable to work because of the condition of the hand and the severe pain therein. Inflammation and suppuration set in, the same being produced by poisonous germs entering the flesh through the break in the skin caused by the accident. It was, of course, impossible to ascertain the source of these germs or when they gained entrance, but the time that elapsed between the abrasion and the beginning of the severe pain which developed into the suppuration was the usual period of infection of the variety styled by the physician as staphylococci. This, it appears, is the scientific name of one form of the disease commonly termed blood poisoning by the uninitiated. The disability for which the award was made was caused by this inflammation and suppuration. We perceive no merit in the claim that this disability was not proximately caused by the injury and abrasion of the skin. Such results do ensue from such abrasions, and they are brought about by the operation of what are ordinarily considered natural forces, that is, by the intervention of infectious germs usually, or at least frequently, present in the air or on the surface of substances with which any person may come in contact, and which are invisible to the eye and imperceptible to the senses. The accident was the proximate cause of the injury within the definition of the term 'proximate cause' as elaborately stated by Justice Henshaw in Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas, etc. Co. 158 Cal. 503 [139 Am. St. Rep. 134, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 559, 111 Pac. 534]."

In Frey v. Kerens-Donnewald Coal Co. 271 Ill. 121, 110 N. E. 824, a mine workman was held to be entitled to compensation for disability due to paralysis resulting from a blow on the head while at work.

In Walker v. Mullins, 42 Ir. L. T. 168, 1 B. W. C. C. 211, wherein it appeared that a gardener while digging in his employer's garden was injured in the foot by a nail and subsequently, because of the entrance of a germ into the wound, contracted tetanus, from which he died, it was held that the death was caused by an "accident arising out of and in the course of his employment."

In Adams v. Thompson [1911] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 19, it appeared that a dock laborer by constantly rubbing his eye to remove bran containing grit, which had blown into his eye while he was unloading a cargo of bran, produced an abrasion of the cornea and subsequently his eye was removed. It was held that there was evidence to sustain a finding of the county court judge that the injury was due to an accident within the act.

In Mitchell v. Glamorgan Coal Co. 23 Times L. Rep. 588, wherein it appeared that a workman who was employed in a colliery died from blood poisoning resulting from an injury to his finger, it was held that the county court judge could draw the inference that the accident arose in the course of his employment, Sir Gorell Barnes, P., saying that the probability was that the accident happened in the pit because accidents did happen there, rather than at the time when in the ordinary course of life accidents did not happen.

In Powers v. Smith [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 470, it was shown that a workman was apparently thrown from a cart when the horse fell, and, having walked away with the horse, was subsequently found dead some distance away. The medical evidence was that he died from syncope, but that it was impossible to say with certainty what had caused it. The court of appeal held that it would not interfere with the decision of the judge that the dependent had not discharged the onus of proving that the death was caused by the accident.

In Groves v. Burroughes, 4 B. W. C. C. 185, wherein it appeared that a workman while at work opened the partly healed wound of an operation, and septic poisoning followed causing his death, it was held that the county court judge could draw the inference that the accident arose out of the employment.

However in Wood v. Davis [1911] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 113, it was held that the county court judge was not warranted in inferring, in the absence of evidence, that a scratch on a collier's knee which caused blood poisoning resulting in death had been received while at work.

In Chandler v. Gréat Western R. Co. [1912] W. C. Rep. (Eng.) 168, 106 L. T. N. S. 479, 5 B. W. C. C. 254, it was held that septic infection of a cut on workman's hand did not entitle him to compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906, where the cut was received at home, and that to attribute the infection to his employment was at the best a mere surmise, although it was shown that noxious matter worked through a bandage into the cut in the course of his work.

In Amys v. Barton [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 40, [1911] W. N. 205, 81 L. J. K. B. 65, 105 L. T. N. S. 619, 27 Times L. Rep. 29, 5 B. W. C. C. 117, in which the death of a workman from blood poisoning was alleged to have been caused by the sting of a wasp while he was at work, and the county judge held that the accident "arose out of" the employment, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the learned county court judge cannot be supported, because there is no evidence that the accident arose out of the employment. I assume for the purpose of my decision that there was sufficient evidence to show that the deceased man was on October 18 stung by a wasp when he was engaged in working for Barton, the present appellant, and that the sting of that wasp introduced into his system the poison which ultimately led to his death on November 1; but that is only part of the necessary proof. It must never be forgotten that the accident must not only arise in the course of the employment, but must also arise out of the employment. If I may venture to repeat what I said in Craske v. Wigan [1909] 2 K. B. 635, 638, 'it is not enough for the applicant to say "The accident would not have happened if I had not been engaged in that employment or if I had not been in that particular place." He must go further and must say "The accident arose because of something I was doing in the course of my employment, or because I was exposed by the nature of my employment to some peculiar danger." Unless something of that kind is established the applicant must fail, because the accident is not one arising out of and in the course of the employment.' In this case the man was an engine-driver. He was employed by the year. On this particular occasion he was threshing his master's wheat: he was engaged in a field, the engine being there, and the wheat being threshed: there were a few wasps there, no great number according to the evidence, but there were some, probably what are known as drowsy or sleepy wasps. One of those, I assume, stung his foot just above the ankle, and that caused, ultimately, his death. But what is there to connect that accident with his employment? What peculiar risk was he exposed to? The learned county court judge, without any evidence, seems to have arrived at the conclusion that the wasps were beginning to hibernate in the stack, that the noise or heat of the engine woke them, or induced them to come out, and that they were irritated and stung him. There is not a particle of evidence to justify that finding, and it seems to me that the occupation of this man, so far as the sting of a wasp was concerned, did not expose him to any peculiar risk, or any greater risk than anybody who was engaged in the most ordinary occupations on a farm or elsewhere in the country was exposed to. On that short ground, following, I think, the view of this court in Craske v. Wigan [1909] 2 K. B. 635, and also in Warner v. Couchman [1911] 1 K. B. 351, I think that it is impossible to say that there was here any risk peculiarly incident to the employment which justified the learned county court judge in his finding that the accident arose out of the employment. On that ground the case must be disposed of in favor of the appellant."

In Howe v. Fernhill Collieries, 107 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 580, [1912] W. C. Rep. 408, it appeared that a collier died from acute blood poisoning, shown by the medical evidence to have been caused by a septic infection spreading from a superficial ulcer on the knee, on which there appeared to have been a superficial abrasion. Abrasions due to kneeling on coal dust were stated to be a frequent cause of blood poisoning in colliers. It was held that there was no evidence of injury by accident.

In White v. Sheepwash [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 382, an applicant for compensation for incapacity from blood poisoning alleged to have resulted from a sore foot stated in his particulars of claim a "wound on the third toe of left foot caused by rubbing of boot which had previously become permeated by some bone manure" used by his employer, but set up at the hearing that he had knocked his toe against a seed drilling machine and that thereafter the wound was poisoned by the manure which had previously saturated and dried in his boots. It was held that the county judge correctly made an award in favor of the employer on a finding in effect that the blood poisoning resulted from the pressure of a boot which had become too tight and that this was not an "accident."

So where a disease supervenes after an accident the incapacity or death is held to be an accidental injury if the disease while not an inevitable or direct result of the accident was rendered possible thereby so that without the accident there would have been no disease. Lovelady v. Berrie [1909] 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 62; Hugo v. Larkins [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 228; Langley v. Reeve [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. 175; Farmer v. Stafford [1911] 4 B. W. C. C. Thus in Ystradowen Colliery Co. v. Griffiths [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 533, wherein it appeared that pneumonia followed by bronchitis and chronic asthma resulting in permanent incapacity supervened after an injury to a workman in a colliery by the fall of a stone, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "This appeal raises, not for the first time, a question of some importance as to the meaning of the words used in the act, 'incapacity which results from the injury.' In the first place it is quite clear that the mere contracting of a disease, apart from those particular diseases mentioned in the Act of 1906, is not, as a general rule, an accident at all; but, given an admitted accident, it is not the law to say that a disease which has been accelerated, still more if produced, by the accident, is not a matter which comes within the four corners of the act of Parliament. This court in the case of Dunham v. Clare [1902] 2 K. B. 292, which certainly was not decided upon the facts of that case, but was decided on grounds of principle, laid down in most emphatic language that the test is not whether the death (it was death in that case, but in this it is partial injury) must be the natural result, or the probable result, of the accident; it may even be what Collins, M. R., called the 'unnatural' consequence of the accident. Certainly it is no answer to say it was not the natural result of the accident or not the probable result of the accident. If I may venture to read a few sentences from my own judgment in that case it will save me from repeating in longer language what I should desire to repeat here. Ibid. at p. 297: 'In my opinion the county court judge misdirected himself. A doctor who saw the wound on the day of the accident might have come to the conclusion that erysipelas was most unlikely to supervene, but the same doctor might subsequently have said that he was satisfied that death was the result of the injury. The question is, From what in fact has death resulted? The answer to that question does not depend upon what was at first thought to be reasonable and probable—to which I will now add 'natural.' I also think that in considering questions of this kind it is quite legitimate and proper to consider whether an accident has not accelerated an existing tendency to disease in the body, or, as some people have said, has given life to certain latent causes of mischief in the body. The case mentioned to us of Golder v. Caledonian Ry. Co. 40 Scot. L. Rep. 89, is a strong instance in point, and a case on tuberculosis which came before us about three years ago and is not reported, was another instance. What has the learned judge done here? There was admittedly an accident—a stone fell upon the man. Liability for the accident was not disputed, and full wages were paid for a certain time. The man is now admittedly unable to work, and he is unable to work by reason, I think it is called, among many other phrases, of chronic bronchitis, and there is evidence which is worthy of attention—I say no more than that, because it is not a question for me to deal with—that this was brought about by reason of the weakened condition of the man, the state of debilitation which was immediately caused by the accident, which so affected him that he was some two hours in getting from the colliery to his own house on that night; and in these circumstances he contracted a cold which, in his debilitated condition, has led to this consequence. It is not for me to say what view the learned judge may take when the case goes to him for rehearing and judgment, but I think we are bound to give him this direction, that the test is not whether the present condition of the man is the natural result of the injury, but he must consider the result in fact. It may be an improbable result—I will even go so far as to say, as Collins, M. R., said, possibly even an unnatural result—but the question is whether the man's present condition is the result of the accident in this sense, that it is occasioned by his debilitated condition immediately after the accident and occasioned by the accident which he has met with."

In Dunnigan v. Cavan [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. 579, 48 Scot. L. Rep. 459, 4 B. W. C. C. 386, the death of a workman from pneumonia following an injury to his back from a falling stone while he was at work was held to have been caused by an injury by accident, although he walked home from the hospital two days before his death in spite of a warning by the hospital doctor that such a course was dangerous to life.

In Euman v. Dalziel [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 246, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 137, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 49, 6 B. W. C. C. 900, it was held that there was evidence to support a judgment based on conflicting medical evidence that the death of a workman from appendicitis and peritonitis while confined to his bed following a fall from a ladder which injured his ankle and caused severe pain and general shock was the result of an accident.

In Brown v. Kent [1913] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 624, 82 L. J. K. B. 1039, 6 B. W. C. C. 745, it appeared that a workman suffered an accident to his knee, that scarlet fever supervened and that the wound suppurated subsequently so that the joint had to be excised, thereby causing incapacity. Scarlet fever would not have caused the suppuration in the absence of the accident. It was held that the incapacity resulted from the accident, Swinfen Eady, L. J., saying: "In the present case, the wound resulting from the operation (which operation was solely necessitated by the accident) did not heal, became unhealthy, suppurated, and necessitated a further operation, which has led to the present incapacity; the workman never recovered from the wound, or from the effects of the accident: the old cause of complaint never disappeared. It may well be that the fever, and the condition of the patient caused by it, much increased the risk of the formation of pus, but it was the old wound which was giving the trouble—the old wound which was suppurating. It was the evidence of Dr. Bone, accepted and agreed to by both parties, that if there had not been any accident, and consequent injury to the knee, the scarlet fever could not have caused the injury or the incapacity in question. The result is necessarily that the incapacity is the result of the accident to the knee—although probably aggravated by the scarlet fever. This entitles the workman to compensation for the accident, on the footing that the incapacity caused by it is continuing. The county court judge has, in our opinion, misdirected himself on the law. He proceeded to consider how the scarlet fever was contracted, whether the workman's lowered vitality lessened his capacity to resist the infection of scarlet fever, and said that lowered vitality was the keynote of the case—that if lowered vitality invited the scarlet fever, the chain of causation was complete, and the workman entitled to recover; if lowered vitality did not invite the scarlet fever, the chain of causation was broken and the workman was not entitled to recover. This was misdirection. If the incapacity is the result of the accident, the chain of causation remains unbroken, although a fresh cause arising casually and 'uninvited' by any special condition of the workman may have aggravated the original injury. Whether there existed any lowered vitality of the workman in the present case, or whether such condition did or did not invite the scarlet fever, is not material, when once it is established that the incapacity is the result of the original accident, from the direct effects of which the workman never recovered; and if the scarlet fever germ encouraged the suppuration of the wounded knee, it matters not whether the germ entered the man's body through the wound, or through his mouth."

In Lovelady v. Berrie [1909] 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 62, wherein it appeared that a workman, employed to pick up cotton waste from the decks of ships in dock, two hours after being ordered to work in a hold came up the ladder therefrom apparently in great pain, and three days later acquired pneumonia which caused his death, and the doctor who attended him attributed the pneumonia to an injury marks of which were found on his ribs, it was held that there was evidence that the workman's death was caused by a "personal injury arising out of and in the course of the employment."

In Thoburn v. Bedlington Coal Co. [1911] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 128, wherein it appeared that a workman did not recover his normal health after an accident, the court sustained the finding of a county court judge that his death thirteen weeks after the accident from bronchitis following influenza was a death resulting from the injury, because the bronchitis proved fatal owing to the condition to which the accident had reduced the deceased.

In Dunham v. Clare [1902] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 292, 71 L. J. K. B. 685, 66 J. P. 612, 50 W. R. 596, 86 L. T. N. S. 751, 18 Times L. Rep. 645, 4 W. C. C. 102, it appeared that a workman in a factory was injured by the fall of a heavy pipe which he was carrying, which caused a wound on his toe. Subsequently phlegmonous erysipelas supervened in the wound and he died from blood poisoning caused by the erysipelas. It was held that compensation should have been allowed, Collins, M. R., saying: "In my opinion, this appeal should be allowed. The learned county court judge tells us in his judgment the grounds of his decision. He found and awarded that the applicant was not entitled to compensation on the ground that death was not the result of the accident, i. e., was not the natural or probable consequence. We have to determine whether that is not a misdirection to himself. The circumstances of the case are these: The deceased man admittedly met with an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment, which caused a wound to his toe. He was treated for that wound at the hospital as an out-patient. After a certain interval erysipelas set in, and he died of blood poisoning caused by the erysipelas. I will take it that at the time of the accident it seemed improbable, and it may even be unnatural, that erysipelas should supervene and that death should ensue. But the question we have to determine is whether that is the right standard to apply in ascertaining whether there is a liability to pay compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897. That liability is created by s. 1, subs. 1, of the act, which provides that, if in any employment to which the act applies personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment is caused to a workman, his employer shall be liable to pay compensation in accordance with the 1st schedule to the act. Turning to the 1st schedule, I find that clause 1 prescribes the amount of compensation where death or incapacity 'results from the injury.' That is the provision which regulates the amount of the compensation. The applicant for compensation, therefore, has to show an accident causing injury, and death or incapacity resulting from the injury. In the present case there was admittedly an accident causing injury, and the only question is whether death in fact resulted from the injury. If death in fact resulted from the injury, it is not relevant to say that death was not the natural or probable consequence thereof. The question whether death resulted from the injury resolves itself into an inquiry into the chain of causation. If the chain of causation is broken by a novus actus interveniens, so that the old cause goes and a new one is substituted for it, that is a new act which gives a fresh origin to the after-consequences. In dealing with an obligation created by the act, we are not dealing with a case of contract or tort or with a liability of a criminal nature. In the case of contract, a person who commits a breach of it is liable for the consequences which naturally follow from the breach. So, too, in cases of tort, when the question arises whether a person is liable in respect of a breach of some duty imposed upon him, he probably, and in some cases certainly, comes under a somewhat larger liability than would be the case if it were a breach of contract, but still the liability is measured by what are the reasonable and probable consequences of his breach of duty. That lets in the consideration of reasonableness. No question of reasonableness comes into the present discussion. The act has imposed the liability irrespective of any error of judgment or negligence on the part of the employer. The only question to be considered is, Did the death or incapacity in fact result from the injury? The county court judge, by inquiring whether death was the natural or probable consequence of the injury, has applied the wrong standard to the solution of the question. It is quite consistent to say that death resulted from the injury and yet that it was neither the natural nor the probable consequence of it. If no new cause, no novus actus, intervenes, death has in fact resulted from the injury."

In Bayne v. Riverside Storage, etc. Co. 181 Mich. 378, 148 N. W. 412, it was held that conflicting medical evidence was sufficient to support a finding of the industrial accident board that the death of a workman from pneumonia was caused by a hurt or strain of the back suffered by him, and hence that the death was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

In Ramlow v. Moon Lake Ice Co. 192 Mich. 505, 158 N. W. 1027, L.R.A. 1916F 955, wherein it appeared that an employee in the course of his employment received an injury and shock which brought on an attack of delirium tremens resulting in his death, it was held that the fact that his system has been so weakened by intemperate habits that it was unable to withstand the effects of the injury did not thereby shift the proximate cause of death from the injury to the intemperate habit.

In Thomson v. Mutter [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 619, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 241, wherein it appeared that a workman accidentally ruptured himself in the course of his employment and was operated for hernia, it was held that an arbitrator's finding that his subsequent death from heart weakness and degeneracy "set up by the strain of the operation" was the result of the accident sustained in the course of his employment was justified by the evidence, although another hernia of long standing was found and operated on at the time of the operation.

However in Woods v. Wilson [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 569, 29 Times L. Rep. 726, 6 B. W. C. C. 750, it appeared that a workman employed in a lighter in coaling a ship sustained a blow in the stomach due to a rush of coal. Subsequently during the performance of an operation it was discovered that he had chronic appendicitis and that there was a perforation of the bowel. Three days afterwards he died from peritonitis, and a post mortem examination disclosed another perforation of the bowel. On appeal from an award in favor of the widow it was held that the award could not stand because there was no evidence to connect the death with the accident.

In Hugo v. Larkins [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. 228, wherein the medical experts were in conflict on the possibility of a wound in the hand on April 17th causing erysipelas of the face on July 7th, and the medical referee was improperly sworn and allowed to testify in answer to a hypothetical question that it was not impossible for the organisms of erysipelas to be latent for that length of time, it was held that there was no evidence to justify the finding that the deceased died from personal injury by accident.

In Hart v. Cory [1916] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 172, 85 L. J. K. B. 116 [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 522, 114 L. T. N. S. 25, 60 Sol. J. 89, it was held, following Hargreave v. Houghhead Coal Co. [1912] A. C. (Eng.) 319, that a collier who had lost the sight of his left eye by accident could not treat the accident as a concurrent cause of a subsequent inflammation of the optic nerve of the right eye, on the ground that the loss of the left eye made his incapacity due to the diseased eye, but that there must be a direct causal connection between the accident to one eye and diseased condition of the other.

In Farmer v. Allen [1911] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 223, wherein it appeared that a workman while at work called out that he had hurt his back and that he died a week later of intestinal obstruction, it was held that the onus of proving an "accident" had not been discharged, there being no evidence of previous illness or pain, and no one having seen what had happened at the time of the workman's exclamation.

In Martin v. Manchester Corp. 5 B. W. C. C. 259 [1912] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 105, it was held that an employee at a scarlet fever hospital was not entitled to an award for a disability due to scarlet fever in the absence of evidence to show that there was a particular time, place and circumstance, by means of which the alleged "injury by accident" happened, and evidence that after an attack of influenza he had returned to work, and thereafter had been in and out of the fever ward and had cleaned out the mortuary which was not shown to have contained the body of a person who had died of scarlet fever, was not evidence to sustain a finding that the applicant had contracted the fever in the mortuary.

b. Infection of Injured Eye.

In cases involving almost identical facts as to the introduction of gonococci into an injured eye, the decisions have not been uniform as to whether the resultant gonorrhea could be regarded as an accidental injury.

Thus in McCoy v. Michigan Screw Co. 180 Mich. 454, 147 N. W. 572, L.R.A.1916A 323, wherein it was shown that an employee after receiving an injury to his eye infected it with gonorrhea by rubbing it with his hand he was not entitled to compensation for its resulting loss, since the rubbing would have infected the eye if it had not been injured, the court saying: "The claimant, William McCoy, was employed by the contestant and appellant as an operator on a lathe machine. On February 1, 1913, several small pieces of steel from the machine on which he was working lodged in his eye. This, it is claimed, caused an irritation and caused him to rub his eye. At the time, claimant was being treated by Dr. A. M. Campbell for gonorrhea. On February 7th he went to Dr. Cochrane, who removed four pieces of steel from the eye. The next day the doctor removed another piece of steel and discovered that the eye had become infected with gonorrhea. He was then sent to a hospital and subsequently lost the sight of the eye. The industrial accident board affirmed an award made claimant by an arbitration committee of $6.49 per week for 100 weeks. It is the claim of contestant and appellant that the loss of the eye was not the result of a personal injury arising out of and in the course of claimant's employment, but was the direct result of a disease unconnected in any way with his employment. At the hearing before the industrial accident board, four physicians were sworn, who testified as to the effect upon the eye of gonorrheal infection. Claimant contends that the germs would not have entered the eye had not the steel caused '(a) an inclination to rub—the inciting cause—(b) inflamed condition which made the eye susceptible to the entry of the germs, as in the case of blood poison and erysipelas.' A careful reading of the testimony of the physicians shows that the infection can easily be caused to a normal eye by rubbing the eye with a hand infected with the gonorrheal germ.

In the instant case it is not reasonable to say that he would not have rubbed his eye if the steel had not lodged there. He might not have rubbed his eye, it is true; but it is just as reasonable to suppose that he might have had occasion to rub his eye without this particular inciting cause. By the medical testimony it conclusively appears that the infection could have taken place if the steel had not been there. It must be said, from this record, that the loss of the eye was directly and immediately due to the infection caused by the gonorrhea, which it cannot be claimed is a risk incident to the employment. We are of the opinion that the facts are not capable of supporting the inference that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment."

However in Cline v. Studebaker Corp. 189 Mich. 514, 155 N. W. 519, wherein the subsequent gonorrheal infection of an injured eye, resulting in loss of vision, was found to be due to accident the court said, in distinguishing the McCoy case: "The fact that a piece of steel flew into claimant's eye in the course of his employment seems fairly well established. His testimony is to that effect, and it is corroborated by his fellow workmen. But it is not shown that this flake of steel directly caused the subsequent impairment of vision; that, on the contrary, must be attributed to the gonorrheal infection. Such is the finding of the board, and the finding is in accordance with the agreement between the parties. Nor is it probable, from the testimony of the doctors, that the germ which caused the infection was upon the steel itself. They state, however, that such a germ might get into the eye from a towel, from washing utensils, from the straps or rails of a street car, and in similar ways. The burden is therefore, as insisted by counsel for defendants, upon the claimant to show by a preponderance of evidence that the infection arose out of and in the course of his employment, instead of at some other time and in some other way. In short, under the circumstances, it was for claimant to show that the infection was connected with the accidental entry of the steel into his eye. And in this behalf counsel cite McCoy v. Michigan Screw Co. 180 Mich. 454, 147 N. W. 572, where the relation between the infection and the employment was held not to have been established. In instances like the present, however, where the claimant himself is personally free from the disease, it is hardly possible that the source of infection can be shown absolutely by direct evidence. Nor is that necessary. 'By a "preponderance of evidence" is meant such evidence as, when weighed with that opposed to it, has more convincing force, and from which it results that the greater probability is in favor of the party upon whom the burden rests.' Hoffman v. Loud, 111 Mich. 156, 69 N. W. 231. As has been said, the claimant was himself personally free from the disease up to the time of the accident. Such was the testimony of the doctor who attended him, and the industrial accident board has found it to be a fact; nor does counsel for defendants dispute the correctness of the finding. The gonorrheal germ must have come from some outside source. It must also have been received not later than the time of the accident to have developed into the condition found by the doctor two days afterwards, according to his testimony. These conditions, in connection with the fact, as shown, that an injured eye is more susceptible to the infection than a normal eye, and with the further fact that at once, after the accident, a fellow workman examined the eye, using for the purpose a match wrapped in a piece of cloth, create a considerable degree of probability that the germ got into the eye in the attempt to remove the steel. And this probability was sufficient to warrant the board in their finding that: 'The infection which destroyed the sight of the eye is not reasonably accounted for except as coming through or resulting from the accident.' Sullivan v. Modern Brotherhood of America, 167 Mich. 524, 133 N. W. 486, 42 L. R. A. (N. S.) 140, Ann. Cas. 1913A 1116. If the germ was introduced in an attempt to remove the flake of steel from the eye, it was a direct consequence of the accident, and arose out of and in the course of the employment. The attempt to remove the particle of steel was a natural and necessary result of its entry into the eye; in fact, the proofs in this case seem to fairly establish the element that was lacking in the McCoy case."

In State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 163 N. W. 755, it appeared that a mine workman while engaged in his duties was injured by a particle of ore which flew into his left eye, cutting through the cornea thereof, and imbedding itself in the eyeball. A fellow workman removed the particle from the eye at the time, using in his efforts in that respect a match and a handkerchief. The eye was immediately thereafter washed with water from a trough which was used daily by other miners for the purpose of washing their hands and faces. When the particle had been removed from the eye, blood and watery matter was discharged from the wound, the eye became inflamed, and thereafter a gonorrheal infection set in, and resulted finally in the loss of the sight of the eye. Prior to the injury the eye was normal and the workman experienced no trouble or pain therefrom. In affirming a judgment awarding compensation the court said: "The evidence is clear that the workman received some sort of an injury to his eye, in the manner stated by him, the precise character of which is in dispute. There is no dispute, however, about the fact that gonorrheal infection set in soon after the time of the injury, and thereafter progressed to such an extent that the sight of the eye was totally destroyed. And there can be no serious doubt that the facts, as claimed by the workman, disclose an accidental injury within the meaning of the compensation statute. And this, whether the gonorrheal infection resulted from the use of a soiled handkerchief in removing the particle from the eye, or from washing the eye with water from the trough which was used indiscriminately by the miners, or from a latent germ within the eye, set in motion and made active by the violence of the injury to the eyeball."

In Voelz v. Industrial Commission, 161 Wis. 240, 152 N. W. 830, wherein it was shown that an employee got something in his eye while at work, and although he did not then have the disease, he rubbed his eye and subsequently the eye became infected with gonococci bacilli, the court in holding that a causal connection had not been shown said: "In the present case the commission did not determine the crucial question of fact in the case, namely, the question how the gonococci germs got into the eye. They say that the substance which fell in the eye may have been infected, or 'with the eye inflamed, it might have become infected by rubbing it with an infected cloth or washing it in infected water, or in other ways. This seems a reasonable conclusion.' We interpret this as meaning that it is purely conjectural as to how the infection got in the eye, hence they do not decide that question, but their legal conclusion is that, however the infection came in, it is legally traceable to the dropping of the foreign substance in the eye, because that fact inflamed the eye and induced the rubbing with an infected cloth or the washing with infected water. This would be strictly logical if it could be said (1) that the claimant would not have washed his eye or rubbed it with a towel in the absence of the injury to the eye, and (2) that only an inflamed eye could be infected by a gonorrheal infection. The difficulty is that neither of these propositions can be supported. People who have suffered no such mishaps also wash their faces and wipe their eyes with towels daily as a matter of course, and it is a well known fact that the gonorrheal infection waits not upon inflammation or injury to make its entry into the eye. It is said in the Encyclopedia Britannica (11th ed.), vol. 27, p. 983: 'One of the most important points in the management of a case of gonorrhea is to prevent all risk of the septic discharge coming into contact with the eye. It sometimes happens that the patient inadvertently introduces the germs into his own eye by his finger, or that his eye or the eye of some member of his household becomes inoculated by the use of an infected towel. If this happen, prompt and energetic measures must be taken to save the eye.' In the present case if it is found, upon sufficient evidence, that the claimant had no gonorrheal infection except that which developed in his eye, but it does not appear where or under what circumstances he washed the eye or what towels or cloths he used to wipe it. Apparently the substance which fell in his eye was something hard. No mention is made of it as a liquid. The claimant calls it 'something' and says he tried to get it out by rubbing. It appears by the evidence that the claimant was not working on the waste pipe or any pipe which takes water away from the wash bowl, but on the locknut of the basin cock, i. e. the cock which supplies clean water to the bowl. If the commission had found as a fact that the infection came from the substance that dropped in the eye, it might be difficult to say that there is no evidence to support the finding, but they did not so find. On the contrary they reached the conclusion, which seems to us eminently reasonable and logical, that it might have come from this source and might also have come from a number of outside sources. In substance, the conclusions of the commission are as follows: Something fell in the plaintiff's eye, causing pain; he rubbed the eye; gonorrheal infection followed; he did not have the infection previously; we cannot determine whether the infection in the eye came from the substance which fell into it, from water with which he bathed it, or from a towel with which he rubbed it, but in either event we regard the dropping of the substance in the eye as the legal cause of the subsequent loss of sight within the meaning of the compensation act. If this be correct, then any man at work at any occupation who gets something in his eye while at work and rubs the eye, the rubbing being followed by gonorrheal infection, may recover for the loss of the eye simply on producing evidence of these facts, together with evidence tending to show that he did not have gonorrheal infection previously. We cannot agree that this is good law. It bases liability upon conjecture. Unless there be some evidence tending to show that the substance which fell in the eye caused the infection and unless that fact be found, we cannot regard the subsequent loss of the eye as proximately resulting from an injury 'incidental to and growing out of the employment.'

e. Disease of Mind.

Where neurasthenia intervenes after an accident and produces incapacity, to entitle the workman to compensation as for an accidental injury the preceding injury must be shown to be the proximate cause of the neurasthenic condition. Holt v. Yates [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 75; Stride v. Southampton Gas Light, etc. Co. 85 L. J. K. B. (Eng.) 1449, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 285, 115 L. T. N. S. 498, 32 Times L. Rep. 680; *Eaves v. Thus in Eaves v. Blaenclydach Colliery Co. [1909] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 73, 78 L. J. K. B. 809, 100 L. T. N. S. 751, 5 B. W. C. C. 329, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "The short material facts are these: The man was a collier and he met with an accident which arose 'out of and in the course of his employment;' that is beyond all doubt. For a considerable time he received compensation from his employers on that footing, and the learned county court judge, in a passage which I will read in a minute, finds that the evidence satisfies him that the muscular mischief caused by the accident has come to an end, or perhaps (to express what I mean to say more accurately) that so far as muscular power is concerned he is in the same condition in which he was before the accident, and so far as that is concerned he is competent now to do the ordinary work of a collier. He also finds another thing which is equally plain, that the workman is not malingering—that he is not shirking the work with any desire or intention to avoid it. The learned judge says he thinks that, although the man honestly believes he is not able to do the work, and although he is not shamming or malingering, it is sufficient for the employers to show that the muscular mischief is at an end. I am entirely unable to assent to that view. The effects of an accident are at least twofold; they may be merely muscular effects—they almost always must include muscular effects—and there may also be, and very frequently are, effects which you may call mental, or nervous, or hysterical, whichever is the proper word to use in respect of them. The effects of this second class, as a rule, arise directly from the accident from which the man suffered just as much as the muscular effects do, and it seems to me entirely a fallacy to say that a man's right to compensation ceases when the muscular mischief is ended, though the nervous or hysterical effects still remain. [The master of the rolls then quoted passages from the judgment of the county court judge to show that he had misdirected himself in applying the facts, and continued:—] The result of this judgment, however, is that the man is still suffering from the accident, and he has not wholly recovered from the nervous effects of the accident, which are just as real and just as important as the muscular effects and make him unable to work. I hope nothing that I say here will ever be supposed to give any color to malingering; and if the learned judge had found that the man was malingering, the position, of course, would have been entirely the other way, and that would have been a question of fact for him, and we should not have interfered with the finding.

The learned judge has not found that the man was malingering—he has said so in express terms—and, that being so, having regard to what I said before, he has plainly misdirected himself in the award which he made in altering the compensation, in fact terminating it, subject only to the penny a week. In my view, therefore, this appeal should be allowed."

In Morris v. Turford [1913] W. C. & Ins. (Eng.) Rep. 502, 5 B. W. C. C. 606, the evidence was held to justify a finding of the county court judge that a workman was suffering from neurasthenia, as the result of an accident which occurred in the course of his employment, on which finding compensation was awarded.

To warrant compensation for suicide induced by insanity the chain of causation between the injury and the insanity must be established and probably it must also appear that the death was the result of unavoidable impulse and was not merely due to an unbalanced mind. Southall v. Cheshire County News Co. [1912] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 251, [1912] W. C. Rep. 101; Withers v. London, etc. R. Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 341; Malone v. Cayzer [1909] Sc. Ct. Sess. 479, 45 Scot. L. Rep. 351.

In Southall v. Cheshire County News Co. [1912] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 251, [1912] W. C. Rep. 101, it was held that there was no evidence to justify a finding that suicidal tendency and death by drowning were the results of an accident which was followed by traumatic neurasthenia, where the only facts were that the workman was injured in his head by a fall, that traumatic neurasthenia supervened and gradually became worse and that eight months after the accident he was found drowned in a canal.

2. SUPERVENING DISEASE INDEPENDENT OF INJURY.

In Harwood v. Wyken Colliery Co. [1913] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 158, 82 L. J. K. B. 414, 108 L. T. N. S. 283, 29 Times L. Rep. 290, 57 Sol. J. 300, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 317, [1913] W. N. 53, 6 B. W. C. C. 225, it appeared that a supervening disease affecting an injured workman resulted in an independent incapacity. Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "This appeal raises an extremely important and, so far as I am aware, novel point. Where a workman has sustained 'personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of' his employment, and this personal injury still exists, can an employer say that he is no longer liable to pay compensation under the act because if there had been no accident the workman would now, by reason of some supervening infirmity not due to the accident, be equally incapacitated? It may be paralysis, or heart disease, or mere failure of powers by reason of old age. If this view is right, there is scarcely a case in which the workman may not have what have been hitherto understood to be his statutory rights challenged. No distinction can be drawn for the present purpose between the Acts of 1897 and 1906. For fifteen years this contention has not been raised. To avoid misapprehension, I am not forgetting the obligation which rests upon the workman to establish his case. If the employer proves that the man has completely recovered from the effects of the accident, has been cured, an application for compensation must fail. The date of the application is the critical date. But where the man has not completely recovered, has not been cured, I think it is not necessary for him to establish that his present incapacity is due solely to the accident. The argument on the part of the employer mainly rests upon the word 'compensation.' It is plain that 'compensation' is not used in the common law sense. Except in the case of an infant, a man who is totally incapacitated by an accident can, under the statute, get only half his average weekly earnings for a period prior to the accident. In an action for negligence against the employer the man would recover a lump sum by way of damages based, according to a proper direction from the judge, upon the actual wages lost and the probabilities of the future, together with something by way of solatium for personal suffering. There is nothing of the kind to be found in the statute. I have read Hamilton, L. J.'s judgment, with which I entirely agree, and I do not think I can usefully add anything to what he has said on this point. There are, I think, indications in the statute which tend to confirm the view I have indicated. Rule 17 of Sched. 1 provides for redemption of a weekly payment at the option of the employer. If the incapacity is permanent, the amount is the purchase-money of a government life annuity subject to a discount of twenty-five per cent. The possibility of a supervening infirmity varying the rights is not hinted at. The facts are extremely simple. Harwood was a miner. In October, 1909, he was injured by a fall of coal, two ribs were broken, and there was a permanent lesion of the right knee. Half wages were paid until February, 1910, when he was found light work at his old wages. In October, 1911, he met with a second accident, and further injured his right knee. Half wages were paid until May, 1912, when it was discovered that he was suffering from heart disease. There was no award or recorded agreement. In June, 1912, Harwood applied for compensation on the ground of total incapacity. The learned judge held that he was unable to work owing to the condition of his knee and also owing to the condition of his heart, and that it was not proved that the heart disease was connected with the accident. In the words of the learned judge: 'If there had been no accident at all, he would still be incapable for work as a miner or banksman. I am of opinion that there is no work that the accident prevented him from doing that the heart disease has not also prevented him from doing, and that being so, on these facts my judgment must be against him.' And he made his award accordingly. For the reasons above stated I think the learned judge has misdirected himself. The appeal should be allowed with costs here and below, and the case must be remitted in order that the judge may award such weekly sum by way of statutory compensation as he may think fit."

In Clarkson v. Charente Steamship Co. 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 540, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 422, it was held that where a ship fireman suffered an accident to his knee while at work and was operated ten days later for a rupture in the groin, and there was medical evidence that the rupture antedated the accident, an award by the county court judge in favor of the steamship company and refusing compensation to the workman was warranted.

3. PRE-EXISTING DISEASE AGGRAVATED, ACCELERATED OR REVIVED BY INJURY.

a. Under American Acts.

If a pre-existing disease which does not cause incapacity is through an accidental injury revived or accelerated so as to become the immediate cause of incapacity or death, the incapacity or death is held to result from accident. Peoria Ry. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Board (Ill.) 116 N. E. 651; In re Bowers (Ind.) 116 N. E. 842; Indianapolis Abattoir Co. v. Coleman (Ind.) 117 N. E. 502; Bell v. Hayer Ionia Co. (Mich.) 158 N. W. 179; Stombaugh v. Peerless Wire Fence Co. (Mich.) 164 N. W. 537; Voorhees v. Smith Schoonmaker Co. 86 N. J. L. 500, 92 Atl. 280; Van Keuren v. Delvine, 165 N. Y. S. 1049; Milwaukee v. Industrial Commission, 160 Wis. 238, 151 N. W. 247. See also Hills v. Oval Wood Dish Co. (Mich.) 158 N. W. 214.

Thus in the case of In re Bowers (Ind.) 116 N. E. 842, it appeared that an employee engaged in the discharge of the duties of his employment suffered a severe personal injury "by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment." He was at the time afflicted with a "progressive incurable disease" which at that time had not advanced to the stage of producing disability. The injury, however, greatly aggravated the disease and incited it to a more rapid progress resulting in the death of the employee in less than a month. In holding that his widow was entitled to an award of compensation the court said: "Where the enterprise is being conducted and the work is being done subject to the provisions of the act, the right to an award of compensation extends to all cases of personal injury of an employee or his death 'by accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.' Section 2. The personal injury or death of the employee due to his own wilful misconduct, however, is excepted. Section 8. The act specifies a rule of admeasurement of compensation 'where the injury causes total disability,' which includes death (section 29), and also 'where the injury causes partial disability' (section 30). The term 'personal injury,' as used in the act, 'shall not include a disease in any form except as it shall result from the injury.' Section 76d. It will be observed that the act does not make specific provision for a case wherein disability or death results from a personal injury not as the sole cause, but exercising a contributory effect with some existing malady or disease, in that the former arouses the latter from a latent state or aggravates it, and thus accomplishes disability or death at an earlier date than otherwise would have resulted had the disease not been incited by the injury. It is provided, however, that: 'The rights and remedies herein granted to an employee subject to this act on account of personal injury or death by accident shall exclude all other rights and remedies of such employee, his personal representatives, dependents or next of kin, at common law or otherwise on account of such injury or death.' Section 6. Respecting cases wherein an employee may be compensated on account of injuries received, the act is broader and more inclusive than the common law; that is, there are many cases wherein under the act an employee may be awarded compensation on account of injuries received, when in an action at common law he would be denied relief. In view of the provisions of section 6, to the effect that the rights and remedies created in favor of an injured employee by the act exclude all rights and remedies in his favor and against his employer at common law, it should be presumed, from a consideration of the general spirit of the act and the sound economic policy upon which it is grounded, that the legislature did not intend by the act to narrow the rights of an injured employee, but rather that the rights and remedies afforded by the act, while not circumscribed by such limits, should extend to all situations wherein, were there no workmen's compensation act, an injured employee would have his remedy at common law for injuries received, and the act should be so construed where its language reasonably admits of such construction; the general purpose of the act being to substitute its provisions for pre-existing rights and remedies."

In the case of In re Williams (Ind.) 116 N. E. 842, decided in the same opinion as the Bowers case, it appeared that an employee who suffered a nonserious injury arising out of and in the course of his employment was afflicted with progressive arteriosclerosis which had not progressed to the point of disability. The personal injury greatly accelerated and aggravated the progress of the disease so that the employee became totally and probably permanently disabled. It was held that the employee was entitled to compensation on the ground that his injury was the cause of his disability. In the case of In re Colan, 116 N. E. 842, also decided with the Bowers case, it appeared that where latent tuberculosis of the spine was incited to a virulent activity by a severe blow on and over the spine in the region of the dorsal and lumbar vertebrae, received in the course of the workman's employment, the workman was held to be entitled to compensation for the resulting disability.

In Peoria Ry. Terminal Co. v. Industrial Board (Ill.) 116 N. E. 651, it appeared that a railroad fireman fell from the engine while engaged in his employment and died from a hemorrhage of the brain and fracture of the skull. There was medical evidence that a soft spot found on the brain at the autopsy was due to a syphilitic condition. In affirming an award the court said: "Counsel for plaintiff in error contend that the proof does not show that the accident and injury arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased, as required by the statute as construed by this court. There is no question, under the decisions, that the burden rests upon the claimant to show, by competent testimony, not only the fact of the injury, but that it arose out of and in the course of the employment of the deceased, and that such proof must be based upon something more than a mere guess, conjecture, or surmise. . . . Even where a workman dies from a pre-existing disease, if the disease is aggravated or accelerated under certain circumstances which can be said to be accidental, his death results from injury by accident. Acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing disease is an injury caused by accident."

In Milwaukee v. Industrial Commission, 160 Wis. 238, 151 N. W. 247, it appeared that an instructor suffering from an advanced stage of arterial sclerosis was struck in the head by a basket ball which caused the rupture of a blood vessel in his head and resulted in his death. In holding that the claimant was entitled to compensation the court said: "The finding that the injury received at the time of the accident proximately caused his death does not rest upon such clear and uncontradicted testimony. The deceased was undoubtedly suffering from an advanced stage of arterial sclerosis at the time he was injured. Had he not been so suffering, the blow he received would in all probability have caused no serious injury. As it was, the blow ruptured one of the blood vessels in his head. What follows is thus described by the commission in its opinion: 'He turned pale, put his hands to his head, walked into the schoolhouse, had a vomiting spell, a swollen ridge appeared on the side of his head where he had been struck, and soon thereafter he lapsed into unconsciousness. An ambulance was called and he was removed to his house. He did not regain consciousness until the next morning. From that time until his death on December 27th, following, he had vomiting spells each day. His memory was poor and he seemed to be in a dazed condition, and he recognized his wife with difficulty; in fact he never recovered from the results of the ruptured blood vessel brought on by the blow of the basket ball and he died from the effects of it; that, except for the injury, states the attending physician, he would probably have lived three of four years.' There was evidence to sustain such statements, and hence it is deemed the finding of the commission has a sufficient basis to rest upon. The evidence tending to rebut it rests almost wholly upon the improbability that the blow from a basket ball could produce such serious results. It seems to be quite satisfactorily shown that in the instant case, at least, it did. An elaborate and interesting argument was made to the effect that the result which followed in this case was not one that could have been reasonably anticipated and hence the death was not proximately caused by the injury. It is argued that there can be no proximate causation without the element of reasonable anticipation of the same or some result similar to that which actually follows. It is a sufficient answer to this argument to say that the right to recover under the workmen's compensation act is not dependent upon a question of negligence or upon the concomitant conceptions of negligence under the common law. Proximate cause as applied to negligence law has, by definition, included within it the element of reasonable anticipation. Such element is a characteristic of negligence, not of physical causation. As long as it was necessary to a recovery to have a negligent act stand as the cause of an injury, it did no harm to characterize causation in part at least in terms of negligence. But when, as under the compensation act, no act of negligence is required in order to recover, the element of negligence, namely, reasonable anticipation, contained in the term 'proximate cause,' must be eliminated therefrom; and the phrase 'where the injury is proximately caused by accident,' used in the statute, must be held to mean caused in a physical sense, by a chain of causation which both as to time, place, and effect is so closely related to the accident that the injury can be said to be proximately caused thereby. To incorporate into the phrase 'proximately caused by accident' all the conceptions of proximate cause in the law of negligence would be to lug in at one door what the legislature industriously put out at another. Proximate cause, under the law of negligence, always has to be traced back to the conduct of a responsible human agency; under the compensation act the words 'proximately caused by accident' in terms relate to a physical fact only, namely, an accident. Hence if the injury or death can be traced by physical causation not too remote in time or place to the accident, then such injury or death was proximately caused by the accident, irrespective of any element of reasonable anticipation. The term 'proximately' was no doubt used to exclude physical causes so remote in time or place, or both, as to make them of doubtful value in tracing the relation between cause and effect."

So where a workman suffered a hernia through a particular strain causing a sudden protrusion of the intestine it was held that he was entitled to compensation in spite of the presence of structural weakness or actual pain antedating the injury. Bell v. Hayes Ionia Co. 192 Mich. 90, 158 N. W. 179.

In Voorhees v. Smith Schoonmaker Co. 86 N. J. L. 500, 92 Atl. 280, the court said: "The deceased, a man of middle age or over, worked in a wood-working shop of prosecutor, and at the time of the seizure just preceding his death was working at a task of furrowing sixteen posts, each six inches square and weighing about one hundred pounds apiece. To do this he had to get each post upon the table of the furrowing machine and push it forward against the knives by body pressure, which was exerted by pressing his abdomen forcibly against the end of the post. Each post had to be run through twice. After Voorhees had finished thirteen of the posts he sat down, evidently in great pain, and shortly afterward sent for a doctor who had him taken home, where he died three days later. He vomited blood and passed bloody stools, and the doctor pronounced the trouble internal hemorrhage. After death the undertaker, as he testified, found the body in such condition that he had it buried a day earlier than originally intended. It was in evidence that there was a large bruise on the abdomen where the pressure had been exerted on the ends of the posts. The effort of the defense was to show that death was produced by a rupture resulting from cancer. The family refused to consent to an autopsy, but that was their right. It must be conceded that much of the evidence points to cancer and an internal rupture of some kind. But it was quite plain and the trial court was fully justified in finding that the rupture occurred while the deceased was in the very act of doing some unusually heavy work. So that even if deceased was suffering from internal cancer, it was quite within the province of the court to find that the proximate cause of death was the unusual and forcible pressure on parts weakened by disease, which but for the unusual strain would have held out for a considerable period."

b. Under English Act.

The English decisions seem to recognize the principle that compensation may be allowed for the acceleration of a pre-existing disease by an accidental injury, although the results are somewhat conflicting, due perhaps to the fact that the findings of fact of the various county court judges and arbitrators are binding on appeal if they are based on sufficient evidence. *M'Innes v. C. C. 222; Taylor v. Bolekow, 5 B. W. C. C. 130.

Thus in Golder v. Caledonian R. Co. 5 F. (Ct. Sess.) 123, 40 Scot. L. Rep. 89, wherein it appeared that a workman suffering from nephritis which probably would have proved fatal in a few years received an injury in the course of his employment which hastened the operation of the disease and caused his death in a few months, it was held that the death resulted from the injury.

In Scales v. West Norfolk Farmers' Manure, etc. Co. 6 B. W. C. C. 188, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 165, wherein it appeared that a stoker in the course of his employment which involved a great abdominal strain suffered a strangulation of a pre-existing hernia for which he wore a truss, his subsequent death from the effect of the strangulation was held to be due to an "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment," Cozens-Hardy, M. R., saying: "It may well be that an act which admittedly involves considerable strain may be done many times without producing bad results, and yet the next time may end in an accident, and because the man had used in safety the heavy raking iron many times, that did not lessen the risk of strain which he ran from the hernia, and was incidental to his employment."

In Broforst v. Steamship Bloomfield [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. 613, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 594, wherein it was shown that a ship fireman had an apoplectic stroke after working for some time in the stokehold of a steamship, although the medical evidence tended to show that the workman was in a diseased condition and that such a stroke would be likely to be brought on by such exertion, the evidence was held to warrant the inference drawn by the county court judge that the injury was caused by "accident" within the meaning of the act.

Where it was shown by the medical evidence that a workman who fell while loading heavy bags onto trucks was suffering from fatty degeneration of the heart but that the disease was not so far advanced that he would have died without being subjected to some strain, it was held that there was evidence to support the finding of the county court judge that the man died from an accident arising "out of and in the course of" his employment within the meaning of s. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906. Doughton v. Hickman, 6 B. W. C. C. 77, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 143.

In Dotzauer v. Strand Palace Hotel [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 387, wherein it appeared that a hotel scullion who had erythromelalgia, which made his skin unusually sensitive, was disabled by inflammation of his hands, and loss of his nails after washing dishes in hot water with caustic soda and soft soap, his disability was held to be an "injury by accident" within the meaning of sec. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906.

In Spence v. Baird [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. 343, [1912] W. C. Rep. 18, it appeared that a workman suffering from heart disease, which was of long standing and of a progressive nature and would have made itself manifest in any event, in lifting a derailed hutch in the course of his employment, felt a sharp pain in the vicinity of his heart, which was followed by palpitation and shortage of breath. It was held that an arbiter could find that the workman had sustained an "accident arising out of and in the course of his employment" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act.

In Trodden v. McLennard [1911] 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 190, in which it was shown that a workman fell into the water from a rope ladder while descending the side of a ship and was dead when picked up, there being medical evidence that the death was caused by heart failure solely, which might have followed any slight exertion, it was held that the finding of the county court judge that the death was due to "accident arising out of and in the course of the employment" was sustained by the evidence.

In Lloyd v. Sugg [1900] 1 Q. B. 481, 2 W. C. C. 5, it was shown that a jar to a workman's hand caused it to swell and brought on gout in the hand. It appeared that the workman had previously been treated for gout in the hand and elbow. It was held that the injury was caused by an accident and that he was entitled to compensation.

But where a workman suffered a cerebral hemorrhage while moving a weight in the course of his employment and in the customary manner of doing the work, it appearing that his arteries were in a degenerate condition at the time, his final disablement by permanent paralysis following a second attack four days later was held not to have been caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment. M'Innes v. Dunsmuir [1908] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1021, 45 Scot. L. R. 804, 1 B. W. C. C. 226.

So in Walker v. Murrays [1911] Sc. Ct. Sess. 825, 48 Scot. L. Rep. 741, 4 B. W. C. C. 409, it appeared that a farm laborer's death resulted from strangulation of an old hernia following a recurrence which occurred while he was engaged in his employment. It was held that an arbitrator's decision refusing compensation on the ground that it was not shown that the applicant had sustained an accident was not unreasonable, there being no proof of a specific cause for the recurrence.

In Hawkins v. Powell's Tillery Steam Coal Co. [1911] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 988, 80 L. J. K. B. 769, 104 L. T. 365, 27 Times L. Rep. 232, 55 Sol. J. 329, 4 B. W. C. C. 178, wherein it was shown that a colliery workman while at work became ill and died of angina pectoris, it was held that the applicant had not proved "by direct evidence or by legitimate inference from the facts proved" that the disease was due to what took place in the colliery and not elsewhere, the medical evidence being that the angina pectoris was of long standing and might have produced death from several causes.

In Ritchie v. Kerr [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 613, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 297, 6 B. W. C. C. 419, it was shown that a farm laborer died from "failure of the heart" while lifting baskets of corn to feed a bruising machine, the heart failure being alleged to have been contributed to by the strain from the exertion made by the deceased in lifting the baskets of corn to the level of his shoulders. It was held that the facts did not authorize an inference by the arbitrator that the death was due to an "injury by accident" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act, since there was no particular event or occurrence to which the death could be attributed.

In Ashley v. Lilleshall Co. 5 B. W. C. C. 85, it was held that the evidence was insufficient to show that a workman suffering from Bright's disease had received the accidental injury by which it was claimed that the progress of the disease was accelerated.

4. PRE-EXISTING DISEASE CAUSING INJURY.

Where an injury is incurred by reason of a pre-existing diseased condition the decisions are conflicting under varying facts as to whether the incapacity is the result of an accidental injury. Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225, 2 Ann. Cas. 732, 7 W. C. C. 14; Thackway v. Conelly [1909] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 37; O'Hara v. Hayes, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 586, [1910] 44 Ir. L. T. 71; Fennah v. Midland Great Western Ry. 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 440; Kerr v. Ritchies, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 419, [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 613, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 434, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 297; Black v. New Zealand Shipping Co. 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 720; Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 824, [1912] W. C. Rep. 222; La Veck v. Parke, 190 Mich. 604, 157 N. W. 72; Van Gorder v. Packard Motorcar Co. (Mich.) 162 N. W. 107; Carroll v. What Cheer Stables Co. reported in full, post, this volume, at page 346. Thus in Thackway v. Conelly, supra, wherein it appeared that a bus driver whose heart was in an abnormal condition died following a fall from the box of his bus, and the county court judge believed from conflicting evidence that the cause of the fall was heart failure, it was held that the death had not been shown to have been caused by an accident.

In Black v. New Zealand Shipping Co. 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 720, wherein it appeared that an officer died from heart failure on board ship six days after leaving port, although there was medical evidence that the death was due to heart failure caused by the continuous strain of superintending the loading of a ship day and night for several days, it was held that the county court judge properly found that there was no evidence of "accident."

In Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 824, [1912] W. C. Rep. 222, it appeared that a workman while sitting on steps which were not dangerous and talking to the labor master was seized with a fit of coughing, due to lung disease, which made him dizzy and caused him to fall down the steps and the injury received caused his subsequent death. It was held that there was no evidence to support a finding that the accident arose out of his employment.

In Kerr v. Ritchies, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 419, [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 613, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 434, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 297, a finding that the sudden death of a workman from heart failure while at work lifting baskets filled with corn was due to accident was held not to be supported by evidence, it appearing that nothing unusual or unexpected had happened prior to the occurrence of the illness although the sheriff substitute also found that the strain arising from the exertion was a contributing cause of the heart failure.

In O'Hara v. Hayes, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 586, [1910] 44 Ir. L. T. 71, where it appeared a workman having progressive heart disease of some years' standing suffered collapse and death while hurrying to the train for his employer with a heavy parcel weighing seventeen pounds, it was held that a county court judge properly found that the workman's death resulted from the disease and was not an "accident" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act.

In Van Gorder v. Packard Motorcar Co. (Mich.) 162 N. W. 107, in holding that compensation should not have been awarded for the death of a workman from a fractured skull caused by a fall due to epilepsy the court said: "In the instant case the deceased was performing the ordinary services of his trade, that of a plumber and steam fitter. He was standing on a scaffold a few feet from the floor. There is no claim that the scaffold was improperly constructed or in any way unsuitable for the service. Due to no conditions arising out of his employment, but solely to his predisposition to epilepsy, of which his employer had no notice, he fell from the scaffold, receiving an injury from which death resulted. The fall was caused and caused only by the epileptic fit. The fit was the direct and only cause of his injury. We do not think it would be seriously contended that had he fallen in an epileptic fit while standing on the floor and received the injury he did that the injury arose out of the employment, and that the defendant was liable. Collins v. Brooklyn Union Gas Co. 171 App. Div. 381, 156 N. Y. S. 957. The height from which he fell, here only a short distance, could not change the liability for the injury. The most that can be said is that the height from which deceased fell may have aggravated the extent of the injury. A person falling a greater distance may be more seriously injured than one falling a lesser distance; but it does not change the question of responsibility, of liability. The distance of the fall might contribute to the extent of the injury, but it was not a contributory cause to the fall. When the deceased was seized with the epileptic fit he would have fallen, no matter where he was, and the employer cannot be held responsible because that unfortunate seizure occurred when the workman was on a scaffold, a few feet from the floor. Our own cases clearly recognize the rule that in order to render the employer responsible there must be a concurrence of the two elements, viz.: (1) That the accident occurred in the course of the employment; and (2) that it arose out of it. If it did not arise out of the employment, but arose out of something else, the employer is not liable. McCoy v. Michigan Screw Co. 180 Mich. 454, 147 N. W. 572, L.R.A.1916A 323; Klawinski v. Lake Shore, etc. R. Co. 185 Mich. 643, 152 N. W. 213, L.R.A.1916A 342. We must adhere to this construction of the statute, if any force or effect be given to the expression arising 'out of' the employment. The legislature has so written the law and adopted the language of the English statute with the construction there placed upon it. This unfortunate man fell to his death when in an epileptic fit, which did not arise out of his employment and for which his employer was not responsible. We are therefore constrained to reverse the case."

However in La Veck v. Parke, 190 Mich. 604, 157 N. W. 72, wherein it appeared that a workman suffered paralysis resulting from rupture of a small blood vessel in his brain, caused by heat and overexertion and a diseased condition of the arteries known as arterial sclerosis, the court refused to review the action of the industrial accident board granting compensation on the ground that the paralysis was an accident.

In Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225, 2 Ann. Cas. 732, 7 W. C. C. 14, wherein it appeared that a workman was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the hold of a ship from which he was engaged in discharging coal, and was seriously injured and that he had been subject to such fits previous to the accident, it was held that the injuries were caused by an accident arising "out of and in the course of" his employment, Mathew, L. J., saying: "The case affords an illustration of the rule that one should look to the immediate, and not to the remote, cause. In this case the immediate cause of the injury was the fall. I see no reason why we should hold that there was not an accident within the meaning of this statute. The true mode of dealing with the case is shown by a reference to the insurance cases that were cited during the argument. In Fenton v. Thorley [1903] A. C. (Eng.) 443, 446, Lord Macnaghten said: 'One other remark I should like to make. It does seem to me extraordinary that anybody should suppose that when the advantage of insurance against accident at their employers' expense was being conferred on workmen, Parliament could have intended to exclude from the benefit of the act some injuries ordinarily described as "accidents" which beyond all others merit favorable consideration in the interest of workmen and employers alike.' If we apply that view to the particular case, and treat the claim as an action brought upon a policy of insurance against accidents arising out of the employment of the assured, there can be no question that such a policy would cover the case. In my opinion we ought not to go back along the train of circumstances and trace the accident to some remote source when it is plain that the man was in fact injured by falling from the place where he was standing, and where it was his duty to stand, in discharge of his duty to his employer."

In Fennah v. Midland Great Western Ry. 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 440, it appeared that an engine driver died in great pain after a fall while at work on his engine at a station and that he had previously collapsed and fainted at least three times under similar circumstances, although the medical evidence was that he "undoubtedly had a sound heart." It was held that there was sufficient evidence to justify a finding of fact that the man's death resulted from injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

5. NONOCCUPATIONAL DISEASE CAUSED BY EMPLOYMENT.

a. In General.

Where a nonoccupational disease is contracted by a workman in the course of his employment, the consequent incapacity or death of the workman is the result of an accident and in some cases this has been held to be so although there was a pre-existing weakness. Karemaker v. Steamship Corsican [1911] 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 295; Sherwood v. Johnson, 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 686; Higgins v. Campbell [1904] 1 K. B.

C. 98; London, etc. Shipping Co. v. Brown [1905] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 488, 42 Scott. L. Rep. 357. And see the reported case.

Thus in Higgins v. Campbell [1904] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 328, 6 W. C. C. 1, 89 L. T. N. S. 660, it was held that anthrax caused by a germ from wool getting in a pimple on a wool sorter's neck was a disease caused by "accident."

In Scott v. Pearson [1916] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 61, 85 L. J. K. B. 285, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 128, 114 L. T. N. S. 833, 60 Sol. J. 428, 32 Times L. Rep. 412, Lord Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "The applicant in this case is a young woman who was employed as a farm servant. It was her duty to look after and feed young calves. It is admitted that the calves had ringworm in the early part of February. On February 13 she noticed that her arm was breaking out in scabs. The doctor whom she consulted reported that it was a case of 'cattle ringworm,' which is distinguishable from ordinary ringworm. It is a fungus growth. It might be contracted from the calves, who would be likely to push against her, or it might be conveyed by a stick used by her to keep the cattle in their pen. The applicant and her father and the doctor were all examined, and their evidence was to the effect above stated. But the cross-examination of each witness was, by the judge's direction, 'reserved,' and there was no cross-examination, for the learned county court judge did not call upon the respondent. His own note of his judgment is as follows: 'I was of opinion on the above facts that the applicant had not proved an injury by accident, and therefore made my award for the respondent.' His view apparently was that it was a case of disease, and not an industrial disease within s. 8, and that therefore there could be no 'injury by accident.' With great respect I think this is an error. The Anthrax Case [1905] A. C. 230, is decisive on this point. The very recent case in the House of Lords of Glasgow Coal Co. v. Welsh [1916] 2 A. C. 1, decided on the 6th of the present month, is a strong instance. A miner contracted rheumatism and recovered compensation in the following circumstances: He was employed as a brusher. But water had accumulated in the pit, and he was directed to bale it out. To do this he had to stand for eight hours up to his chest in the water. This was followed by a severe attack of rheumatism. The sheriff-substitute found that this was an accident arising out of his employment; and the House of Lords dismissed the employers' appeal. It by no means follows that the applicant will establish her claim to an award when the case is fully tried out. But assuming that the statements of the witnesses are the truth—as the learned judge assumed—I think there was a case which called for an answer by cross-examination, and probably by direct evidence. The notes with which we have been furnished, including a letter written by the county court judge, are meagre. It is not suggested that the period between the appearance of cattle ringworm in the calves and February 13 was either too long or too short for the recognized period of incubation, whatever it may be, or that the young woman had been in contact with the diseased cattle in addition to the calves. The applicant will have to satisfy the arbitrator that there was an accident within the meaning of Fenton v. Thorley [1903] A. C. 443, namely, contact with the diseased calves, either direct, or indirect through a stick, at a date fixed with reasonable certainty, and that such accident conveyed the cattle ringworm to her. If these facts are established, there is no legal difficulty in making an award in her favor."

In Dove v. Alpena Hide, etc. Co. (Mich.) 164 N. W. 253, in which it appeared that a workman inhaled infected dust when handling hides, it was held that his death from septic infection and heart disease resulting therefrom was an accident because it was an unusual event in that kind of work.

In State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 164 N. W. 585, it was held that freezing in the course of the employment is an accidental injury.

In Edmunds v. Steamship Peterston, 28 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 18, 5 B. W. C. C. 157, the evidence was held sufficient to support the finding of a county court judge that the death of a steamship's second engineer, who was asphyxiated by the fumes of a fire in a stove in his cabin during the night, was caused by an accident which arose out of and in the course of the workman's employment, although the engineer had been forbidden to use the stove at night.

However, in Walker v. Hockney [1909] 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 20, a slowly acquired paralysis of a workman's right leg resulting from the strain of riding a heavy carrier tricycle in the course of his employment, and resulting in incapacity for work after five years, was held not to be due a "personal injury by accident."

In Bellamy v. Humphries [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 53, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 169, compensation was refused a weaver for incapacity due to the entrance of a microbe, which had no special relation to his employment, into an abrasion which appeared after he had rubbed his eye to remove dust, there being no evidence as to when the microbe entered.

In Dean v. London, etc. Ry. Co. [1910] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 351, it appeared that a gas fitter shortly after inhaling gas died from paralysis due to cerebral hemorrhage. Seven months before he had had a transient attack of paralysis due to the same cause. The county court judge's decision that the death was not due to gas poisoning was not disturbed, the question being one of fact.

In Hutchison v. McKinnon [1916] 1 A. C. (Eng.) 471, 85 L. J. P. C. 98, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 17, 114 L. T. N. S. 570, 60 Sol. J. 320, 32 Times L. Rep. 283, Lord Sumner said: "My Lords, the accident, which happened to the respondent seaman in the course of his employment, was due to his own mistake in believing that a solution of caustic soda was pure cold water and in drinking it accordingly. The whole question is whether there was evidence that this accident arose out of his employment. All we know of the affair is to be found in the stated case. There are no other competent materials. The facts proved or supposed to be proved in evidence are there carefully tabulated. The words 'I found upon these facts that the accident arose out of and in the course of his employment' do not state further evidence or a further fact found, but are the conclusion—be it one of law only or partly of law and partly of fact—to which the learned sheriff-substitute was led by his previous findings, and in his view it is implicit in them. The can from which the respondent drank was not his own. We are not told that he made any mistake about this. It belonged to the boatswain and the donkeyman, who messed together. We know that they used it for brewing tea, but that carries us no further. We do not know whether they also used it for cooling their drinking water; we do not know whether it was like the tins used by others for cooling drinking water, or whether the tins used by others, who did not mess with the boatswain and the donkeyman, were similar to one another or diverse. It is true that its shape or character did not prevent the respondent from making his unfortunate mistake; but whether that was because of its similarity to other tins, or because he was too confident that it contained drinking water to be deterred by its difference from other tins, again we do not know. There is no evidence about it. My Lords, in this state of the evidence I think that there is nothing to show any causal connection between the accident and the employment. The accident was one which might have happened to any one who drank the contents of a vessel that did not belong to him without first finding out what they were. It was in no way incident to a seaman's employment as such. Again, the sanction given by the ship's officers to the practice of leaving the ship's drinking water about in tins to cool might amount, and probably did amount, to an authority to the seamen to take this method of preparing for use the drinking water with which they had to be supplied; but it amounts to no more. There is no evidence that the sanction extended to the give and take which is spoken of. There is no evidence that the practice, by which seamen drank where they had not drawn, formed any part of the ship's routine or the men's employment. It may have been known to the officers—most things are that happen on board ship—but this is pure conjecture. I think that in doing what he did the respondent, so far as the evidence goes, added a risk of his own to the risks incident to his employment. Where the question in debate is whether or not there is evidence to support a particular conclusion of fact, it is always necessary to begin by scrutinizing the evidence given, and this equally where there is a full note of the evidence, or only such a condensed summary of it as is given in this stated case. It is doubly necessary to be strict where the appellate tribunal must take the facts as found and is limited to the question of law, namely, whether there was evidence to support the conclusion. With all respect to Lord Guthrie, I think that such an expansion of the stated case by interpretation and inference as his judgment contains is inadmissible. My Lords, if any distinction at all is to be drawn, as, of course, it must be drawn, between arising 'out of' and arising 'in the course of' an applicant's employment, the stated case discloses no evidence of arising 'out of.' To hold that it does is either to make 'arising out of' and 'arising in the course of' mean the same thing, or is to carry the evidence by conjecture beyond the limits of the case. I think that the appeal should be allowed."

In Liondale Bleach Dye, etc. Works v. Riker, 85 N. J. L. 426, 89 Atl. 929, it appeared that a workman after ten days' service in a bleachery was affected with a rash pronounced by a medical testimony to be a condition of eczema, and one physician testified that this could be caused by acids. The trial judge found that the condition was caused by contact with dampened goods. In holding that the condition was not due to accident the court said: "The English courts seem at last to have settled that where no specific time or occasion can be fixed upon as the time when the alleged accident happened, there is no injury by accident within the meaning of the act. This seems a sensible working rule, especially in view of the provisions of the statute requiring notice in certain cases within fourteen days of the occurrence of the injury—a provision which must point to a specific time. We need not consider in this case the question of the effect of a finding by the trial judge as in Brintons v. Turvey [1905] A. C. (Eng.) 230. Not only is there no such finding of fact, but the learned trial judge rested upon a construction of the statute which makes the word 'accident' include 'those events which were not only the result of violence and casualty, but also those resulting conditions, which were attributable to and caused by events that take place without one's foresight or expectation.' This, however, is to make the employer's liability turn on resulting conditions rather than on the fact of injury by accident. There may indeed be compensation awarded for resulting conditions where you once put your finger on the accident from which they result; but the ground of the action fixed by the statute is the injury by accident, not the results of an indefinite something which may not be an accident."

In Evans v. Dodd [1912] 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 305, the evidence was held to sustain a finding by the county court judge that eczema resulting gradually from exposure to fumes or splashes of carbon bisulphate in which a workman was employed to dip rings with his fingers was not an "accident" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act.

b. Pneumonia or Rheumatism Resulting from Exposure in Employment.

Under the English workmen's compensation act where pneumonia or rheumatism results from exposure in the course of the employment it is an accidental injury only if it is attributable to some particular event of an unusual character. Coyle v. Watson [1915] A. C. 1, 7 B. W. C. C. 259, reversing 1 Scot. L. T. 174; Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co. 6 B. W. C. C. 398; McLuckie v. Watson [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 975, 50 Sc. L. Rep. 770, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 481; Barbeary v. Chugg [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 174; Glasgow Coal Co. v. Welsh, 85 L. J. P. C. 130, [1916] A. C. 1, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 79, 114 L. T. N. S. 809, 60 Sol. J. 336, 32 Times L. Rep. 539, 9 B. W. C. C. 371, Ann. Cas. 1916E 161, affirming [1915] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1020; Lyons v. Woodilee Coal, etc. Co. [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 235, [1916] Sc. Ct. Sess. 719.

Thus in Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co. [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 549, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 350, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 213, 6 B. W. C. C. 398, it appeared that a miner working overtime in a wet coal pit, was forced by rising water while the pump was being repaired to go to the pit bottom, where, during a wait of twenty minutes, he was severely chilled by water which rose to his knees, and by exposure to cold air which was descending the shaft. On reaching the head of the pit he remained for at least twenty minutes, before going to his home. Within a few days, for three of which he worked at the pit and neglected his cold, he developed pneumonia and subsequently died therefrom. It was held that the occurrence at the mine was an "accident," and that the death from pneumonia was a death resulting from injury by accident. This is said to be the first case in which an arbitrator in Scotland decided that a death which resulted from pneumonia following a neglected cold was a death resulting from injury by accident. Lord Dundas in his judgment said that the case could not be cited as indicating that the court was willing to hold that an ordinary disease, e. g., pneumonia, entitles a workman to compensation, but that the disease must be attributable to some particular event or occurrence of an unusual and unexpected character, incidental to the employment, which could, in the light of the decisions, be described as an accident.

In Coyle v. Watson [1915] A. C. 1, 7 B. W. C. C. 259, reversing 1 Scot. L. T. 174, it appeared that a miner while waiting to ascend to the surface after a wreck in the mine, and in accordance with orders, was subjected to a strong current of air, and as he had been sweating at his work, the draft seemed very cold to him. After reaching the surface he suffered a chill which brought on pneumonia from which he died. An award in favor of the applicant was restored, Lord Parmoor saying: "The delay in the landing where the chill was caught appears to me to be clearly attributable to the wreckage of the shaft, and but for such wreckage would not have occurred. The incidents are closely connected and cannot be treated as independent and detached factors. On the other hand, it is not questioned that the delay on the landing in a draft did cause the injury which resulted in Brown's death. There are both the necessary elements to maintain a claim, a definite accident and injury fairly attributable thereto. It is not material that the wreckage of the shaft did not result in physical impact causing physical injury, or that no one could have foreseen the delay on the landing, and the subsequent chill, as a probable or natural result of the wreckage of the shaft. Such considerations do not arise in a claim under the workmen's compensation act. The workman under the act is as much entitled to compensation if death results from exposure consequent on and attributable to an accident as he would be if death had resulted from immediate physical injury. My Lords, a number of authorities were quoted by the counsel for the appellant. It is only necessary to refer to two of them. The case of Victorian Rys. Com'rs v. Coultas, 13 App. Cas. 222, was quoted as an authority for the doctrine that in ordinary accident cases some form of physical impact is a necessary element to found a claim for damage. The case does not appear to support this contention, nor do I think that any such contention could be supported. The following passage occurs in the judgment: 'Their Lordships are of opinion that the first question, whether the damages are too remote, should have been answered in the affirmative and on that ground, without saying that "impact" is necessary, that the judgment should have been for the defendants.' The second case is Drylie v. Alloa Coal Co. [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 549. My Lords, I am unable to distinguish this case from the present case. It cannot be material, for the purpose of a claim under the workmen's compensation act, whether the chill resulted from exposure to a current of air or to cold water, so long as the exposure is attributable to the accident, and has caused the injury on which the claim to compensation is founded."

In Glasgow Coal Co. v. Welsh [1916] A. C. (Eng.) 1, 85 L. J. P. C. 130, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 79, 114 L. T. N. S. 809, 60 Sol. J. 336, 32 Times L. Rep. 359, 9 B. W. C. C. 371, Ann. Cas. 1916E 161, affirming [1915] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1020, it appeared that a workman employed as brusher in a mine was directed to bale out water which had accumulated in the pit bottom in consequence of the breakdown of the pump. In order to do so he was obliged to stand in water up to his chest for eight hours, and a few weeks later became unfit for work from subacute rheumatism. It was held that the injury was sustained by accident within the meaning of the act, Lord Wrenbury saying: "My Lords, in this case the workman sustained 'personal injury' in the form of a physical ailment or illness, namely, subacute rheumatism. For the purpose of the construction of the act, it must be immaterial whether the 'personal injury' is death, or the loss of a limb, or disease, or illness. In each case the personal injury is not, and cannot be, the accident. It is the result of the accident. The phrase in the act is 'personal injury by accident.' In this and in every case the inquiry must be whether the personal injury which has been sustained was sustained in such a state of circumstances as that it was sustained 'by accident.' I call particular attention to the fact that the language of the act is not 'personal injury by an accident,' but 'personal injury by accident.' This means, I conceive, personal injury, not by design, but by accident, by some mishap unforeseen and unexpected; accidental personal injury. While, on the one hand, it is true that the personal injury cannot be the accident which satisfies the phrase 'by accident,' yet, on the other hand, it is at the same time true that the result is a factor which assists in determining whether the injury was sustained by accident or not. If a man undresses on the beach in order to enjoy a bath in the sea, goes voluntarily into the water, and is drowned by reason of the existence of a strong current, no one could deny that his death was accidental, that his death was by accident. In this case his going into the water was not accidental; the existence of the current was not accidental; but there was a factor which caused his death to be 'by accident,' and that was that unintentionally—perhaps by ignorance—he miscalculated the forces with which he had to do; he did not know of the current, or he thought that he was a strong enough swimmer to cope with it. He was wrong. The mishap which resulted from his bathing in this dangerous place was accidental. He had no intention or thought of going to his death. No other person intervened to conduce to the result. The sufferer's death was an unexpected event, an untoward result; it was by accident. If he had not been drowned it would be accurate to say that happily there had been no accident. That which I endeavor to express is perhaps best summarized by saying that although the 'personal injury' (the death or disease or whatever it is) cannot be the accident, yet the contraction of the disease or the incurring of the death may be by accident. The fact of disease is not an accident, but the contraction of disease may be by accident. Sect. 8, subs. 10, in using the words 'if the disease is a personal injury by accident,' means, I think, 'if the disease is a personal injury incurred by accident.' My Lords, after these general observations I do not feel that any useful purpose will be served by traveling through the numerous cases which have been cited. The question is whether such facts have been found as that the arbitrator could from those facts arrive at the conclusion that the rheumatism was contracted under such circumstances as that the personal injury was by accident. The only finding which I need set out is: '9. That the rheumatism from which the respondent suffered was caused by the extreme and exceptional exposure to cold and damp, to which he was subjected on the occasion in question.' Suppose the events had been that under directions given by the employer the man had gone into the water, and it had proved unexpectedly to be eight feet deep, and that he had been drowned. No one, I think, would dispute that his death would have been by accident. The accident would have arisen from miscalculation or ignorance as to the depth of the water, by reason of which the man was exposed to danger and was drowned. Is there any difference of principle between the case in which the water went over his head and caused death and the case in which the water extended as high as his chest and caused rheumatism? I think not. In all these cases it is essential to bear in mind that the appellate judge has not to determine whether he would have arrived at the conclusion at which the arbitrator arrived, but has to see whether such facts are found as that the arbitrator could arrive at that conclusion. Here the sequence of the language in the case after the finding which I have quoted shows that the arbitrator's finding is that the rheumatism was an injury caused by the extreme and exceptional exposure to cold and damp; in other words, that the extreme and exceptional exposure to cold and damp was that which caused the personal injury to be by accident. I take this to mean that neither employer nor man anticipated that the cold and damp would have been so extreme as to cause the illness; that the exposure of the man to it was an untoward event; that the result was unexpected; that the outcome was a mishap; and that consequently the injury was by accident. Whether I should have been of that opinion or not, I think the arbitrator could properly so hold. I may add that the events of October 23 have, in my judgment, no bearing upon the matter. There was an accident on October 23 no doubt, but that accident caused nothing in the events of October 28. Suppose there is a railway accident by collision, and that a breakdown gang is sent to deal with the matter, and that a member of the breakdown gang is injured when dealing with it. The fact that he is sent to deal with the results of an accident by collision does not show that he suffered from the accident by collision. The fact that there was such an accident has no bearing upon the question whether he was injured by accident or not. So here the fact that the water would not have been there if the pump had not accidentally broken down on October 23 has no relevance to the question whether on October 28 the man was the victim of an accident. The conclusion at which I arrive is that upon the facts found the arbitrator could hold as matter of law that the injury was by accident."

However, in a case where no unusual event was shown, McLuckie v. Watson [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 975, 50 Sc. L. Rep. 770, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 481, it was held that where a miner stood in water for thirty minutes at the pit bottom in order to ascend the shaft sooner than his turn would have come had he waited on dry ground, and suffered a chill which resulted in deafness, his consequent incapacity for work was not caused by an "injury by accident" within the meaning of the workmen's compensation act.

6. STRAIN OR OVEREXERTION.

It is generally held that a strain or rupture from overexertion is an accidental injury, at least if it can be attributed to some particular time and is not the result of the ordinary work which the employee assumed to perform. In some instances such a holding has been made though it appeared that the strain was preceded by a structural weakness of the workman. Beaumont v. Underground Electric R. Co. 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 247, [1912] W. C. Rep. 123; Borland v. Watson [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 15, 49 Scot. L. Rep. 10, 5 B. W. C. C. 514; Aitkin v. Finlayson [1914] Sc. Ct. Sess. 770; Marshall v. Sheppard, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 571, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 477; Brown v. Kemp [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 725, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 595; McArdle v. Swansea Harbor Trust Co. 113 L. T. N. S. W. 933; State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 162 N. W. 678; Manning v. Pomerene (Neb.) 162 N. W. 492; Zappala v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 82 Wash. 314, 144 Pac. 54, L.R.A.1916A 295; Poccardi v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 542, 84 S. E. 242, L.R.A.1916A 299; Bystrom v. Jacobson, 162 Wis. 180, 155 N. W. 919, L.R.A.1916D 966; Casper Cone Co. v. Industrial Commission, 165 Wis. 255, 161 N. W. 784. See also Purse v. Hayward, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 216; Richards v. Sanders (1912) 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 352, [1912] W. C. Rep. 407; Higgins v. Higgins [1916] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 640, 85 L. J. K. B. 1224, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 605, 114 L. T. N. S. 59; Griga v. Harelda, 26 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 272; Grove v. Michigan Paper Co. 184 Mich. 449, 151 N. W. 554.

Thus in Bystrom v. Jacobson, 162 Wis. 180, 155 N. W. 919, L.R.A.1916D 966, in holding that a strain to the muscles of the side suffered by an employee while lifting at his work was an accident which entitled him to compensation, the court said: "The question raised in this case is whether the injury for which compensation was granted was 'proximately caused by accident' within the meaning of those words, in sub. (3) sec. 2394—3, of the Workmen's Compensation Law. On behalf of appellant, it is contended that the statute calls for an accident in the sense of the application of some violence or external force to the person of the workman, that a physical ill caused by the labor the workman is engaged in is not sufficient. It is considered that the term 'accident' as used in the workmen's compensation act has a much broader signification than that contended for by counsel for appellant. It is susceptible of being given such scope that one would hardly venture to define its boundaries. Courts have indulged in very general statements in regard to it, but have not worked out any very definite guide. True, as stated by a textwriter, such term has been more discussed, probably, in adjudications, 'than any other word in the whole English language.' What the meaning of it is, in the technical sense, is quite different from what it is in the popular sense. . . . The thing which occurred was somewhat unusual. It was unexpected and undesigned. There was no external occurrence. The lifting of the heavy block while the workman was not in an advantageous position to do so required him to unduly strain the muscles of his right side. The undue strain was not foreseen or expected. A mishap resulted—a muscular spasm and consequent disability. There was, plainly, the physical causation spoken of in Milwaukee v. Industrial Commission, 160 Wis. 238, 246, 151 N. W. 247—the effort to handle the block while the workman was so circumstanced as to cause a perilous strain on the muscles of his right side. We cannot well add anything of value by further discussion. As we have seen, authorities, English and American, generally agree that the term ‘accident’ when used in workmen’s compensation laws should be taken in the broad sense above indicated—as including violent straining of the muscles, resulting in a rupture or other bodily hurt to an employee from over-physical exertion in performing his work. It is considered that it was so used by the legislature in sub. (3) sec. 2394—3, of the statutes, and that the trial court in this case reached the correct conclusion.”

In Robbins v. Original Gas Engine Co. 191 Mich. 122, 157 N. W. 437, the court allowed compensation for a rupture sustained during the employee’s work, saying: “The Michigan law does not award compensation for all personal injuries suffered by an employee, but for accidental injuries only. Adams v. Acme White Lead, etc. Works, 182 Mich. 157, 148 N. W. 485, L.R.A.1916A 283. The vital question which the industrial accident board had to determine was not whether on January 22, 1915, it was discovered that claimant had hernia, but was whether claimant on that day suffered an accidental injury, arising out of and in the course of his employment. Accepting respondents’ proposition as true, it may be said that upon the occasion in question, by reason of a strain or effort of claimant, in performing his duties, an undiscovered and undiscoverable, but previously formed, sac was pushed through the left inguinal ring and muscles. So much injury claimant then and there suffered, to alleviate, if not to cure, which medical attention and treatment were required. It is compensation for that injury which is claimed and was allowed. Was it an accidental injury within the meaning of the law? It has been said of the expressions ‘accident’ and ‘accidental,’ employed in an act having a purpose similar to ours, that they were used with their popular and ordinary meaning. Happening by chance; unexpectedly taking place; not according to the usual course of things; or not as expected. . . . The statute seems to contemplate that an accidental injury may result by mere mischance; that accidental injuries may be due to carelessness, not wilful, to fatigue, and to miscalculation of the effects of voluntary action. There is testimony in the record, although it is not very conclusive, to support a finding that claimant was suddenly, and accidentally, put at disadvantage by the act of his fellow workman and the sticking of the engine on the concrete floor, and that the rupture and immediate protrusion of the abdominal sac were caused by his efforts to retrieve his position and do his work. It is assumed that it was the first time the sac had been forced through the abdominal wall. If it is also assumed that there was a certain lack of physical integrity in the parts where the injury was manifested, still I think claimant may have compensation for the injury he suffered. I decide only the particular case, and in doing so decline to hold, upon this record, that claimant suffered from disease and not from accidental injury.”

In Hurley v. Selden-Breck Constr. Co. (Mich.) 159 N. W. 311, a brick mason who, as the result of particular strain sustained, while laying terra cotta window sills, suffered a hernia which became strangulated, was held to be entitled to compensation for accidental injury, although structural weakness or actual pain may have antedated the injury.

In Poccardi v. Public Service Commission, 75 W. Va. 542, 84 S. E. 242, L.R.A.1916A 299, compensation was allowed for the death of a workman by dilatation of the right ventricle of the heart during a surgical operation for a hernia caused by a strain while at work, on the theory that the rupture was an accident.

In Casper Cone Co. v. Industrial Commission, 165 Wis. 255, 161 N. W. 784, compensation was allowed for a rupture sustained while at work although the workman was physically unsound at the time, because of inguinal hernia sac.

In Brown v. Kemp [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. 725, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 595, it appeared that a brewer’s assistant while at work felt a severe internal pain and subsequently discovered that he had ruptured himself. It appeared that twenty-two years before he had had a hernia in the same place and had worn a truss until about five years before the later injury. The county judge held that there was “injury by accident” but that it did not “arise out of the employment.” The court of appeal held that there was misdirection, since “accident” having been found the evidence proved that it arose “out of the employment,” Cozens-Hardy, M. R., saying: “It is not in the least analogous to the case of an industrial disease like lead poisoning, where you cannot say the moment that it comes on, and as to which, but for the provision in the act with reference to industrial diseases, there would be no accident at all. There is a finding here, and there could not help being a finding here, that there was an accident of such a kind as to cause a rupture; it was substantially in the place of the old rupture but the county court judge calls it a fresh rupture. I think that is a perfectly accurate term.”

In Zappala v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 82 Wash. 314, 144 Pac. 54, L.R.A.1916A 295, in holding that a hernia received in the course of a workman's employment was the result of a fortuitous event the court said: "Respondent suffers from a hernia and, claiming to have received it under circumstances entitling him to relief under the workmen's compensation act, filed his claim with the industrial insurance commission. The claim was rejected upon the ground that the hernia complained of was not the result of 'some fortuitous event' within the language of the act. Respondent then appealed to the lower court, where, over the objection of the commission, the case was submitted to a jury to determine whether or not the injury was such as fell within the act. Verdict was returned for respondent, and the commission appeals. The determinative question arises under § 3 of the act (Laws 1911, p. 346; 3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6604-3), providing that (p. 349) 'the words injury or injured, as used in this act, refer only to an injury resulting from some fortuitous event as distinguished from the contraction of disease.' The respondent was in the employ of a cooperage company and on the day of the alleged injury was pushing a heavily loaded truck. The language of the respondent, in describing the circumstances under which the injury was received, was 'that the car ran harder than usual, and he tried three or four times to start it but could not move it. Then he put all his strength into it, gave a jerk, and hurt himself; felt a sudden pain; could not move for a little while; put his hands where he felt the hurt, and called for help; looked at himself and saw a swelling, a small lump where he was hurt; that he had never had any pain there before or any previous rupture.' There was other corroborative evidence. It is the contention of the commission that these circumstances do not disclose that the injury resulted from 'a fortuitous event,' and that no accident occurred which produced the injury; contending that, inasmuch as respondent did not slip or fall, nothing struck him, and nothing happened out of the ordinary which produced the rupture or hernia, it cannot be said that the hernia resulted from some fortuitous event. 'Fortuitous' is defined as: 'Occurring by chance as opposed to design; coming or taking place without any cause; accidental; casual;' and a fortuitous cause is said to be, 'a contingent or accidental cause.' Standard Dictionary. In construing the language of the act, we must have in mind the evident purpose and intent of the act to provide compensation for workmen injured in hazardous undertakings reaching 'every injury sustained by a workman engaged in any such industry; and make a sure and certain award therefor, bearing a just proportion to the loss sustained, regardless of the manner in which the injury was received.' State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 150, 117 Pac. 1101, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 466, and that the act should be liberally interpreted, to the end that the purpose of the legislature in suppressing the mischief and advancing the remedy be promoted even to the inclusion of cases within the reason although outside the letter of the statute, and that every hazardous industry within the purview of the act should bear the burden arising out of injuries to its employees regardless of the cause of the injury. Peet v. Mills, 76 Wash. 437, 136 Pac. 685. The sustaining of an injury while using extreme muscular effort in pushing a heavily loaded truck is as much within the meaning of a fortuitous event as though the injury were the result of a fall or the breaking of the truck. To hold with the commission that if a machine breaks, any resulting injury to a workman is within the act, but if the man breaks, any resulting injury is not within the act, ~~is too~~ refined to come within the policy of the act as announced by the legislature in its adoption and the language of the court in its interpretation. The machine and the man are within the same class as producing causes, and any injury resulting from the sudden giving way of the one, while used as a part of an industry within the act, is as much within the contemplation of the act as the other. When the appellant admits that the breaking of the truck because of the application of unusual force with resultant injury to the workman is covered by the act, then it must admit that the tearing of muscles or the rupture of fibers, or whatever it is that causes hernia, while exercising unusual effort, is likewise covered by the act; for there can be no sound distinction between external and internal causes arising from the same act and producing the same result."

In Boardman v. Scott [1902] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 43, a workman who, while engaged in removing a beam from a loom, ruptured several fibers of the muscles of his back which incapacitated him for work was held to have sustained a personal injury by accident within the meaning of s. 1 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897, Collins, M. R., saying: "I think that in this case the workman was injured by an accident. It appears to me that the cases cited by the appellants' counsel are really all consistent, and that they are all opposed to his contention. We have in the present case, in my opinion, the element which is there said to be essential to an accident, namely, that it should be something fortuitous and unexpected. The workman was doing work which, no doubt, he was accustomed to do, but, in the course of doing it, he got a beam into such a position that, unless it was balanced by a sudden and rapid movement on his part, it would have fallen. He was obliged to adopt rapid means to meet a sudden emergency, and, in so doing, he caused an unexpected strain to the muscles of his back. The decisions cited do not affect to give an exact definition of an 'accident,' but I think they show that in the present case there were all the necessary elements of one. The decisions after all can only furnish illustrations on each side of the line. I think that the present case furnishes a very good illustration of that element of the fortuitous and unexpected, which is the essential characteristic of an accident. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be dismissed."

In Timmins v. Leeds Forge Co. 83 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 120, 16 Times L. Rep. 521, a workman's rupture caused by the lifting of a plank which had been frozen to others was held to be an injury by accident within the meaning of the act, as there was evidence of something fortuitous and unexpected.

In Borland v. Watson [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 15, 49 Scott. L. Rep. 11, 5 B. W. C. C. 514, it appeared that a workman in the course of his employment on rising from a kneeling position felt a severe pain in his knee. An examination revealed that one of the cartilages of the knee was ruptured, and incapacity resulted. Three years previously while in other employment the workman had suffered a severe "wrench" of the same knee. It was held that the claimant had suffered an "injury by accident" within the meaning of the act.

However in Kutschmar v. Briggs Mfg. Co. (Mich.) 163 N. W. 933, in holding that a workman was not entitled to compensation for a rupture sustained while engaged in his ordinary employment, on the ground that it was not an accident, the court said: "In the case at bar it conclusively appears from claimant's own testimony that he received no accidental injury. He was engaged at the moment of his injury in his usual and ordinary employment and in the usual and ordinary way. In the course of such employment it was his duty to lift the iron bar once in about every fifteen minutes, about ninety or one hundred times a day. We are of opinion that an employee who receives an injury in the nature of a hernia, while engaged in his usual and ordinary employment, without the intervention of any untoward or accidental happening, is not within the provisions of the compensation act, which as we have held provides compensation for accidental injury only."

In Beaumont v. Underground Electric R. Co. 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 247, [1912] W. C. Rep. 123, it was held that there was no evidence to support a finding that a workman had strained his heart at work so as to sustain an injury by accident arising out of the employment, it appearing that the workman was suffering from heart disease and had to leave work because of failure of the heart and the judge disbelieving the only evidence of an accident which was that the workman strained his heart turning a heavy valve.

In Marshall v. Sheppard, 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 571, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 477, it appeared that a workman on leaving a powder magazine, his place of employment, was clean and apparently in good health but that when he arrived at his employer's office he was covered with mud and was in great pain. He subsequently died following an operation for strangulated hernia. The medical evidence was that the vomiting which supervened might have caused the strangulation. It was held that the county court judge was justified in holding that the applicant, the widow, had failed to discharge the burden of proof that the injury which resulted in the workman's death was caused by an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., saying in the judgment: "It is a pity that no question could be asked of his wife, as to what the deceased said happened to him, but that is the state of the law."

In State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 162 N. W. 678, it appeared that a workman was stricken with paralysis caused by the rupture of a blood vessel due to muscular strain and exertion in propelling a wheelbarrow in his employment. In sustaining a finding that the rupture of the blood vessel was an accident within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law, the court said: "The act provides for compensation to be paid by the employer 'in every case of personal injury or death of his employee, caused by accident, arising out of and in the course of employment,' etc. G. S. 1913, § 8203. The word 'accident' means 'an unexpected or unforeseen event, happening suddenly and violently, with or without human fault and producing at the time injury to the physical structure of the body.' G. S. 1913, § 8230 (h). That the death of the decedent occurred in the course of his employment is sustained. This is the effect of the authorities." But see to the contrary Roper v. Greenwood, 83 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 471, in which it was held that a county court judge properly found that internal injury suffered by a woman from the strain of unusual exertion did not arise from an accident within the meaning of s. 1, sub-s. 1, of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897.

In M'Millan v. Singer Sewing Mach. Co. 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 345, [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 340, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 220, wherein a collector alleged that in order to finish his work he had overexerted himself in climbing the stairs of a tenement, because "sweated," and suffered a chill which resulted in pleurisy, it was held that he did not aver an "accident" within the meaning of the act and that his application was properly dismissed by the arbitrator without proof.

In Olson v. Steamship Dorset [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 658, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 604, wherein it appeared that a ship's stoker was found in a condition of heat apoplexy in a coal bunker adjoining the stokehold of a ship in the tropics, an arbitrator's finding on the medical evidence that the apoplexy might have been caused by the heat of the sun or of the stokehold and that it was not proved that the fit had been brought on by the work the man had been doing at the time, and that therefore the apoplexy was not caused by an accident out of the employment, was not disturbed.

In Johnson v. Steamship Torrington [1909] 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 68, it was held that since the question as to whether the workman did in fact sustain a "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment" was one of fact for the judge, his finding on conflicting medical evidence that the death of a ship fireman who had been seen frequently drinking water while in the stokehole was caused by cerebral hemorrhage due to the heat and the drinking of excessive quantities of water would not be set aside.

In Rodger v. Paisley School Board [1912] Sc. Ct. Sess. (Eng.) 584, 49 Scot. L. Rep. 413, 5 B. W. C. C. 547, [1912] W. C. Rep. 157, wherein it appeared that a school janitor in the course of his employment in carrying a message fainted in the street owing to the heat of the day, and fell backwards striking his head upon the pavement, it was held that the injury by accident did not arise out of the employment.

In Blakey v. Robson [1912] Sc. Ct. (Eng.) 334, [1912] W. C. Rep. 86, wherein it appeared that a plumber who was in a state of impaired vitality at the time suffered heat apoplexy on a hot July day while at work, it was held that, assuming that there was an accident, it did not arise out of the employment, because there was no special danger to which he was exposed because of the employment.

In Parry v. Ocean Coal Co. 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 713, 5 B. W. C. C. 421, [1912] W. C. Rep. 212, it was held that where a workman having an old hernia was seized with a severe pain while at work in a mine, and died as the result of the strangulation of the hernia, an award in favor of the widow was improper in the absence of evidence that the deceased was doing anything which was likely to cause a strain.

7. FORMER INJURY RESULTING IN OR CONTRIBUTING TO NEW INCAPACITY.

In three English cases compensation has been refused where a former injury resulted in or contributed to a new incapacity, while in two cases arising under American acts an award of compensation was sustained under similar facts. Noden v. Galloways [1912] 1 K. B. 46, 81 L. J. K. B. 28, [1912] W. C. Rep. 63, 105 L. T. N. S. 567, 55 Sol. J. 838, 28 Times L. Rep. 5; Taylor v. Clark, 111 L. T. N. S. 882, 84 L. J. P. C. 14, 58 Sol. J. 738; Paton v. Dixon [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1120, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 866, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 517; Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 768, 158 Pac. 762; Winter v. Atkinson-Frizelle Co. 88 N. J. L. 401, 96 Atl. 360. See also Deem v. Kalamazoo Paper Co. 189 Mich. 655, 155 N. W. 584. In Southwestern Surety Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 768, 158 Pac. 762, it appeared that a workman was injured and received compensation and that subsequently after his return to work he was incapacitated by sciatica alleged to be due to the previous injury. In refusing to disturb a finding that the incapacity was due to the former injury and an award of compensation, the court said: "We are convinced that the statute intended to give to the words used their ordinary meaning, and that the expression 'accident arising out of and in the course of the employment' is broad enough to include the injury received by Petersen. There is no contention that he was engaged in anything outside of his ordinary employment when he was injured, so we pass to the next contention of petitioner that there is no substantial proof that the continuing disability had any connection with the accidental injury. Dr. Lohse, who testified upon this subject, gave it as his opinion that there was 'some other cause producing a persistence of his sciatica than the injury.' At the hearing it was agreed that a medical referee be appointed to report upon the condition of Petersen. Dr. Hyman accordingly made a report to the effect that the patient exhibited the signs commonly associated with 'sciatica.' The 'X-ray' examination showed no lesion. The conclusions of Dr. Hyman were as follows: 'It is impossible to state the anatomic basis of the sciatic pain and the pain in the back complained of. Most of the signs of sacroiliac trauma are lacking, but the lesion cannot be excluded. Spinal injury, of which there is no evidence, can produce the same complex. The patient should be given the benefit of an attempted reduction under anaesthetic, followed by immobilization in plaster including the right thigh. If the lesion be sacroiliac slip, there will probably be complete recovery in four weeks. If not, the immobilization may or may not help him.' (The italics are ours.) Dr. Schaller, while declaring that certain symptoms pointed to psychoneurosis, also expressed the opinion that there were 'a number of symptoms' which appeared to him to indicate 'sacroiliac trouble.' As the patient had never suffered from sciatica before the accident, and as the original lesion was as indicated by the pain somewhere in the sacroiliac region, there is some testimony to support the finding of the commission. In other words, the finding that the condition in which Petersen was found to be at the time of the hearing resulted from the accident was based upon a determination drawn from conflicting testimony, and we may not disturb it."

In Winter v. Atkinson-Frizelle Co. 88 N. J. L. 401, 96 Atl. 360, wherein it appeared that a strain had produced heart irregularity and aneurism of the aorta, it was held that there was evidence to warrant a finding that the sudden death of the workman while lifting after his return to work resulted from an accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.

However in Noden v. Galloways [1912] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 46, 81 L. J. K. B. 28, [1912] W. C. Rep. 63, 105 L. T. N. S. 567, 55 Sol. J. 838, 28 Times L. Rep. 5, it appeared that a workman in 1902 in the course of his employment met with an accident which necessitated the amputation of the first finger of his right hand. He was paid compensation until the stump healed but was unable to resume his former work. Subsequently he was re-employed and eventually after using a heavy pneumatic hammer which caused considerable vibration his hand became inflamed and he was obliged to stop work. On his claim for compensation the county court judge awarded compensation on the ground that the accident of 1902 was one of the contributing causes of the later incapacity but the court of appeal held that taking all the circumstances together the later injury did not involve an accident.

In Paton v. Dixon [1913] Sc. Ct. Seas. 1120, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 866, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 517, a workman was refused compensation for total incapacity resulting from aneurism of the heart, it appearing that he had sustained an injury to his back in December, that he resumed his old work the following May and was not troubled with pain in the cardiac region until July, and that he became totally incapacitated owing to the aneurism on the 15th day of August.

8. OCCUPATIONAL DISEASE.

a. Under Michigan Act.

The Michigan workmen's compensation act does not cover occupational diseases. Fox v.

Peninsular White Lead, etc. Works, 84 Mich. 676, 48 N. W. 203; Adams v. Acme White Lead, etc. Works, 182 Mich. 157, Ann. Cas. 1916D 689, 148 N. W. 485, L.R.A.1916A 283; Landers v. Muskegon (Mich.) 163 N. W. 43. Thus in Adams v. Acme White Lead, etc. Works, supra, it appeared that an employee died of lead poisoning, an occupational or industrial disease. In holding that the Michigan workman's compensation act does not include industrial diseases because they are not accidents the court said: "We are of opinion that in the Michigan act it was not the intention of the legislature to provide compensation for industrial or occupational diseases, but for injuries arising from accidents alone. If it were to be held that the act was intended to apply to such diseases, it would, in so far as it does so, be unconstitutional and in violation of section 21 of article 5 of the constitution of this state, which provides that: 'No law shall embrace more than one object, which shall be expressed in its title.' That the act, if it were held to apply to and cover occupational diseases is unconstitutional in so far as it does so is shown by the fact that the body of the act would then have greater breadth than is indicated in the title. A careful analysis of the title of the act shows that the controlling words are, 'providing compensation for accidental injury to or death of employees.' No compensation is contemplated except for such injuries. The prefatory words are generally dependent upon the above-quoted clause. The only compensation provided is for 'accidental injury to or death of employees,' and the last clause of the title restricts the right to compensation or damages in such cases 'to such as are provided by this act.'"

In Landers v. Muskegon (Mich.) 163 N. W. 43, wherein it appeared that a fireman as the result of becoming wet at a fire contracted lobar pneumonia and died, in holding that the fireman's death was not due to "accident" within the workmen's compensation act the court said: "The events which caused the death of Landers, undoubtedly, arose out of and in the course of his employment, but did those events constitute an accident within the meaning of the compensation act? An 'accident' is defined, in Fenton v. Thorley [1903] A. C. (Eng.) 443, 72 L. J. K. B. 790, as follows: 'The expression "accident" is used in the popular and ordinary sense of the word as denoting an unlooked for mishap or an untoward event which is not expected or designed.' This definition is approved in Adams v. Acme White Lead, etc. Works, 182 Mich. 165, 148 N. W. 485, L.R.A.1916A 283, Ann. Cas. 1916D 689, L.R.A.1916A 283. Landers was employed as a fireman. It was a part of his regular duties to go to fires and help extinguish them. In doing so, it was not an unusual thing for him to get wet. Not only does the proof show, but we think it is a matter of common knowledge, that firemen are subjected to exposure and drenching while attempting to extinguish fires. . . . We must therefore conclude that pneumonia was brought on, not by an unexpected event, but by an event which was an incident to his regular employment. . . . If it can be said in the present case that the diplococcus germ was dormant in the system of the deceased, and that it was aroused to activity by his exposure at the fire, the case must fail, because the thing which aroused the germ into activity was caused by events which were incident to his regular employment, and not by the unusual and unexpected event."

b. Under English Act.

As the English workmen's compensation act specifically covers enumerated industrial diseases, only incidental questions can arise thereunder. The following recent cases deal with the allowance of compensation for industrial diseases under that act: Haylett v. Vigor [1908] 2 K. B. 837, 1 B. W. C. C. 282, 77 L. J. K. B. 1132, 99 L. T. N. S. 674, 24 Times L. Rep. 885; Leaf v. Furze [1914] 3 K. B. 1068; Garnant Anthracite Collieries v. Rees [1912] 3 K. B. 372, 107 L. T. N. S. 279, [1912] W. C. Rep. 396, 81 L. J. K. B. 1189; Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery [1914] 2 K. B. 213, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 147, 110 L. T. N. S. 594, 58 Sol. J. 302, 30 Times L. Rep. 283, 83 L. J. K. B. 799; Timpson v. Mowlem, 112 L. T. N. S. 885, 84 L. J. K. B. 1449, [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 219; Jones v. New Brynmally Colliery Co. 106 L. T. N. S. 524, 5 B. W. C. C. 375, [1912] W. C. Rep. 281; Taylor v. Burnham [1910] Sc. Ct. Sess. 705, 47 Scot. L. Rep. 643; Darroll v. Glasgow Iron, etc. Co. [1913] Sc. Ct. Sess. 387, [1913] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 80, 50 Scot. L. Rep. 226, 6 B. W. C. C. 354; McGowan v. Merry [1915] Sc. Ct. Sess. 34; McTaggart v. Barr, 52 Sc. L. Rep. 125, 8 B. W. C. C. 376; Jones v. Guest, Keen & Nettlefolds Lim. [1915] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 508, 60 Sol. J. 75; Bedford v. Cowtan [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 158; Westminster Brymbo Coal, etc. Co. v. Evans [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 241; Chorley Colliery Co. v. Bolton [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 329. See also Keary v. Russell, 8 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 410.

In Leaf v. Furze [1914] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 1068, Horridge, J., said: "In this case the plaintiff left the employment of Messrs. J. & J. Charlesworth on January 5, 1912. On January 20 the certifying surgeon under

s. 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, gave a certificate to the effect that the plaintiff was suffering from nystagmus, one of the diseases to which the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, applies; that he was thereby disqualified from earning full wages at the work at which he had been employed; and that the disablement commenced on January 6, 1912. The plaintiff brought this action in the county court against the person representing the board of management of the scheme. He claims that he was entitled to the benefit of the scheme which has been refused. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for 50*l.* 1*s.* No question is raised as to the form of the action or as to the amount awarded. The only question is as to the liability of the defendants. We have to consider whether the plaintiff, having contracted this disease while in the employment of Messrs. Charlesworth, is entitled to compensation under this scheme. That depends on the construction of clause 2 of the scheme, which contains these words: 'the scheme is intended to be and is in substitution for the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906, and common-law liability, and is intended to provide a fund for the payment of compensation to any member of the scheme in respect of personal injury caused by accident arising out of or in the course of such member's employment. . . .' A scheme of this kind can only be sanctioned under s. 3 of the Act of 1906 if the registrar of Friendly Societies certifies that it provides scales of compensation not less favorable to the workmen than the corresponding scales contained in the act; and where there are subscriptions or contributions by the workmen they get benefits in addition to the benefits provided by the act commensurate with their subscriptions. Therefore we start with this; the scheme itself is one which is in place of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906. It follows that 'accident' must be used in the sense in which it is used in all the provisions of the act; that is to say, it must include disablement from any one of the industrial diseases included in the third schedule with all the concomitant conditions and provisions of s. 8 of the act. The date of this disablement is by s. 8, subs. 4, of the act that date which the certifying surgeon certifies as the date on which it commenced, which is in the present case January 6, 1912; but the liability in respect of it is by s. 8, subs. 1, thrown back upon the employer who within the twelve months previous to the date of disablement, namely, January 6, 1912, last employed the workman in the employment to the nature of which the disabling disease was due. In other words the liability is thrown back upon the defendants. It attached while the plaintiff was still in their employment and a member of the scheme. The judgment of the county court judge was therefore right, and this appeal must be dismissed."

In Haylett v. Vigor [1908] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 337, 1 B. W. C. C. 282, 77 L. J. K. B. 1132, 99 L. T. N. S. 674, 24 Times L. Rep. 885, in which it appeared that a painter who had worked for many years for others showed signs of "plumbism" shortly after his employment by the "first defendants," he was removed to the hospital but all traces of "plumbism" had passed away before his removal, but he died in less than two weeks. Cozens-Hardy, M. R., said: "The question turns upon the true construction of s. 8, sub-ss. 1 and 2, and, so far as I am aware, this is the first case in which that section has been considered in this court. Now the section has no application unless Haylett's death was 'caused by' a 'disease mentioned in the third schedule.' The material words in the third schedule are 'lead poisoning or its sequelae.' In my opinion these words have no operation unless it is established to the satisfaction of the county court judge that lead poisoning was either the proximate or the ultimate cause of death. It is not sufficient that death was caused by something which may in some cases be a sequela of lead poisoning but may also be a sequela of gout or alcoholism. In short, it must be proved that death was a consequence of lead poisoning in the case of this particular individual, not necessarily a direct or immediate consequence, but at least a remote consequence. Now all that is proved is that Haylett died of granular kidney. That does not suffice to bring the case within the operation of the section. But it was argued that subs. 2 enlarges the scope of the section and throws upon the employer the burden of proof. I am unable to follow the argument. That subsection presupposes death caused by a disease mentioned in the third schedule and in no way alters the operation of subs. 1. When once it has been proved that death was caused by lead poisoning or its sequelae, in the sense in which those words must be interpreted, then the burden of proof is thrown upon the employers of the deceased painter to make out that the death was not due to the nature of the employment at the date of the disablement. It was under this subsection that Messrs. Vigor, who were Haylett's last employers, were relieved from responsibility by the learned county court judge. This subsection does not create a liability. Its only use is to saddle the liability upon the proper person. It deals only with evidence, and it has no effect whatever until the applicant has brought the case within the operation of the earlier part of the section. For these reasons, with the utmost respect to the very careful and learned county court judge, who took a different view, I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed."

In Dean v. Rubian Art Pottery [1914] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 213, [1914] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 147, 110 L. T. N. S. 594, 58 Sol. J. 302, 30 Times L. Rep. 283, 83 L. J. K. B. 799, wherein compensation was claimed for a death alleged to be due to industrial disease it appeared that the deceased had worked for the employers in a process involving the use of lead for four days and four and one-half days, the last of which expired nearly a month before his death. With that exception he had not worked in any lead process for twelve months before his death, but for many years prior to that he had regularly worked for other firms in different processes involving the use of lead, and had contracted lead poisoning of long standing. His death was due immediately to pneumonia, but the lead poisoning had so seriously affected his heart that his death was in fact caused by lead poisoning. Eve, J., said: "It is contended on the applicant's behalf that the case is brought within subs. 2 of s. 8, and that a presumption being thereby raised that the disease was due to the employment by the respondents, the burden is cast upon them of rebutting that presumption. The learned county court judge has taken the view that the applicant has not brought the case within subs. 2, and I agree with him. The date of the disablement here is the date of the death (subs. 4 (b)), May 15, and whether the words in subs. 2 'at or immediately before' are to be read as applicable both to the date of the disablement and suspension, or whether, as seems to me quite reasonable, the subsection should be read as though it ran 'If the workman at the date of the disablement or immediately before suspension was employed,' etc., I cannot bring myself to hold that the employment in this case, which terminated on April 19, can be said to have been employment 'at or immediately before' May 15. I think the county court judge was quite right in holding that the applicant's rights fall to be determined under subs. 1 and not under subs. 2. Before turning to subs. 1, I desire to emphasize the fact that even in a case coming within subs. 2 it is only a presumption which is raised, and in my opinion it is open to the employer to rebut that presumption by any available evidence. He may prove, if he can, that the disease was not 'due to the nature of that employment.' What is that employment? Obviously the employment in which the workman was employed at or immediately before the disablement. This seems to me to show that in a case falling within subs. 2 the employer may rebut the presumption raised in favor of the workman or his dependents bringing himself or themselves within the subsection, by proving that the disease was not due to the particular employment in the disease-producing process in which the workman was employed at or immediately before the date of the disablement. This conclusion assists greatly in the construction of subs. 1. It has been argued on behalf of the applicant that inasmuch as under that subsection we have two things proved—the one, the death of the workman caused by lead poisoning, and the other his employment by the respondents within twelve months previous to his death in a process involving the use of lead—the right to compensation from the respondents follows unless they can avoid or mitigate their liability under one or other of the provisions to paragraph (c) subs. 1. If this be sound, and if my construction of subs. 2 be right, this extraordinary result follows—that, whereas in cases where the proximity of employment and death raises a presumption in favor of the workman, the employer can give evidence rebutting the presumption, and proving that the disease was not due to the particular employment at or immediately before the death, yet in cases where no presumption in favor of the workman arises the employer is precluded from proving that there is no connection between the particular employment by him and the disease from which the man died. Indeed counsel went so far as to submit, in answer to a question put to him by the bench, that under subs. 1 an employer could not escape liability even if he were in a position to prove to demonstration that in consequence of precautionary measures adopted in his works the disease could not be due to the particular employment, if once it had been proved that the workman's death was caused by the disease, and that he had been employed within the preceding twelve months in an employment to the nature of which the disease was due. In my opinion, the imposing of such a construction on subs. 1 brings about a result which is so inconsistent with subs. 2, and so manifestly unjust, as to be well nigh impossible, and I do not think we ought to accede to the arguments urged on behalf of the appellant on this point. I think under both subs. 1 and 2 it is open to the employer to prove, if he can, that the disease from which the man died was not due to the particular employment by him, but of course his position otherwise under the two subsections is essentially different. In cases coming under subs. 2 it is on him to rebut the presumption which the facts raise in favor of the workman. In cases coming under subs. 1 there is no presumption either way, and it is for the workman or his dependents to prove his or their case. The present, as I have already said, is a case coming within subs. 1. The learned county court judge has arrived at the conclusion that the applicant has failed to prove her case. There was material to support that conclusion, and in my opinion it is impossible for us to dissent from it. I think the appeal fails."

In Garnant Anthracite Collieries v. Rees [1912] 3 K. B. (Eng.) 372, 107 L. T. N. S. 279 [1912] W. C. Rep. 306, 81 L. J. K. B. 1189, compensation had been awarded a collier under the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906 for nystagmus, an industrial disease, and that although no longer suffering from the disease the workman was unable to do his former work because of an increased susceptibility owing to his first attack. It was held that the effects of the accident, the industrial disease, still continued to exist and that the applicant was entitled to compensation, Cozens-Hardy, M. R., saying: "It is not for me to say whether the learned county court judge was right or not in the view which he took of conflicting medical evidence; he was entitled to take the view which he did, and although it was merely evidence of opinion, medical evidence, like other expert evidence of this kind, must be merely evidence of opinion. I think, therefore, upon that ground this appeal fails, and the learned judge's award ought to stand. But then it was said that this is no doubt an industrial disease, but that it is unlike some of the industrial diseases which are described as producing poisoning and its sequelae. There is no question of sequelae here, and nobody alleges that there are sequelae here. The simple question is, have the effects of the accident, that is, of the industrial disease, been got rid of and disappeared? The learned judge has found that they have not. He has found that the susceptibility to nystagmus was increased, and that being so, it seems to me we cannot interfere with the award, and that the appeal must be dismissed with costs."

In Jones v. New Brynmally Colliery Co. 106 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 524, 5 B. W. C. C. 375, [1912] W. C. Rep. 281, it appeared that a collier had entirely recovered from nystagmus, an industrial disease within the meaning of s. 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1906, and there was no evidence that the attack had rendered him more liable to the danger of a recurrence though he possessed a physical susceptibility to the disease not common to all colliers. It was held that there was not sufficient evidence to support an award because of the fact that his employers would not permit him to work for them underground again.

In Westminster Brymbo Coal, etc. Co. v. Evans [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. (Eng.) 241, it was held that evidence tending to show that a coal miner's insanity was the result of nystagmus, an industrial disease, should have been admitted, on the theory that it might have satisfied the county court judge that it was a sequelae of nystagmus since injuries resulting from an accident include anything which is a result of the original injury.

9. NEW YORK ACT.

The New York workmen's compensation act defines a personal injury as including "such disease or infection as may naturally and unavoidably result therefrom." The New York decisions have accordingly been collected under one heading because of the possible influence of that provision on the determination of any question within the scope of this note. See Plass v. Central New England R. Co. 169 App. Div. 826, 155 N. Y. S. 854; Mazzarisi v. Ward, 170 App. Div. 868, 156 N. Y. S. 964; Rist v. Larkin, 171 App. Div. 71, 156 N. Y. S. 875; Sullivan v. Industrial Engineering Co. 173 App. Div. 65, 158 N. Y. S. 970, 973; Uhl v. Guarantee Constr. Co. 174 App. Div. 571, 161 N. Y. S. 659; Fowler v. Risedorph Bottling Co. 175 App. Div. 224, 161 N. Y. S. 535; Days v. Trimmer, 176 App. Div. 124, 162 N. Y. S. 603; Hiers v. Hull, 178 App. Div. 350, 164 N. Y. S. 767; Naud v. King Sewing Mach. Co. 95 Misc. 676, 159 N. Y. S. 910. See also Heitz v. Ruppert, 218 N. Y. 148, 112 N. E. 750, L.R.A. 1917A 344; Kohler v. Fromann, 167 App. Div. 533, 153 N. Y. S. 559; Putnam v. Murray, 174 App. Div. 720, 160 N. Y. S. 811; Banks v. Adams Express Co. 176 App. Div. 916, 162 N. Y. S. 479.

In Hiers v. Hull, supra, it appeared that a weigher of hides while handling hides received an abrasion on his hand due to wet salt from the hides, which permeated his gloves and caused a swelling. Subsequently while handling diseased hides, anthrax germs contained therein were communicated to him through the abrasion. In holding that he had sustained an accidental injury the court said: "There is a broad distinction between the present case and the case of an occupational disease. The latter is incidental to the occupation, or is a natural outcome thereof. It is expected, usual, and ordinary. This disease incurred by the claimant was unexpected, unusual, and extraordinary, as much so as if a serpent concealed in the hides had attacked him. There is no difference in principle because the attack, instead of being made unexpectedly by a concealed serpent, was made unexpectedly by a concealed disease germ. There seems to be no question in this case but that the claimant contracted the disease in the manner and under the conditions above indicated. We think the circumstances constitute an accidental injury, within the meaning of the statute." In regard to the special provision which defines an injury for which compensation may be made as "Only accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of employment and such disease or infection as may naturally and unavoidably result therefrom," it was further said in that case: "However, there is another theory on which this award may be upheld. The claimant, in the course of his employment and as a result thereof, had received an abrasion on his hand or a fissure therein. This may properly be deemed an accidental injury arising out of and in the course of his employment, and the disease or infection caused by the anthrax germ may be deemed 'such disease or infection as may naturally and unavoidably result' from such injury, within the meaning of the statute."

In Plass v. Central New England R. Co. 169 App. Div. 826, 155 N. Y. S. 854, it appeared that a workman in the course of his employment as a railroad section laborer was poisoned by ivy, and that blood poisoning supervened confining him to his bed where he contracted congestion of the lungs from which he died. In affirming an award in favor of the workman, the court said: "It has been held that contact with poison ivy which results in death is an accidental death within a policy covering death by external, violent and accidental means. (Railway Mail Assoc. v. Dent, 213 Fed. 981 [130 C. C. A. 387, L.R.A.1915A 314].) The injury cannot be called an occupational disease. Plass actually, inadvertently, came in physical contact with poison ivy. The poison to his system caused thereby resulted in his sickness and reduced his power of resistance and made him susceptible to bronchitis. The attending physician treated him for ivy poisoning and then found he had developed more or less infection, the blebs breaking open, and in that way he became infected and while in bed contracted bronchitis, which afterward developed oedema of the lungs and he died quite suddenly. The commission has found that the ivy and septic poisoning was the remote cause of his death and that his poisoned condition predisposed him to the acute congestion of the lungs of which he died. We are not at liberty to review the findings of the commission upon a question of fact. There is certainly some evidence to warrant the finding."

In Rist v. Larkin, 171 App. Div. 71, 156 N. Y. S. 875, it appeared that a workman, to save himself from injury when one of the timbers of a crane broke, jumped into a river and contracted a heavy cold and pleurisy which subsequently developed into pulmonary tuberculosis. In upholding an award in favor of the workman, the court said: "The finding of the commission that claimant's present condition is the result of the accidental breaking of the timber, and that his going into the river resulted therefrom, is not unreasonable, and has some evidence to sustain it. We cannot question it. While the claimant jumped into the water, he did so to prevent a personal injury resulting from the accidental breaking of the timber. The jumping into the river was therefore not a voluntary act, but was the result of the accident, which put the claimant in such peril that his getting wet must be considered accidental rather than voluntary. Subdivision 7 of section 3 of the Workmen's Compensation Law defines injury and personal injury to mean only accidental injuries arising out of and in the course of employment, and such disease or infection as may naturally and unavoidably result therefrom. We consider the claimant in the same position as if the accident had thrown him into the river, and clearly his being accidentally thrown ten feet into the water was an injury within the meaning of the act, and the disease following has been found to naturally and unavoidably result from that injury. He at the time apparently was not physically disabled by jumping into the water, and it was not then quite clear what injury he had sustained; but it has developed that the injury was very serious."

In Mazzarisi v. Ward, 170 App. Div. 868, 156 N. Y. S. 964, in holding that the death of a workman from septicaemia resulting from injuries to the abdomen and bladder was the result of an accidental injury, the court said: "The 'driving' of 'sheeting' was, indubitably, under the evidence and the authorities, the driving of 'sheet piling,' and brought Mazzarisi's employment within group eleven of the enumerated employments, to wit, 'pile driving.' The fact that the deceased may, at the moment he met with injury, have been engaged in performing a physical act more approximately incident to the making of this sheeting than to the driving of it down into the sand could not, had the same been found by the commission, or were the same required by the evidence, require reversal of the award. The immediate cause of death was septicaemia, which actually, naturally, and apparently unavoidably, ensued from the injuries to the abdomen and bladder occasioned by the decedent's fall. Workmen's Compensation Law, § 3, subd. 7. The commission's inquiry on this point was thorough and skilful; this court has no reason to challenge its conclusion. Doubtless there was a diseased condition before the injury; it may be that the injury would not have caused his death but for these antecedent conditions; the injury may have been but one of the concurring causes, set in motion by the injury. None of these facts, if found or clear from the evidence, would warrant vacating the present award."

In Van Keuren v. Dwight Divine & Sour, 165 N. Y. S. 1049, wherein it appeared that a workman at the time of an injury arising out of and in the course of his employment had dormant tuberculosis, which was aggravated by the injury so that it became acute and caused his death, it was held that the right to compensation was secured, even though the disease itself may not have resulted from the injury.

In Fowler v. Risedorph Bottling Co. 175 App. Div. 224, 161 N. Y. S. 535, it was held that an employee who, while engaged in a hazardous employment, suffered a cerebral hemorrhage as the result of an unusual strain or exertion suffered an accidental injury within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law.

In Naud v. King Sewing Mach. Co. 95 Misc. 676, 159 N. Y. S. 910, wherein it was alleged that a workman was injured by inhaling certain poisonous gases and fumes which occasioned permanent injury to his lungs and other portions of the body, in holding that the injury was accidental if the allegations of the complaint were true, the court said: "We fail to see therefore, if the allegations of the complaint are true, that the plaintiff's injuries were the result of the defendant's negligence, why the plaintiff was not fairly entitled to compensation for his injuries under the provisions of the compensation act, as a 'disability . . . resulting from an accidental injury, . . . arising out of and in the course of his employment.' Jensen v. Southern Pac. Co. 215 N. Y. 514; Winfield v. New York Cent. etc. R. Co. 216 N. Y. 284; Connors v. Semet-Solvay Co. 94 Misc. 406. An 'accidental injury' as used in this statute is clearly distinguishable from an injury in the nature of a vocational disease, sustained in the course of an employment, where from the inherent nature of the work disease is likely to be contracted. 'Accidental' has been defined as 'happening by chance, or unexpectedly taking place, not according to the usual course of events; casual; fortuitous.' North America L. etc. Ins. Co. v. Burroughs, 69 Pa. St. 43, 8 Am. Rep. 212. In insurance policies providing for an indemnity, 'accidental' cause is defined as 'an event happening without human agency, or, if happening through human agency, an event which under the circumstances is unusual, and not expected to the person to whom it happens.' Within these recognized definitions of the word 'accidental,' if the injuries sustained by the plaintiff were occasioned in the manner alleged in the complaint, they were clearly 'accidental' within the meaning of the Workmen's Compensation Law; and the plaintiff would have been entitled to compensation as provided in that act. When therefore the compensation commission found and determined, after a hearing, that the plaintiff's injuries were not the result of an 'accident' it found by necessary implication that such injuries were not due to the defendant's negligence, or occasioned as alleged in the complaint. The importance and legal significance of this adjudication by the compensation commission arises out of the fact that by the provisions of section 20 of the Compensation Law the commission is required to determine the claim made before it for compensation, after notice to the interested parties, and an opportunity to present evidence and be represented by counsel. The act then declares that 'The decision of the commission shall be final as to all questions of fact, and, except as provided in section twenty-three, as to all questions of law.' Therefore it is that the holding of the commission that the plaintiff's injuries were not due to 'accident' makes that question res adjudicata as to the plaintiff and the defendant in this action, and precludes a further inquiry into the questions of fact in this action."

In Days v. Trimmer, 170 App. Div. 124, 162 N. Y. S. 603, it was held that a frost-bite received by a helper on a coal delivery wagon while at his work and from which ulcers developed was an accidental injury.

In Uhl v. Guarantee Constr. Co. 174 App. Div. 571, 161 N. Y. S. 659, in affirming an award in favor of the claimant for compensation for the death of an employee from heart failure due to sudden dilatation of the heart resulting from the aggravation of a cardiac lesion by unusually heavy lifting, the court said: "We are not called upon to determine whether the evidence clearly established that this death was accidental. The finding of the commission upon a question of fact is conclusive upon us, and the only question is whether there is any evidence to sustain such a finding. If there is no evidence, the finding may be treated as error of law. If the heavy and unusual strain aggravated the cardiac lesion, and caused a sudden dilatation of the heart, and consequent heart failure, resulting in death, the death may well be considered as accidental and within the act. In Broleski v. Nichols Copper Co. 171 App. Div. 959, 155 N. Y. S. 1096, the deceased had chronic heart disease, the valves of the heart being thick and curled up; but he came to his death through overexertion or from an electric shock, and the award of the commission was sustained. In McCaill v. New York Transp. Co. 201 N. Y. 221, 94 N. E. 616, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 131, Ann. Cas. 1912A 961, the injured person died of delirium tremens, precipitated or hastened by the accidental injury, caused by the defendant's negligence, and it was held that the negligence was the proximate cause of the death. In the present case there was no perceptible physical injury; but death resulting from a strain, as stated, may well be called accidental."

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Disease as Accident — Suicide from Supervening Insanity.

No compensation can be recovered under the workmen's compensation act by the dependents of a workman who, having sustained an accidental injury, became insane from despondency over his slow recovery and committed suicide, there being no direct causal connection between the insanity and the injury.

[See note at end of this case.]

[772] Appeal from an award of the judge of the Southwark County Court sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1906.

[773] The following statement of facts is taken from the judgment of the learned county court judge:

The deceased man was an engine-driver for the respondents and met with an accident to his right thumb on October 26, 1915. The wound became septic and was a long time healing, and the railway company paid him compensation at the rate of £1 a week. The injury was always local and had no physical effects on the brain. The deceased was very nervous about himself from the first, and after Christmas he began to be depressed and neurasthenic, and this condition gradually got worse up to March. On March 3 he was seen both by his own doctor and by the respondents' doctor. The thumb was then all but well, and he was told that two or three weeks at a convalescent home would probably make him fit for work. There was no doubt that he was most anxious to get back to work and that this was the point he had been worrying about. But even after what he had been told by the doctors he was in an intensely melancholic condition, and talked of going to the workhouse and of being afraid to go home and sit down with his children. On March 4 he had his dinner at home and appeared more cheerful than he had lately been. He went out about 4.15 and walked to Battersea Park Station. He was standing at one end of the platform near the edge as the Brighton express was approaching at 4.33, and he was seen to put up his hands in the attitude of diving and jump head foremost in front of the engine which killed him. He had shown no sign of insanity before the accident of October, and there did not appear to be any record of insanity in the family. His widow and other dependents applied for compensation, and the question was whether his death was the result of the accident.

It was agreed by the parties that this was a case of suicide. The only question at issue was whether the death by suicide resulted from the injury caused by the accident of October 28, 1915.

The learned judge said that it did not appear to have been settled by authority whether suicide even under the influence of insanity could be the result of injury by accident for the purposes of the Act. He did not himself see why it should not be so where there was a clear case of insanity in the legal sense and clear proof of its having been induced by the accident. In such a case it might well be held that the suicidal impulse was a mere symptom of a mental illness [774] induced by the injury and that there was no act intervening that was really the man's own. But in the present case he was not satisfied that either of the above matters was proved.

That the man's mind was unsound from the medical point of view was clear, because he was found to be in an intensely melancholic condition after all rational basis for depression was at an end, and his fears as to going to the workhouse and so on were mere delusions. But there was nothing to show that he was incapable of understanding the nature or quality of his act or that his delusions were such as would have justified him had they been facts. Possibly there was some uncontrollable impulse that accounted for the suicide, and this might have been due to the same cause as the other mental symptoms, but that was mere conjecture. As to the connection between the insanity, if any, and the injury, all that was actually proved was that there was no insanity before the injury, that symptoms of neurasthenia began to develop some two or three months afterwards, and that the depression and subsequent delusions centred on the injury and its consequences real or imagined. He did not think this proved that the injury was the cause of the mental symptoms. It was argued that the expert evidence was opposed to this finding and that in the absence of any cross-examination or contradiction he was bound to act on it. The medical evidence only came to this: that neurasthenia was induced by the injury and the consequent enforced idleness, that neurasthenia cases often turned into something which was either insanity or on the border line of insanity, and that the witness believed the suicide was the "outcome" of the neurasthenia. This was by no means the same thing as positive expert evidence that a minor local injury such as that in question could be the cause of insanity in its legal sense or that such insanity in fact existed.

The learned judge held that the suicide was not the result of the accident and refused to give compensation. The dependants appealed.

[775] Lord Gwynne-Hardy, M.R. (after stating the facts).—The death was found to be, and plainly correctly found to be, a suicide. The question is whether that was a consequence of an accident arising out of and in the course of the employment.

It has been said that there is some doubt whether suicide can be the result of an accident within the Workmen's Compensation Act. I confess I do not feel that doubt at all. I have no doubt that it may be. I have no doubt that an accident may be of such a nature that there is a lesion of the brain, a structural injury to the brain itself, which accident may lead to an unsoundness of mind which may directly lead to suicide.

[776] I do not think that the law applicable to this case can be better put than it is put in the Scotch Court of Session in Malone v. Cayzer, 1 B. W. C. C. 27. There are some passages in the judgments which I must read as expressing what, in my view, is the true state of the law. In that case the sheriff-substitute had declined to allow the claim to go to proof because he said that the man had died of suicide and not of the accident. It came before the Court of Session, who said that that was wrong and that it ought to go to proof in order that evidence might be called to say whether the causation was or was not made out. "The claimant," the Lord President said, "will have to do something more than say simply that there was a possibility of death arising from such an injury in such a way—she must show that it was in fact the result of the injury. I have some doubts as to whether the state of knowledge of cerebral pathology is so fixed as, in circumstances like this, to enable one to reach such a conclusion." Then he said he himself was not able to express an opinion upon it. Then Lord M'Laren gives a very valuable judgment. He says in 1 B. W. C. C. 32, 33: "I cannot gather from the sheriff-substitute's statement anything more than this, that the man committed suicide in consequence of the depression of mind brought on by his blindness." The accident caused blindness. "There is no averment of insanity in the physiological sense of a result of disease of the brain, but merely that a man has committed suicide, and is supposed to have done so under some insane impulse." Then he says a little further down, after saying that it must go back to the sheriff-substitute, "I hope the sheriff-substitute will direct his attention to the point whether this is insanity that would be proved by medical evidence of the symptoms, or whether it is anything more than just a mode of stating the supposed cause, because there must be some cause for the suicide." And Lord Kinnear says: "The question whether death has resulted from an accident is always a question of fact."

Applying the law as there laid down, of course it is not enough merely to say this man, who committed suicide some six months after the injury to his thumb, committed suicide; you must show that the suicide was really a result of the accident. There is no physiological injury here which suffices to explain the suicide. It [777] is not said that the man's brain was in any way injured. In fact it was not. Mr. Rigby Swift, who has argued this case with great ability, does not suggest that at all. The man's injury was to his thumb, and although occasionally after a certain time he had throbbing pains coming from the thumb up to his head, there is no proof whatever, and no suggestion of proof, of any injury to the brain as such.

But then it is said the man had neurasthenia some two or three months after the injury to his thumb, and that he was depressed, both before and after that, by reason of his desire to get back to his work and his inability to do so. It is said, and quite truly, that it was not his own fault that he did not go back to work; his own doctor and the company's doctor both said that he was not in a fit state to go back; but he had neurasthenia, he had depression of spirits, although it varied from day to day. That is all we know about him. On the particular day when this event took place he was, as described by his wife, less depressed than usual. He ate his dinner at home and seemed to be better; he went out after dinner to see, I suppose, some of his friends and old comrades; he went to Battersea Park Station, and, it may be on a sudden impulse or it may not be on a sudden impulse,—I cannot tell which—he committed suicide.

Now the burden of proof of course lies upon the dependants. The county court judge must be satisfied, and we must be satisfied, so far as it is for us, that the burden of proof has been discharged.

The learned county court judge has given a judgment which on one point, and one point only, seems to me to afford some doubt. He has, if I may be allowed with great respect to say this, somewhat confused himself by attempting to draw a distinction between legal insanity and medical insanity. He says: "This man was, I think, of unsound mind, but he was not of unsound mind in the legal sense." It is a matter of common knowledge that the views of doctors and lawyers always have differed, and I suppose always will differ, on the subject of insanity. I am disposed to think that the cause of his committing suicide was that he was of unsound mind at that time. The lawyers would say that that was so. But then the learned county court judge goes on to say this. He was quite clear in his own mind that there must be a connection between the insanity and [778] the injury. Unless the chain of causation, as it has been called, is complete no claim can be made; and he says this: "As to the connection between the insanity, if any, and the injury, all that was actually proved is that there was no insanity before the injury, that symptoms of neurasthenia began to develop some two or three months afterwards, and that the depression and subsequent delusions centred on the injury and its consequences, real or imagined. I do not think this proves that the injury was the cause of the mental symptoms."

In my opinion that is quite correct; at all events we cannot differ from it. Although in the subsequent part, where he deals with legal insanity, he says something which I have a little difficulty in following, I do not think that that in any way affects the main purport of the judgment, or authorizes us to say that he has so misdirected himself that there ought to be a new trial, or that his judgment is so obscure and uncertain that there ought to be a new trial. I have very carefully considered the evidence given by the man's own doctor and by the company's doctor, and I do not think that that evidence really suffices to connect the suicide and the medical insanity, if I may use such a term, directly with the accident; it is post hoc, no doubt, but I cannot say that it is propter hoc.

I think, if we were to assent to the very able and interesting arguments which we have heard, we should be driven to say this, that wherever we find an accident which involves, as so many accidents do, depression of spirits, particularly depression of spirits in the case of a man who has been leading an active life as a labouring man or artisan, depression at being kept from his work and idling about at home; the neurasthenia and the suicide can all be traced directly to the accident. If we were to say that we should be opening a door which, I think, we ought not to open. I think, as the Scotch Court said, that there must be some direct evidence of the insanity being a result of the accident—something more than a subsequent occurrence. The legal causation must be established and proved. To my mind it is not established and proved in this case. In my opinion, though I say it with real regret, the applicants have not made out their case here, and the decision of the learned county court judge cannot be interfered with. The appeal will be dismissed.

[779] PICKFORD, L. J.—I think it is quite clear that we cannot make an award in favour of the dependents in this case. In fact we were not seriously asked to do so. As to the question whether there ought to be a new trial, I confess I felt considerable doubt for this reason, that I thought there was, at least, a question whether the learned judge, by the distinction which he drew between legal insanity, by which I take it he meant such insanity as would afford a defense in the case of a charge of crime, and medical insanity, which meant an unhinged or insane state of mind, under which the man did things which he otherwise would not have done, had not somewhat confused himself. It seems to me in a case of this kind you must have insanity proved as resulting from, not merely following and not merely perhaps suggested by, the accident. You must have it resulting from the injury in some way. I should be very sorry to say that where you have a nervous state, with no signs of what is really called neurasthenia induced by the shock of the accident, but you have, several months afterwards, insanity produced by brooding over the consequences of the accident, and the anxiety caused by not being able to return to your work at once, that must be taken necessarily to be the result of the accident so as to give compensation. In that part of his judgment which the Master of the Rolls has read the learned judge seems to me to be giving a clear decision apart from the question whether the insanity was legal or medical. He is there speaking of the injury being the cause of the mental symptoms which he himself has found to exist; at least, that is the way I read his judgment. But there is no doubt that in the passage preceding it he has distinguished between the two, and at the end of his judgment he again says, after discussing Dr. Thackwell's evidence, "This is by no means the same thing as positive expert evidence that a minor local injury such as that in question can be the cause of insanity in its legal sense or that such insanity in fact existed."

Now I must say that those two passages have caused considerable doubt in my mind, not by any means altogether removed now, as to whether he has not somewhat confused himself by that distinction which he has drawn, which, I think, is not a sound distinction for the purpose of this case; but he certainly, in the first passage that has been read, does not draw any such distinction, and he merely says "I cannot find that it is proved that the injury was the cause of the [780] mental symptoms." I think he was justified in finding that, and when I say justified I mean it was open to him to find that. I cannot agree that, because he says that he accepts Dr. Thackwell's statements, he must therefore, when he comes to consider them with reference to all the other facts that were proved in the case, say that he necessarily accepts Dr. Thackwell's opinions. To accept a medical witness's statements is one thing, to accept his opinions is a very different thing; and I do not think that a learned judge who says "I quite believe what the medical witness is telling me" is also bound to go on to say "therefore I shall accept his opinions," and I think that it was open to the learned judge to find as he has done. But, as I have said, my doubt has been whether he may not have somewhat confused his mind by the distinction that he draws between the two kinds of insanity, although in that passage his finding seems to be independent of any such distinction. I have my doubts about it, but, as the other members of the Court do not feel the same doubts, I do not dissent from their judgment that this appeal must be dismissed.

WARRINGTON, L. J.—I am of the same opinion. That suicide may be the result of what, in the statute, is called "personal injury by accident" I have no doubt; but in order to make out that it is the result it must first be proved that the suicide is the result or the effect of insanity and that the insanity is the result of the injury. If the second of those two questions is answered in the negative the first of the two questions really never arises. The learned judge in the present case answered the second of the two questions in the negative in the passage which has been read.

Now, as I understand it, what the learned judge means by that is that on the medical evidence all he could find was that the insanity (whether in the legal or in the moral sense is immaterial for this purpose) was the result of the depression caused by the fact of the accident and the enforced idleness consequent upon it and the man's brooding over the fact of the accident—not that it was caused in any material sense by the injury which the man had received. If that is true, that is, in my opinion, in accordance with the views expressed in the Scotch Court of Session, which I will refer to presently, which views commend themselves to me. If we were to hold that insanity [781] is the result of the injury by accident where it is only indirectly the result—that is to say, where it is not occasioned by the injury itself, but by the consequences of the injury—I think we should be opening a door much wider than I, for one, should be prepared to.

I think I ought to justify the view I have expressed by referring to, first, one passage in the judgment of the Lord President and a passage or two in the judgment of Lord McLaren in the case of Malone v. Cayzer, 1 B. W. C. C. 27, 31, 32. That case came before the Court on what we should call in these Courts demurrer. The sheriff-substitute, having determined that, on the allegations made in the statement laid before the Court, there was no ground in law for those statements, had dismissed the application. The Court of Session sent it back to him in order to take the evidence and see what the real facts were. That was a case of suicide. To put it in other words, the Court decided that it was possible that suicide might be the result of the injury. The Lord President says this: "It may be a somewhat uphill matter for the claimant to prove her case. I should like to say that she will have to do something more than say simply that there was a possibility of death arising from such an injury in such a way—she must show that it was in fact the result of the injury." Then come these words: "I have some doubts as to whether the state of knowledge of cerebral pathology is so fixed as, in circumstances like this, to enable one to reach such a conclusion." I think, by his reference there to the state of knowledge of cerebral pathology, he obviously points to this: that, in his view, if insanity is to be treated as the result of the accident, it must be as the direct result, the accident or the injury having occasioned some pathological effect upon the brain, and not what Lord McLaren calls a moral result or a moral effect arising from the consequences of the accident. Now Lord McLaren takes the same view, but he puts his view with greater clearness, I think, if I may say so with respect, than the Lord President himself. What he says is this, 1 B. W. C. C. 32: "I cannot gather from the sheriff-substitute's statement anything more than this, that the man committed suicide in consequence of the depression of mind brought on by his blindness. There is no averment of insanity in the physiological sense of a result of disease of the brain, but merely that a man has committed suicide, and is [782] supposed to have done so under some insane impulse. It seems to me that in construing the Act of Parliament, and particularly the beginning of the First Schedule, we must hold that when the Act prescribes as a condition of compensation that death results from the injury, what is within the contemplation of the statute is a material injury with death materially resulting from it." That, I think, expresses the same opinion as that which I have ventured to express, that, in order that the insanity may be treated as the result of the injury, you must find that as a physiological result, not as an indirect result from the man's brooding over the fact of the injury, or from the depression occasioned in the case of a busy man restrained by the effect of the injury from going to work.

I think, therefore, that not only was there sufficient evidence to support the finding of the learned county court judge with reference to what I have called the second of the two questions, namely, whether the insanity was the result of the injury, but that I should have arrived, on the evidence, at the same conclusion myself.

Then, if the learned judge was right on that point, the first question, whether the suicide was the result of the insanity, really never arises at all. It is only on that point that such confusion as there is in the judgment of the learned county court judge with reference to the distinction between legal insanity, or insanity in the legal sense such as would afford a defense to an indictment, and insanity or unsoundness of mind as it is regarded by the medical man, arises. It seems to me, therefore, that in reality, having regard to the view which the learned county court judge has taken, and the view which, with all respects, I take as to the answer to the second of the two questions, such difficulty as is occasioned by the apparent confusion between legal insanity and medical insanity really becomes of no importance, because it is only on the first of the two questions, whether the suicide results from the insanity, that the question what is the nature of the insanity can be material.

On the whole, therefore, I think the appeal ought to be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

The reported case holds that compensation should not be awarded under a workmen's compensation act for the death of a workman who, after receiving an injury in the course of his employment, becomes depressed and melancholy over the slowness of his recovery and commits suicide. The subject of disease as an accident is discussed at length in the note to Vennen v. New Dells Lumber Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 293.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Disease as Accident.

Where a hack driver in the employment of defendant stable company which had elected to become subject to the workmen's compensation act (Pub. Laws 1912, c. 831), was pitched from his seat by the motion of the hack while driving and while helpless from dizziness or unconsciousness, occasioned by a disease from which he was suffering, he is entitled to compensation for the resulting injuries, since his fall was an "accident arising out of his employment" within the meaning of article I, § 1, of the act.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Where, in an action by the driver for such injuries, the evidence showed that the fall from the hack was partly the result of a positive pitching of the driver from his seat by the motion of the vehicle, and not the mere inert collapse of an unconscious man, the finding of the court below that petitioner "received a personal injury by an accident arising out of . . . said employment," will not be disturbed, since the act provides that findings of fact in the absence of fraud shall be conclusive.

[See note at end of this case.]

Same.

Whether in such a case the accident arose "out of" the employment within meaning of Laws 1912, c. 831, art. I, § 1, is to be determined by ascertaining whether the proximate cause of the injuries received was an element of, or arose out of, the employment, as disassociated from the fact that such proximate cause was set in motion or aided by petitioner's diseased condition as the remote cause.

Appeal from Superior Court, Providence and Bristol counties: TANNER, Judge.

Petition under workmen's compensation act. William Carroll petitioner, and What Cheer Stables Company, respondent. Judgment for [422] PARKHURST, J.—This cause comes before this court on respondent's appeal from a decree entered by Mr. Justice Tanner in the Superior Court on the 11th day of May, 1915, under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act, so called, enacted by Public Laws of 1912, Chapter 831. In this decree it is recited that on the first day of December, 1914, the petitioner, William Carroll, was engaged at Providence, Rhode Island, in the employ of the respondent, What Cheer Stables Company, and had been engaged in this employment for the space of about five years.

That said Carroll was not engaged in domestic service or agriculture at the time, but was in the employ of the respondent as a hack driver and on the first day of December, 1914, while engaged in this employ, received a personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of said employment.

That at said time the company had elected to become subject to the act and the employee had waived his right of action at common law.

That the injury was not occasioned by the wilful intention of the employee to bring about the injury to himself and did not result from his intoxication while on duty.

That the cause of the injury was falling from the driver's seat of a hack which the petitioner was driving in the regular course of his employment, the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering, the evidence showing hernia, hardening of the arteries and Bright's disease.

[423] That the injuries were a broken right clavicle, broken ribs and shock to the nervous system, rendering the employee totally and permanently incapacitated for work and resulted in the permanent total incapacity of said Carroll.

That at the time of said injury the employee was receiving wages in the sum of thirteen ($13.00) dollars per week, working seven (7) days a week, with one day off in each four weeks.

That the amount of average weekly wages at the time of receiving the injury was ten and seventy-three one-hundredths (10.73) dollars, and that the sum of twenty-eight (18.00) dollars is a reasonable charge for medical and hospital services and medicines required by the employee during the first two weeks after the injury.

And that upon the above facts the What Cheer Stables Company should pay said Carroll the sum of twenty-eight ($28.00) dollars for medical services and medicines as aforesaid and the further sum of five and thirty-six one-hundredths ($5.36) dollars per week compensation, computed from the first day of December, 1914, until further order of the court, but in no event for a period in excess of five hundred (500) weeks. Costs were awarded in the sum of twelve (12.00) dollars.

On the 13th day of May, 1915, the company filed with the clerk of the Superior Court a "claim of appeal from the final decree of the said Superior Court entered on the 11th day of May, A. D. 1915."

On the 27th day of May, said company filed with the clerk aforesaid its reasons of appeal which are in substance, and without stating them in full, that the decision of the justice and the decree appealed are against the law and the evidence, in various details.

The real question raised by this appeal arises from the contention of the respondent that the evidence does not show a "personal injury sustained by accident by an employee arising out of and in the course of his employment," under the language of the statute (Pub. Laws, Ch. 831, Art. I), § 1, which reads as follows:

[424] "Section 1. In an action to recover damages for personal injury sustained by accident by an employee arising out of and in the course of his employment, or for death resulting from personal injury so sustained, it shall not be a defense: (a) That the employee was negligent; (b) That the injury was caused by the negligence of a fellow employee; (c) That the employee has assumed the risk of the injury."

The respondent's brief proceeds to state its contention as follows:

"This is the section of the act which defines those industrial accidents which the legislature had under consideration and against which it sought to protect the employee. Hence, to entitle the workman to compensation, the following elements must appear (1) that the workman suffered an injury; (2) that he suffered an injury by 'accident'; (3) that the injury and the accident arose 'out of' the employment, and (4) that the injury and the accident arose in the course of the employment.

"By this language the legislature intended not simply that the 'injury,' but that both the 'injury' and the 'accident' must arise out of and in the course of the employment. In the great majority of cases it would be impossible to separate the injury and the accident, so that one might arise out of the employment while the other would not. In the case before us, while we may admit for the sake of argument that the particular injury—the broken collar bone and ribs—were caused by the fall; that the fall arose out of and in the course of the employment because the petitioner at that moment happened to be sitting on the seat of his cab,—it by no means follows that the 'accident' arose 'out of' the employment. This, we believe, is where the authorities which will no doubt appear on the petitioner's brief, have gone astray. That the 'accident' occurred 'in the course of' the employment is admitted." . . . "The respondent takes the position (1) that there is no evidence to support the finding of the presiding justice that either [425] the injury or the accident arose out of and in the course of the employment, and (2) that such finding was against the law since the legislature never intended that act to apply to accidents caused solely by a workman's previously diseased condition."

The only respect in which this decree is challenged by the appellant is as to the finding of fact that the petitioner "received a personal injury by accident arising out of . . . said employment;" and the appellant contends that the accident was solely due to the previously diseased condition of the petitioner and not at all to the employment.

It must be obvious that the petitioner, as the driver of a hack, seated at a height of four or five feet from the ground upon a moving vehicle is exposed to some risk of accident which would not be incident to an occupation carried on by a person seated upon the ground or upon a stationary platform. And this would be more so in case of an employee subject to attacks of vertigo or dizziness, or of temporary unconsciousness. Now although there is some evidence that the petitioner admitted that he had an attack of dizziness or unconsciousness just before he fell, and that caused him to fall, it is to be noted that there is no evidence that he had ever before had such an attack when he was driving; his only previous disability, so far as the evidence shows, had been a slight temporary disability due to displacement of his truss, when at work harnessing his horses, and which required him to lie down for a few minutes to readjust his truss; and he was also unable on account of his rupture to lift trunks on or off his hack. There is no evidence that he had at any time before the accident had any disability with regard to driving his horses when he was seated upon the carriage. But there is direct and positive evidence from a witness who saw him fall, who said, "I thought . . . that the horses ran against the curbstone and he fell off headfirst;" that "the horses was coming down the side of the sidewalk, not running, but not coming easy, on a kind of a gallop, and the first thing I see he was [426] pitched out headfirst on the side, that way," (illustrating); that "he was pitched up on the side, half on the sidewalk and half on the hill." This evidence shows that the petitioner's fall was more than the mere inert fall or collapse of an unconscious man (see Lewis v. Globe Indemnity Co. Mass. Workmen's Comp. Cas. 1912-1913, p. 48; Sanderson v. Same, Ib. p. 224, 229); that it was a positive throwing or pitching of the driver from his seat by the movement of the hack turning or lurching into the gutter, toward or against the curbstone and might have happened to a driver in full possession of his senses; and although the justice of the Superior Court in his rescript does not allude to this evidence, it is to be presumed that, when he came to enter his final decree and decreed that petitioner "received a personal injury by accident arising out of" . . . "said employment," he made his finding upon all the evidence before him. We think that the evidence above quoted therefore was such as to warrant the finding of fact which is here challenged, and that under the decision in Jillson v. Ross, 38 R. I. 145, 94 Atl. 717 (July 2, 1915), we should not be justified in setting aside the decree upon this ground,—since the act provides that findings of fact, in the absence of fraud, shall be conclusive.

The evidence does not show, as claimed by the appellant, that the petitioner's fall was "caused solely by the workman's previously diseased condition," nor does the justice of the Superior Court so decide; the justice says in his decree "the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering," etc. But the decree also finds that the accident was one "arising out of . . . said employment;" there is at least as much evidence that the fall was due to an unexpected and accidental lurch of the hack into the gutter and towards or against the curbstone, as that it was due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by disease. It seems to this court that the decision and the decree appealed from embody a conclusive finding of fact that dizziness or unconsciousness was not the [427] sole cause of the fall and that there was evidence from which the justice could find as he did that the accident arose out of the employment.

Several cases have been cited on behalf of the petitioner where it appeared that the claimant had, prior to the accident, been suffering from disease and where it appeared that the diseased condition predisposed the claimant to the accident which occurred, and where it has nevertheless been held that the claimant was entitled to recover. In a very well considered case in the English Court of Appeal, decided in 1905, under the English Workmen's Compensation Act, Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. D. 225, 2 Ann. Cas. 732, it appears that a workman employed in unloading coal from a ship, who was required in the course of his duty to stand by the open hatchway through which the coal was being brought up from the hold, was seized with an epileptic fit while at work, and fell into the hold and was seriously injured; it was held that regard must be had to the proximate cause of the accident resulting in the injury, which was to be found in the necessary proximity of the workman to the hatchway; that the accident therefore arose "out of" as well as "in the course of" his employment, and that he was entitled to compensation under the act. It appeared that the employee was subject to epileptic fits; that it was his duty to stand on a wooden stage close to the edge of the hatchway; the stage being so constructed as to enable him to look down into the hold, and while standing on the stage he had to regulate the descent of the bucket into, and its ascent out of, the hold by means of a long pole, and also to give the necessary signals to the man who was working the crane; while thus engaged he was seized with an epileptic fit and fell through the hatchway into the hold and sustained very serious injuries. He had had an epileptic fit on three previous occasions. The county court judge held that the accident was due to the fit and did not arise out of the employment within the meaning of the act, and refused to award compensation. The applicant appealed. In the [428] Court of Appeal it was contended, as here, that "as the original cause of the applicant's fall was the fit with which he was seized, the cause was one which the man himself carried about with him, and that the damage which he sustained did not arise out of and in the course of his employment, but arose out of the idiopathic condition of the workman at the time." The court fully discusses and disposes of his contention upon principle and authority and determines that the thing which happened was an "accident" within the meaning of the act. The court, after discussing the rules and principles laid down in accident insurance cases, speaking through Collins, M. R., says, p. 229:

"But those authorities are in my judgment directly in point. A man is picked up at the bottom of the hold of a ship suffering from injuries: what is the cause of his condition? The proximate cause obviously is that he has fallen from a height. But it is suggested that if the occurrence is analyzed, it will be seen that the accident was caused by the idiopathic disease from which the man was suffering, and that therefore the accident did not arise out of his employment. At that point the authorities come in, to the effect that, although the cause of the fall was a fit, the cause of the injuries was the fall itself, and they are direct authorities that the injury in the present case was caused by an accident.

"Then did the accident arise out of the man's employment? When we get rid of the confusion caused by the fact that the fall was originally caused by the fit and the confusion involved in not dissociating the injury, and its actual physical cause from the more remote cause, that is to say, from the fit, the difficulty arising from the words 'out of the employment' is removed. How does it come about in the present case that the accident arose out of the employment? Because by the conditions of his employment the workman was bound to stand on the edge of what I may style a precipice, and if in that position he was seized with a fit he would almost necessarily fall over. If that is so, [429] the accident was caused by his necessary proximity to the precipice, for the fall was brought about by the necessity for his standing in that position. Upon the authorities I think the case is clear: an accident does not cease to be such because its remote cause was the idiopathic condition of the injured man; we must dissociate that idiopathic condition from the other facts and remember that he was obliged to run the risk by the very nature of his employment, and that the dangerous fall was brought about by the conditions of that employment. I think, therefore, that the present case comes within the purview of the Workmen's Compensation Act, and that there is nothing in either the decision or the dicta of the learned Lords in Fenton v. Thorley [1903] App. Cas. 443 (1) which in any way qualifies the view that I have endeavored to express. The appeal must be allowed.

"Mathew, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The case affords an illustration of the rule that one should look to the immediate, and not to the remote, cause. In this case the immediate cause of the injury was the fall: I see no reason why we should hold that there was not an accident within the meaning of this statute. The true mode of dealing with the case is shown by a reference to the insurance cases that were cited during the argument. In Fenton v. Thorley (2) Lord Macnaghten said: 'One other remark I should like to make. It does seem to me extraordinary that anybody should suppose that when the advantage of insurance against accident at their employers' expense was being conferred on workmen, Parliament could have intended to exclude from the benefit of the act some injuries ordinarily described as "accidents" which beyond all others merit favourable consideration in the interest of workmen and employers alike.' If we apply that view to the particular case, and treat the claim as an action brought upon a policy of insurance against accidents arising out of the employment of the assured, there can be no question that such a policy would cover the case. In my opinion we ought not to go back along the train of circumstances and trace [430] the accident to some remote source when it is plain that the man was in fact injured by falling from the place where he was standing, and where it was his duty to stand, in discharge of his duty to his employer.

"Cozens-Hardy, L. J. I agree, and have little to add. It seems plain to me on the authorities that what happened here was an 'accident.' It is also plain, and indeed is not contested, that the accident happened in the course of the employment; the only difficulty is whether it arose 'out of' the employment; on the whole I am of opinion that it did. If I could adopt the view that has been pressed upon us, that the employer is not liable for the remote consequences of a disability which the workman brings with him to his work, I should come to a different conclusion; but I think the truer view is that a man always brings some disability with him; it may be a disability arising from age; it may be of some other nature. A workman who is put in a dangerous position in order to do his work is more liable to an accident by reason of the disability which he brings with him than he would otherwise be. Again, an old man is inherently more likely to meet with an accident than a young one, but an employer could not excuse himself on the ground of the man's age. The same consideration applies to a tendency to illness or to a fit; and if a man with such a tendency is told to go to work in a dangerous position and there meets with an accident, the accident none the less arises out of his employment because its remote cause is to be found in his own physical condition.

"Appeal allowed."

The case of Wicks v. Dowell, supra, was followed in the case of Driscoll v. Cushman's Express Co. Mass. W. C. C. (July 1, 1912-June 30, 1913, pp. 125, 130), where the driver of an express wagon, employed by the defendant, while driving his wagon, suffered a fainting fit, or an "epileptiform attack," falling from his wagon and fracturing his skull, dying from the effect of the fracture. It was held by the [431] Industrial Accident Board, in review, and in confirmation of the decision of the Committee of Arbitration, that the employee was exposed to a substantial and increased risk owing to his occupation, that the injury arose out of and in the course of his employment, and that the dependent mother was entitled to compensation.

Wicks v. Dowell, supra, was cited by the court with apparent approval in Fennah v. Midland, etc. Ry. 45 Ir. L. T. (Eng.) 192, 4 B. W. C. C. 440, 442, a case decided in the Court of Appeal, Ireland, 1911; and has been frequently cited in argument both in the English Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords. No case has been cited to us in which that case has been criticised, modified, doubted or overruled.

A number of cases have been cited to us involving the same general principle that where the previous diseased condition or temporary illness of the employee is a contributing or antecedent cause of the accident, nevertheless the employee may recover. See Steamship Swansea Vale v. Rice, 4 B. W. C. C. 298, a case of temporary illness, contributing to the accident of falling overboard from a vessel. Fennah v. Midland, etc. Ry. 4 B. W. C. C. 440, where an engine driver, at work on his engine while stopped at a station, tightening up a nut, fell to the permanent way and died from the effects of the fall; and where it appeared that he had previously had fainting fits, it was held that recovery could be had; that it was an accident arising out of his employment; Ismay v. Williamson, 1 B. W. C. C. 232 (House of Lords), where the accident was a heat-stroke from a furnace which happened to a hand employed in the engine-room, and who was shown to have been in poor physical condition, not fit to stand the heat; Clover v. Hughes, 3 B. W. C. C. 275 (House of Lords), a case of death of a workman who had a very serious aneurism of the aorta, which ruptured while he was engaged in his ordinary occupation; disease of long standing; M'Innes v. Dunsmuir, 1 B. W. C. C. 226 (Court of Session, Scotland), where a workman having hardening of the [432] arteries, by over exertion brought on cerebral hemorrhage, which was more likely to occur in his case on account of the hardening of the arteries; Maskery v. Lancashire Shipping Co. (1914) Stone's W. C. & Ins. Cas. 290 (Court of Appeal, England), case of death from heat-stroke suffered by a laborer in the engine room of a steamer in the Red Sea, deceased being physically unfit for the work which involved exposure to extreme heat; citing Ismay v. Williamson, supra. See also Morgan v. Zenaida, 2 B. W. C. C. 19, and Aiken v. Finlayson (1914) Stone's W. C. & Ins. Cas. 398.

We are of the opinion that the decree appealed from in this case is fully supported by the evidence; and under the principles of law so clearly set forth in the above cited cases, with which we find no reason to dissent, we find that what happened to the petitioner was an "accident" under the terms of the act, and that the accident "arose out of . . . the employment."

The appellant cites a few cases which do not seem to this court to have any weight in this connection, since the court in each case found that injury or death of the employee did not "arise out of the employment," but arose from natural causes to which anyone not so employed would have been equally subject,—Sheldon v. Needham (1914) Stone's W. C. & Ins. Cas. 274; Rodger v. Paisley School Board (1912) Gordon's W. C. Cas. 157; Robson v. Blakey (1912) Gordon's W. C. Cas. 86; Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union [1912] Gordon's W. C. Cas. (Eng.) 222; Thackway v. Connelly, 3 B. W. C. C. 37, and Nash v. "Rangatira" (1914) Stone's W. C. & Ins. Cas. 490; in the latter case the accident and death were found to have arisen out of intoxication and not out of the employment. We have carefully examined all of these latter cases and find nothing therein to disturb our conclusions.

Our decision is that the decree appealed from be affirmed; that the appeal be dismissed and the cause remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

[433] VINCENT, J. (dissenting).—I am unable to agree with the majority of the court in affirming the decree of the Superior Court and dismissing the respondent's appeal.

The petitioner, at the time of the accident, was in the employ of the respondent company as driver of a vehicle commonly known as a hack or hackney carriage, such employment requiring him to occupy the elevated seat common thereto. On the day of the accident, while the petitioner was driving along one of the public streets, he became wholly or partially unconscious, or was seized with dizziness or vertigo, whereupon he fell from his seat to the ground, sustaining some injuries.

It is not disputed that the petitioner had, for a considerable period prior to the time of his accident, been in a condition of health which might at any moment cause him to become unconscious or dizzy to an extent which would deprive him, temporarily at least, of physical control.

The majority opinion proceeds upon the theory that there was some testimony produced in the court below, showing that the fall of the petitioner, from his seat on the hack, was occasioned by a sudden contact of the wheel with the curbstone. The testimony referred to is that of Mrs. McKenna, who at the time of the accident, was sitting at her window and viewed the scene across two streets. On examining her testimony, bearing in mind that the burden of proof is upon the petitioner to show that the accident arose out of the employment, I find that it amounts to nothing. She says in her direct examination: "I thought he stumbled against the curbstone; that the horses ran against the curbstone and he fell off head first." This in itself is not testimony tending to prove that the wheel of the hack came in contact with the curbstone. It is simply the way in which the witness, viewing the situation from a distance, imagined that the fall must have been occasioned. Later, in cross-examination any doubt about her testimony is disposed of when she says, in answer to the question, "You didn't see anything happen to the hack or to the horses or anything [434] except Mr. Carroll pitch off from the hack, did you?" "That is all, that is all I noticed then." This testimony not only fails to sustain the burden of proof before mentioned, but it is not testimony from which it can be reasonably assumed or inferred that the wheel of the hack came in contact with the curbstone at all. Mrs. McKenna did not see the wheel strike the curbstone and does not claim to have seen anything of the kind. The petitioner does not claim that his wheel struck the curbstone or went into the gutter, in fact, he says he does not remember any jumping of the horses or hitting any stone or ditch. Upon this state of the testimony how can it be assumed that the proximate cause of the accident was the contact of the wheel with the curbing of the street? It is also evident that the Superior Court did not consider this evidence sufficient when it said: "That the cause of such injury was falling from the driver's seat of the hack which the petitioner was driving in the regular course of his employment, the fall probably being due to dizziness or unconsciousness induced by a disease from which he was suffering."

Further than this the petitioner told Mr. Stockard, in speaking of the accident, that he felt a dizzy spell coming on. That he made such a statement to Mr. Stockard the petitioner nowhere denies, but in his direct testimony he says that he lost consciousness when he fell.

There is some testimony on the part of the petitioner that in his descent from the hack he came in contact with some portion of the outfit, presumably the whiffletree or crossbar, from which it might be argued that his realization of such an occurrence tended to show that he was not wholly unconscious at the time of the accident. It is not, however, important to ascertain the exact degree of mental power or physical control which the petitioner possessed at the time of and immediately preceding his fall. Whether he was partially or wholly unconscious or simply dizzy, without being unconscious at all, is not important in this consideration. It cannot be seriously or reasonably claimed that his [435] fall was occasioned otherwise than by a sudden seizure of some kind induced by his physical condition. The court below, in its findings of fact, reached that conclusion. Furthermore, it is not claimed that the physical condition of the petitioner was brought about or affected by his employment or that his employment in any way operated, in connection with his diseased condition, to bring about or produce the particular attack which caused this fall.

The statute regulating the compensation of workmen provides that such compensation is only payable in cases where the injuries sustained arise out of and in the course of the employment and it is generally conceded by the authorities that the burden is upon the petitioner to show that his injuries arose both out of and in the course of his employment. There is no question in the present case but what the accident occurred in the course of the employment, but did it arise out of the employment? It is quite clear to my mind that it did not.

It seems to me to be desirable, not to say necessary, to determine first, what is the proximate cause of the accident, and second, whether or not there is any relation between such proximate cause and the employment in which the petitioner was engaged.

In the old case of Scott v. Shepherd, decided in 1770, and reported in 2 W. Bl. (Eng.) 892, which is more popularly known as the "Squib" case, it was held that trespass and assault will lie for originally throwing a lighted squib which after having been thrown about in self-defense by other persons at last put out the plaintiff's eye. The question there was whether the action could be maintained against the person who first threw the squib and it was held that such action could be maintained. In a recent law publication called the "Docket," under date of December, 1915, I find the following comment upon the Squib Case: "Many, many cases have been bottomed on the Squib Case, that unhappy accident seeming to have an illustrative value beyond any other instance of causal connection ever brought [436] to the attention of court or counsel. The most recent, of note, is Salmi v. Columbia, etc. River R. Co. 75 Ore. 200, 146 Pac. 819, L.R.A.1915D 834, and comes from Oregon, where the complainant, a woman, lived near a railroad right of way on which the railroad company exploded a 'large and unsafe blast,' so greatly frightening complainant that she swooned, and swooning, fell, and falling, injured herself, sustaining a rupture. In refuting the contention that she could not recover for injuries from fright alone, Burnett, J., in an able opinion, after referring to the analogy to the noted Squib Case, says: 'Likewise in this instance the explosion of the blast naturally produced the mental state of fright, the fright the faint, the faint the fall, the fall the fracture of the abdominal wall, upon which the plaintiff rests her cause of action.'"

The law as laid down in the Squib Case has continued to be the law in England and this country down to the present time and it determines that a defendant who exerted the original force is responsible for the injury, such force having been transmitted to the plaintiff through a series of acts which were the direct consequence of the original act. In other words, the original act was the proximate cause of the injury to the plaintiff.

In a case of this character the proximate cause is always that cause, which, acting through a natural sequence of events causes the injury. The cases furnish a multitude of definitions of proximate cause which, while they are couched in different language, are substantially the same in substance as, for example, "The proximate cause is the dominant cause, not the one which is incidental to that cause, its mere instrument, though the latter may be nearest in place and time to the loss;" again, "The proximate cause is the dominant controlling one and not those which are mere incidents;" and further, "The proximate cause of an accident is a cause without which the accident would not have occurred." See 5 Words & Phrases, 5762 and cases cited.

[437] Applying this principle to the case in hand the conclusion is inevitable that the unconsciousness or dizziness of the petitioner was the proximate cause of his accident. It was the one thing without which the accident would not have happened; it was the dominant cause and the subsequent fall and contact with the ground were simply incidents or events which naturally and necessarily followed. This being so it cannot be reasonably argued, under the evidence in this case, that as between the employment and the cause of the accident there was any relation whatsoever and therefore it cannot be said that the injuries of the petitioner arose out of his employment.

The majority opinion in support of its conclusions cites ten cases. Two of the cases cited cannot be distinguished from the case before us, namely, Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225, and Driscoll v. Cushman, Mass. W. C. C. June 30, 1913, pp. 125, 130. The remaining eight cases cited are easily and readily distinguishable.

The case of Fennah v. Midland, etc. Ry. 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 440, was that of an engine driver who was tightening up a nut upon his engine while his train was at the station. He was later found lying between the engine and platform and died in a few minutes. There was evidence showing that on three previous occasions when the train was at a station the deceased had fainted, but a few days prior to the time of his decease he was examined by a physician of the company and found physically fit. This case is materially different from the case at bar, there being no testimony whatever that he suffered a fainting fit at the time of his death or that the proximate cause of the accident was anything else than the fall.

The case of Ismay v. Williamson, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 232, was a case in which a seaman employed as a trimmer on board ship whilst engaged in drawing ashes from the bottom of the ship's furnace had a heat stroke from which he died. In M'Innes v. Dunsmuir, 1 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 226, a workman, in the course of his ordinary and usual employment, overexerted [438] himself and brought on an attack of cerebral hemorrhage. In Clover v. Hughes, 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 275, a workman suffering from aneurysm of the aorta was doing his work in the ordinary way by tightening a nut with a spanner. This ordinary strain caused a rupture of the aneurysm, resulting in death. In Maskery v. Lancashire Shipping Co. [1914] Stone's W. C. & Ina. Cas. (Eng.) 290, an engineer while working in the engine room of a steamer in the Red Sea sustained a heat stroke from the effects of which he died. In Aitken v. Finlayson [1914] Stone's W. C. & Ina. Cas. (Eng.) 398, a workman running to the scene of an accident and thence to telephone for a doctor by his exertion brought on a fit of apoplexy.

It will readily be observed that in each of the last six cases the death or injury was brought about by influences directly proceeding from the employment as, for instance, where a man suffered a stroke from the heat of a furnace about which and in connection with which he was employed. All these last mentioned cases are decidedly different from the case at bar where there is no proof whatsoever that the impaired physical condition of the petitioner was due to or was even aroused by his employment.

In the case of Steamship Swansea Vale v. Rice, 4 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 298, the chief officer of a steam vessel fell overboard during his duty on deck. Some two or three hours prior to the accident he had gone below, complaining of headache and giddiness, had taken a dose of castor oil and returned to his duty on deck. There was, however, no testimony nor any other circumstances from which it might be inferred that the officer was suffering from giddiness at the time of the accident and that case is therefore materially unlike the one which I am considering here.

The case of Driscoll v. Cushman & Co. Mass. W. C. C. June 30, 1913, pp. 125, 130, which follows to some extent the case of Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225, also differs from it in some respects. The board of arbitration there held that the employed was exposed to a substantially increased risk [439] owing to the position in which he had to work, meaning that as a driver of an express wagon he occupied a more elevated position than he would have occupied in some other employment.

It is evident that the more elevated the position of the workman the more likely he is to be injured in case he falls, but that does not affect the principle. The same principle should govern whether the person suffering the accident stands in one place or another so far as the determination of the proximate cause of the accident is concerned. The degree to which he may be injured in one place, as compared with the possible extent of his injuries in another, does not in any way assist in the determination as to what was the proximate cause of the accident or whether the accident arose out of the employment. All that arises out of the employment is that the consequences of the fall are more serious, but the fall itself does not arise out of it. It is wrong to disassociate the petitioner's dizziness or unconsciousness and say that though the one was not an accident the other was.

This leads to the discussion of the case of Wicks v. Dowell [1905] 2 K. B. (Eng.) 225, which as before stated cannot be distinguished from the case at bar. In that case a workman, employed in unloading coal from a ship, was standing in the course of his duty by an open hatchway through which the coal was being drawn up from the hold. He was seized with an epileptic fit and fell into the hold and was seriously injured. The court held that the proximate cause of the accident was to be found in the close proximity of the workman to the hatchway and that the accident therefore arose out of his employment. As we have seen from the authorities cited, the proximate cause is that cause without which the accident would not have happened. The proximate cause is that cause which through a natural sequence of events results in the injury. There was no claim in that case that the epileptic attack was brought about or induced by the employment. But it was nevertheless the proximate cause of the accident, because without it the accident would not [440] have happened. It was the one thing operating through a natural sequence of events that led to the injury. Between such proximate cause and the employment there was absolutely no relation whatsoever and it seems to me that to follow that case is to adopt and perpetuate a patent absurdity.

The case of Wicks v. Dowell, supra, decided in 1905, has not always been followed by later decisions of the English courts. Thus in the case of Butler v. Burton-on-Trent Union, 5 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 355 and 1912, Gordon's W. C. Cas. 222, decided by the Court of Appeals in 1912, it appeared a workhouse master, while on duty in the evening, was sitting smoking at the top of a flight of steps. He was suffering from tuberculosis and while seized by a fit of coughing became dizzy and fell down the steps from which fall he sustained injuries. The court said: "It has been decided that an accident 'arising out of' means some risk reasonably incidental to the employment; that the man is more exposed to the particular risk than other persons in the community. . . . There is nothing peculiar in the employment which renders the risk greater than that to which ordinary persons are exposed. . . ."

"The place was not a dangerous place; the man was neither more nor less liable to fall because he was a workhouse master. These considerations are sufficient. The accident did not arise out of the employment in the sense that it was due to the nature of the employment or to anything to which the employment required him to expose himself.

"The provision that the accident must be an accident arising out of the employment has the meaning that the accident must arise out of some risk reasonably incidental to the employment, in the sense that the man who meets with the accident must have been exposed in the course of his employment to some risk additional to those of other members of the public. Counsel for the respondent admitted that the accident in this case might just as well have happened when the deceased was sitting in his office at his desk; and [441] applying the test I have stated it is clear that the accident in no sense arose out of the employment. There was nothing peculiar to his employment which rendered the risk of this accident happening greater than it would have been otherwise. It is not as if he was engaged in any task which was likely to render his coughing more dangerous or more frequent. In these circumstances I think the accident was brought on by the tubercular module which caused the fit of coughing. The coughing in its turn produced giddiness, and owing to the giddiness the man fell. I think we should be extending the principles of the act beyond reason, principle, or authority if we were to hold here that the accident arose out of the employment."

While the workhouse master was not compelled to sit at the head of the stairs, still he was acting in the course of his employment, and his presence at that particular place was as much in the performance of his duty as would have been the case had he been in another part of the building.

It is impossible to reconcile these two cases or to arrive at any other conclusion than that the court in the latter case has absolutely rejected the view taken in Wicks v. Dowell & Co.

The case of Nash v. Rangatira, Stone's W. C. & Ins. Cas. (Eng.) 490; [1914] 3 K. B. 978 was, as the reference indicates, decided in 1914 and was an appeal from an award under the Workmen's Compensation Act made in favor of the dependents of one Nash. Nash was employed as a seaman on the steamship "Rangatira" which at the time of the accident was moored to a pier. Late one night, Nash, who had been ashore, returned to the ship apparently intoxicated. He walked on to the gangplank for the purpose of boarding the ship, lost his balance, fell off, and was killed. The trial judge found that the primary cause of the accident was the man's intoxicated condition, but that the accident would not have happened had he not been at the time mounting the gangplank, an incident in the performance of his duty in returning to the ship. Hence, he was under a special risk [442] and compensation was awarded. This case was decided on the question as to whether the accident arose out of the employment and the court said: "In one sense, whenever there is an accident to a drunken man whilst he is in the ambit of his employment it may be said that the accident arose out of the employment because, but for his being in the place where the accident occurred, the man's drunken condition would have been immaterial. Take, for instance, the case where a man's work causes him to be with machinery or in any other dangerous place; it may be said that his employment took him there, and that if he had been at home drunk he would have been able to lie on the floor till he was sober. In this way it may be said that there was an added risk; but in my opinion the accident does not arise out of the employment in such circumstances. It is not sufficient that a drunken man should meet with an accident in the ambit of his employment. In the present case the accident did not arise out of the deceased man's employment."

If it is sought to distinguish the above case from the one before us on the ground that a man intoxicated is in no condition to perform the duties for which he was employed, and hence technically he is doing nothing in the performance of his employment, it may be said that the same is true of an individual who becomes unconscious through disease. So far as the employment is concerned, drunkenness and Bright's disease, as causes of a fall, are on the same footing. The sailor was required to mount the gangplank to return to the boat and thus was in the performance of his duty. His fall, however, was caused by the drunkenness which had no relation to his employment. This case, as well as the foregoing case of Butler v. Burton, not only fails to follow the case of Wicks v. Dowell, but is distinctly at variance with the principle and theory upon which the latter is based.

In the case of Robson v. Blakey, 1912, Gordon's W. C. Cas. 86, a plumber engaged in laying pipes in a trench on a hot day was seized with heat apoplexy. He was required [443] to bend over his work and consequently got his back heated. The Sheriff Substitute found an accident arising out of the employment and awarded compensation. This, however, was reversed on appeal and it was finally held that the accident did not arise out of the employment. The Lord President stated in the course of his opinion, "I admit that upon the decided cases there has been a fairly formidable argument presented in favor of saying that this is an accident arising out of the employment." Certainly in that case the position of the petitioner was much stronger than in the case of Wicks v. Dowell, and much stronger than that of the petitioner in the case at bar. The petitioner in Robson v. Blakey, by the nature of his employment, being obliged to work in a trench perhaps somewhat shielded from the normal circulation of the air and in a stooping position, exposing his back to the direct rays of the sun, might argue with far more force than the petitioner here that his difficulty arose out of his employment.

For these reasons and upon the authorities cited and discussed, I am unable to concur in the conclusion of the majority opinion which seems to me to ignore the long and well established rule for determining the proximate cause of an accident and to hold that a petitioner is entitled to compensation where as between the proximate cause and the employment there is no relation.

NOTE.

It is held in the reported case that personal injuries sustained from a fall are accidental within the meaning of a workmen's compensation act though the fall is due to dizziness caused by a pre-existing disease. The cases passing on the question whether disease, either pre-existing or superinduced, is an accident are reviewed in the note to Vennen v. New Dells Lumber Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 293.

STERTZ ET AL.

v.

INDUSTRIAL INSURANCE COMMISSION.

Washington Supreme Court—June 20, 1916.

91 Wash. 588; 158 Pac. 256.

Workmen's Compensation Acts — Effect — Dispensing with Judicial Controversy.

The workmen's compensation act (Laws 1911, c. 74), by omitting the words "accident" and "arising out of and in the course of employment," and substituting therefor "fortuitous event" and "injured in extra-hazardous work," departs from prevailing systems and awards compensation without judicial controversies.

Injury in Course of Employment — Absence from Plant.

Section 5 of said act providing compensation for each workman injured whether on the premises or at the plant or, he being in the course of his employment, away from the plant, the words "in the course of employment" qualify only when away from the plant.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 4; Ann. Cas. 1914B 498; Ann. Cas. 1916B 1293.]

What Constitutes Injury.

Section 3 providing that "injury refers only to injury resulting from fortuitous event as distinguished from contraction of disease," all injuries are intended to be compensated for unless willfully incurred, since only disease is excluded.

[See note at end of this case.]

Nature of Act — Commission Substituted for Employer.

Laws 1911, c. 74, is neither an employer's liability nor a workmen's compensation act, but an industrial insurance law, withdrawing from private controversy all phases of injury to workmen; and compensation flows from the commission, which must be sued rather than the employer, if it rejects a claim.

Injury by Act of Third Person.

Said law provides compensation to workmen injured on the premises by intervention of third persons, since it covers every fortuitous event regardless of fault.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915D 156.]

Validity of Act.

Said law does not violate the due process of law clause of the constitution by compelling compensation of workmen for injuries due to acts of third persons, against whose acts the employer should have every inducement to guard.

[See Ann. Cas. 1912B 174; Ann. Cas. 1915A 247; Ann. Cas. 1916B 1286.]

Same.

It would not be a violation of the due process of law clause of the constitution to make the master the insurer of the workman while on the premises.

Injury by Third Person.

Under said law, if the workman is injured on the premises from the act of a third person he has the absolute right of compensation from the fund provided; but, if so injured off the premises, he must elect whether to sue the third person or claim from the fund.

[See Ann. Cas. 1915D 156.]

Injury Not Arising Out of Employment.

The law does not, by providing compensation only for workmen injured in hazardous or extrahazardous employments, imply that compensation shall be made only for injuries arising out of the work.

[See Ann. Cas. 1913C 4; Ann. Cas. 1914B 498; Ann. Cas. 1916B 1293.]

Same.

Although it employs the word "accident" in administrative portions of the act, it does not thereby limit the words "fortuitous event" used in the clause granting compensation, since general intent will not control positive definitions.

Same.

Although the employer is required to report whether injury arose out of and in the course of employment of the injured person, that does not restrict compensation to injuries so arising.

Construction of Act — Depriving Court of Jurisdiction.

The legislature, in adopting Laws 1911, c. 74, as to workmen's compensation, having said positively that jurisdiction of courts in controversies over injuries to employees is ended, the courts must liberally construe such provision as well as other portions of the law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Thurston county: MITCHELL, Judge.

Claim for compensation under workmen's compensation act. Louise F. Stertz et al., plaintiffs, and Industrial Insurance Commission, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

T. P. Fisk for appellants.

The Attorney General, John M. Wilson and Chas. E. Arney, Jr., for respondent.

[589] BAUSMAN, J.—This is a proceeding by the widow and minor children of Stertz, foreman of a logging camp, to recover through the industrial insurance commission statutory compensation for death.

This foreman had suspended for misconduct a workman named Steel but had reinstated him. Steel, discharged a few days later by the president, waylaid the logging train and, wounding one, killed others of the workmen including Stertz, who was in charge of the train as foreman. Only those were assailed with whom Steel while a workman had [590] had quarrels concerning his tasks. The present claimants are not shown to have collected or sought damages from Steel, but their claims were rejected both by the commission and the superior court. The sole argument now made to sustain their rulings is that the statute contemplates only "accident" as that term is popularly understood and also as "arising out of" the employment. These words nowhere occur in any of the definitions or granting clauses of our statute. Far stronger terms occur.

We are now brought to a point where we must explore this noble legislation to obtain a general, decisive view.

Our legislators, with three systems to imitate, chose the most sweeping. There was that of England, which least interferes with employers, a liability act removing defenses but prescribing no way in which the employer must provide for the claim. There was that of Denmark and Sweden in which the state issues policies to the employed at the master's expense. Finally there was that of Germany which ours most nearly resembles and which provides both the remedies and the fund by compulsory insurance with contribution of employers collectively. Even the German scheme was somewhat exceeded, for the private parties under our law have no participation in the management, nor, during a first period of three months, does our workman contribute something toward the loss, as he did under the German.

Our act came of a great compromise between employers and employed. Both had suffered under the old system, the employers by heavy judgments of which half was opposing lawyers' booty, the workmen through the old defenses or exhaustion in wasteful litigation. Both wanted peace. The master in exchange for limited liability was willing to pay on some claims in future where in the past there had been no liability at all. The servant was willing not only to give up trial by jury but to accept far less than he had often won in court, provided he was sure to get the small sum without having to fight for it. All agreed that the blood of the [591] workman was a cost of production, that the industry should bear the charge.

By the working class the new legislation was craved from a horror of lawyers and judicial trials. What they wanted, as this act expressly recites in its first section, was compensation not only safe but sure. To win only after litigation, to collect only after the employment of lawyers, to receive the sum only after months or years of delay, was to the comparatively indigent claimant little better than to get nothing. The workmen wanted a system entirely new. It is but fair to admit that they had become impatient with the courts of law. They knew, and both economists and progressive jurists were pointing out, what is now generally conceded, that two generations ought never to have suffered from the baleful judgments of Abinger and Shaw.

It is for us to say not whether our workmen ought to have a statute which insures them absolutely on the master's premises but whether they do have it. What they gave up for it is great, trial by jury and unlimited damages. The former was an undeniable advantage, the latter had often brought them five-fold what is afforded by this act, which gives not to exceed four thousand dollars for a life and fifteen hundred for the loss of a limb or an eye. What laborers desired was not mere removal of the old defenses. Moreover, the English statute that had removed these had already begotten whole volumes of contests over the new words "accident" and "arising out of employment." Well may ours have used unqualified words to create an undebatable recovery when the injury should occur at the place of work, which even the common law had required the master to maintain in safety.

Those who drafted our law had before them many foreign statutes during the long and careful preparation of this, so we are at once struck by the absence of many familiar terms. In some of those the right of action springs from "accident;" in others from an injury arising "during and in the course [592] of employment." The English statute is "personal injury by accident arising out of and in the course of employment." Simple as these terms appear, they have filled volumes with discussion. Not one of them appears in any of the enabling or granting provisions of our law. Wherever a right is conferred or definition given, ours is unqualified. Indeed, our statute is in these features the least qualified that can be found. The intention to get rid of judicial controversies apparent throughout, we have already recognized:

"Aside from its humane purpose, it was adopted in order that the delay and frequent injustice incident to civil trials might be avoided." Chadwick, J., in State v. Mountain Timber Co. 75 Wash. 581, 583, 135 Pac. 645.

Having seen what was not inserted, let us see what was. Let us examine definitions carefully made. The first section, after stating that industrial relations in all hazardous employments are matter for police regulation, that injuries are frequent and inevitable and that controversies about them are wasteful, declares that:

"All phases of the premises are withdrawn from private controversy, and sure and certain relief for workmen, injured in extra-hazardous work, and their families and dependents is hereby provided regardless of questions of fault and to the exclusion of every other remedy, proceeding or compensation, except as otherwise provided in this act; and to that end all civil actions and civil causes of action for such personal injuries and all jurisdiction of the courts of the state over such causes are hereby abolished, except as in this act provided." Laws 1911, p. 345, § 1; 3 Rem. & Bal. Code, § 6604-1.

The third section, that of definitions, defines workman:

"Workman means every person in this state, who, after September 30, 1911, is engaged in the employment of an employer carrying on or conducting any of the industries scheduled or classified in section 4, whether by way of manual labor or otherwise, and whether upon the premises or at the plant or, he being in the course of his employment, away from the plant of his employer." Id. § 6604-3.

[593] We shall quote later a proviso appended to this definition and relating to injuries from third persons.

Dependent was defined as certain "relatives of a workman whose death results from any injury and who leaves surviving," etc.

The fifth section, the granting clause of compensation, is as follows:

"Each workman who shall be injured whether upon the premises or at the plant, or, he being in the course of his employment, away from the plant of his employer, or his family or dependents in case of death of the workman, shall receive out of the accident fund compensation in accordance with the following schedule, and, except as in this act otherwise provided, such payment shall be in lieu of any and all rights of action whatsoever against any person whomsoever." Id., § 6604-5.

Obviously and clearly the qualifying "in the course of employment" does not apply to "on the premises." Had that been intended, the arrangement was natural and easy. Thus, "When the workman is injured in the course of his employment either upon the premises or away from the plant." Surely we must assume a reason for the other peculiar order. Nor did that order come of chance. It is precisely repeated, we have just seen, in the definition of "workman." Even the punctuation is most carefully repeated there.

Injury too was given a definition: "The words injury or injured, as used in this act, refer only to an injury resulting from some fortuitous event as distinguished from the contraction of disease."

In this last we notice, first, not merely the avoidance of "accident" but of "arising out of the employment," the use of which this definition fairly invited if that were to be meant. Second, exclusion by enumeration. Disease is excluded; everything else is included. Lastly, "fortuitous event," the strongest term that could be used, no popular expression but one used by lawyers for positive strength, a term in truth [594] that is selected when one wishes all of "accident" and more. Black thus defines it:

"There is a difference between a fortuitous event, or inevitable accident, and irresistible force." By the former, commonly called the 'act of God,' is meant any accident produced by physical causes which are irresistible; such as a loss by lightning or storms, by the perils of the seas, by inundations and earthquakes, or by sudden death or illness.

By the latter is meant such an interposition of human agency as is, from its nature and power, absolutely uncontrollable."

Only one other kind of claim is excluded, that based on intentionally or wilfully incurred injuries. These the act itself elsewhere mentions and excludes without other language of consequence here.

We have now the provisions upon which compensation has to be granted or denied. The universally employed terms by which the injury must spring from the business are not there. Very opposite phraseology is used. The supreme court of the United States, in Holden v. Stratton, 198 U. S. 202, 25 S. Ct. 656, 49 U. S. (L. ed.) 1018, had occasion to consider the statute of this state which exempts the proceeds of life insurance policies from creditors. That our statute was using extreme, almost unreasonable, language being pointed out, it was argued to the court that the words must therefore be given more moderate meaning and must be interpreted in the policy of milder statutes of other states, but the supreme court said:

"The wide departure from the legislation of many of the other states, shown by the unrestricted terms of the Washington statute, instead of manifesting the intention of the legislature of that state to narrow the exemption to conform to the statutes of other states, on the contrary conclusively shows the intention of the Washington legislature to adopt a broader and more comprehensive exemption."

To resume, ours is not an employer's liability act. It is not even an ordinary compensation act. It is an industrial insurance statute. Its administrative body is entitled the industrial insurance commission. All the features of an insurance [595] act are present. Not only are all remedies between master and servant abolished, and, in the words of the statute, all phases of them withdrawn from private controversy, but the employee is no longer to look to the master even for the scheduled and mandatory compensation. He must look only to a fund fed by various employers. When the employer, for his part, pays his share into this fund, all obligation on his part to anybody is ended. Let a claim be rejected by the commission, the latter and not the employer is to be sued. Nor is the commission so much as selected by the parties. The state administers the fund. Few foreign countries had yet adopted a scheme so comprehensive. Germany alone furnished a precedent. In subsequent legislation in this country only one or two states have adopted this principle and none have pushed it so far.

To sum up, our act positively ends the "jurisdiction of the courts," on "all phases" of master and servant liability. Now it is undeniable that liability for a stranger's acts on the premises is one of those phases, undeniable that in nearly every such case a question immediately arises whether it is not the master who may have to respond. But, it is said, we cannot hold such liability indisputable under this statute without establishing a construction that would make the master liable for such extreme things as death by lightning. Let us, therefore, review the statute again with both kinds of accident in view.

We have seen that, as the first section put an end to all civil actions appertaining to master and servant liability, so the fifth declared that the compensation "shall be in lieu of any and all rights of action whatsoever "against any person whomsoever."

Next, we have seen in the first section that compensation is to be paid regardless of fault. Thus there was to be compensation for some injuries not actionable before. For instance, let a machine which was excellently made, excellently inspected, and excellently operated cause injury by capricious [596] action contrary to all human experience, in a word let nobody be to blame, a servant under the common law could not recover for the master had not been at fault. Yet that this act means to give compensation in just such a situation can never be questioned. We start accordingly with liabilities before unknown, "a sure and certain relief for workmen regardless of questions of fault."

From the outset the creating of new liabilities was conceded. In the first debate in this court over the act an opening challenge was the new liability without fault taking away the employer's due process of law, and an illustration was given which it was thought would make the law ridiculous. Let the workman while at work be injured by a stranger's throwing something in from the street, there would be a claim for recovery; he would be injured "on the premises;" the injury would be from "fortuitous event." That such a claim would seemingly come under the act was referred to but left undecided by Justice Fullerton in his exhaustive opinion (State v. Clausen, 65 Wash. 156, 117 Pac. 1101, 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 466). He held under indisputable precedents that, notwithstanding the due process guaranty, courts had already sustained statutes imposing degrees of liability regardless of fault, and these decisions sustained ours in most of the new liabilities. As to others, if these were improper, the act by its own terms could stand without them. The apparent scope of the statute he conceded:

"It is claimed that the act allows workmen employed in such industries the benefit of the act when injured outside of the line of their duties or when engaged in the business of the concern in a capacity not affected by the peculiar hazards of the business. We have quoted enough of the statute to show that it is somewhat obscure in these respects, but we are not inclined to think the point fatal to the act, even though we concede counsel's interpretation of it to be the correct one." Id., pp. 196, 197.

[597] It is curious that the very illustration flung at our act to make it ridiculous has not been held ridiculous even under the narrow English statute. In Challis v. London, etc. R. Co. [1905] 2 K. B. (Eag.) 154, it was held that the employer was liable for the death of a locomotive engineer injured by a stone thrown from a bridge above by a mischievous boy.

Nor can we see that under the constitutional objection of due process of law the complaint of the employer is sounder when he pays for injuries caused by the meddling of a stranger on the premises than when he pays for injuries from a perfect machine. The question is one of degree and often of small degree. For, that the master should have every possible inducement to shield his workmen at their tasks from the meddling of third persons is plain, and instances are simple where his failing so to protect them must make him liable at common law. Having pronounced constitutional, then, an act which compels both employers and employed to go into a scheme of insurance, we do not hesitate to say that the difference in new or added liability by the act of a stranger on the premises is not enough to make it unconstitutional. It is but a slight extension of the common law assurance of a safe place to work. Neither would it be a violation of the due process guaranty to make the master an insurer of the workman at the shop. The supreme court of the United States in upholding the Nebraska statute making railways insurers of passengers (Chicago, etc. R. Co. v. Zerneck, 183 U. S. 583, 22 S. Ct. 229, 46 U. S. (L. ed.) 339), said: "Our jurisprudence affords examples of legal liability without fault, and the deprivation of property without fault being attributed to its owner."

Turning back now to the definition of workman, we may read that again with its immediate proviso:

"Workmen means every person in this state, who, after September 30, 1911, is engaged in the employment of an employer carrying on or conducting any of the industries [598] scheduled or classified in section 4, whether by way of manual labor or otherwise, and whether upon the premises or at the plant or, he being in the course of his employment, away from the plant of his employer: Provided, however, That if the injury to a workman occurring away from the plant of his employer is due to the negligence or wrong of another not in the same employ, the injured workman, or if death result from the injury, his widow, children or dependents, as the case may be, shall elect whether to take under this act or seek a remedy against such other, such election to be in advance of any suit under this section; and if he take under this act, the cause of action against such other shall be assigned to the state for the benefit of the accident fund; if the other choice is made, the accident fund shall contribute only the deficiency, if any, between the amount of recovery against such third person actually collected, and the compensation provided or estimated by this act for such case." Id., § 6604-3.

With the whole section before us we perceive that, when a workman is injured off the premises by a stranger, he must elect whom he shall sue, and that no electing is imposed on him when he is injured by a third person upon the premises. Of the latter situation nothing is said. Now from this silence one of four things must be true. Either when thus injured on the premises he has no right whatever to collect from the fund, or he has the right to collect from both the fund and the stranger, or only from one and then with waiver as to the other, or lastly only from one without waiver. The second conclusion is grossly improbable; the third would unfairly make him elect at his peril; the last, plausible, is illogical, for since he has to elect when the third person injures him off the premises, why not when injured upon them too? What possible reason for the right or necessity in one case and not in the other? Nothing answers this satisfactorily except the first conclusion, that when injured upon the premises only one defendant is possible. This conclusion is irresistibly supported, first, by the words, "in lieu of any persons whomsoever," found in the compensation section already [599] quoted; second, by the arrangement of the words "in course of employment," and lastly by the policy of this act which may well be supposed to end debate over involved situations while furnishing to the master the highest inducement to protect his workmen from inquisitive strangers, middlemen, careless co-operating employees, or dangerous persons of any sort.

In fine, this difference between the main clause and the proviso lies in the act's conceding an exclusive claim against the employer for all injuries on the premises by strangers. This last was reasonable. When an injury thus occurs, there must so often be involved the relations of the employer with that stranger or the character of the employment itself as inviting strangers, that we can see a policy of unqualified right against the fund. Suppose a visitor invited to the factory by the employer cause the injury. Is the fund liable? If so, is it liable also when the visitor comes without invitation? Is it liable if the injury occur in a room where the stranger ought not to have come and the workman, knowing he ought not to have come, should have put him out? endless are these distinctions. Is a dray company to answer for an injury to a factory hand caused by one of its teams in a part of the factory where the owner of the factory ought not to have let it come? Is the fund to be used or the dray company? Why is the workman compelled to make the perplexing decision? Why is it not better policy that the master shall keep his premises at all times secure?

That against some third persons the workman has no suit for injuries on the premises this court has already decided. Even without considering the proviso about injuries off the premises (a portion of the statute not pressed upon the attention of the court), we held in Peet v. Mills, 76 Wash. 437, 136 Pac. 685, Ann. Cas. 1915D 154, L.R.A.1916A 358, that the fifth section, stating the compensation to be "in lieu of any and all rights of action whatsoever against any person whomsoever," prevents personal suit against the president [600] of a railway company for injuries in the company's operation, though to him personally the particular neglect was charged. The workman's claim must be against the fund. We made emphatic not only the words just quoted from the act itself, but also that the compensation was to cover as we expressed it ourselves, "every injury sustained by any workman while employed in any such industry, regardless of the cause of the injury or the negligence to which it might be attributed," because the statute said that the abolition of actions theretofore existing was "irrespective of the persons in favor of whom or against whom such right might have existed."

Just before this decision Judge Cushman in the Federal district court for this district had reached the same conclusion from the statute alone. Meese v. Northern Pac. R. Co. 206 Fed. 222. A brewery employee, he held, could not elect to sue a carrier which had injured him at the plant. His judgment was reversed by the circuit court of appeals though our Peet case was then before it. It distinguished that case on the ground that the company's president though personally sued must not be treated as a third person or stranger; but the Supreme Court of the United States has in turn reversed the intermediate court and has construed the Peet case as confirming the conclusion of Judge Cushman. Northern Pac. R. Co. v. Meese, 230 U. S. 614, 36 S. Ct. 223, 60 U. S. (L. ed.) 467. Judge Cushman, it may be added, had commented on the force of the the proviso in the section we have discussed.

In Ross v. Erickson Constr. Co. 80 Wash. 634, 155 Pac. 153, we followed the Peet case, and denied the right to sue an employer's surgeon for malpractice after award accepted from the commission for the loss from the injury. The authorities and the purpose of the law were exhaustively reviewed by Justice Chadwick and the conclusion repeated that suit against third persons for injuries on the premises was abolished. The court laid emphasis on that part of the [601] statute which forever removes "all phases" of the liability during employment.

Authority accordingly is added to both policy and expression. The right of suit against third persons for injuries on the premises is taken away from the workman. To whom then does he look? Since the stranger cannot be made to pay him, the fund must. It would be intolerable to suppose that for this wrong he should have no redress at all.

To pronounce unqualified liability for injuries at the workshop grows easier the more it is considered. Shall we repulse the workman injured, say, in voluntarily fighting flames, or defending his master against assault, or the passengers on a train from a bandit? These are acts not to be discouraged and yet not paid for at common law. The workman who flees at such a time is viewed with contempt. Is he to pay himself for the burns and blows? The English courts, we may observe, have compensated "emergency" acts done in the interest of his employer: Reese v. Thomas [1899] 1 Q. B. (Eng.) 1015, 80 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 578; Harrison v. Whittaker, 16 Times L. Rep. (Eng.) 108; Whelan v. Moore, 43 Ir. L. T. 205; and even his voluntary attempts to save the life of a fellow employee: Matthews v. Bedworth, 1 W. C. C. (Eng.) 124. If our statute aimed to cover them all it is not extraordinary. Even a few unusual causes of injury may well be charged to the fund, some of which will on reflection, it may be added, be found less unfair to the employer than at first consideration. Let us take an example. To say that the master notwithstanding the strength of "fortuitous event" might be liable if the workman was struck by lightning, seems at first preposterous. But let us look at the workman's point of view. The latter argues in effect, that if he had not been at the factory that day he would not have been struck by lightning, that it was the purpose of this act to give the workman every reason for fidelity and courage at the place of work, that part of the basis for the statute was the fact that the workman can seldom carry his own insurance, and that on his sudden death [602] his widow and children are too often a charge upon the community.

The purpose to get rid of contention is the plainer when we consider in how many adjudicated cases under the other statutes the injured man is forced to argue about "arising out of the employment." Notwithstanding that noon recesses at the workshop are generally conceded to be hours of employment in those statutes, we have a workman in one decision injured while going from a higher to a lower floor at noon to receive a free lunch served by the employer. He must go to law about it. Was he or was he not in the course of employment? Again, a workman's claim was contested when during excessively hot weather he went to the roof in working hours for cooler air and fell to the street. So, a boy employed to piece together broken ends of yarn good-naturedly attempted to clean a machine and was injured. Not hired to clean machines, he was held not to have been hurt "in the course of employment." Such are the debates on which claimants really within the purpose of these laws have often had to waste their compensation in other jurisdictions.

Let it be remembered, too that the employer himself is no longer liable, that doctrines which might seem harsh were this an employer's liability act or the common law still prevailing, are now reasonable under assessment upon the industry at large. This insurance scheme is founded on contributions on both sides, the workman contributing his reduced damages, the employer getting that and conceding more liabilities.

The best argument against the construction to which we are tending would be that under it recovery would be possible for some fortuitous events that under no circumstances could spring from a fault of the employer. Yet the further we search the more difficult it is to find any such. Death by lightning, it might be said, would be an instance, death from a wanton pistol shot. As to the latter the English courts [603] have had to arrive at a conclusion. A gamekeeper was shot by a poacher. Even under the rigid English act, "accident arising out of" the employment, it was finally held that this was an accident (though the common understanding of that terms is certainly not death by assault), and that it arose out of the employment. Anderson v. Balfour [1910] 2 Ir. Rep. 497. Now if this be thought a conclusion none too strong, what shall be said about the case of the cashier who, while carrying his master's money, was assaulted and robbed? This was held to be an accident arising out of an employment. Nisbet v. Rayne [1910] 2 K. B. 689. So as to injury from lightning. Some situations during storms are more hazardous than others. Various kinds of machines invite the electrical contact from the skies while others do not. In short, the employment or the orders of the master may have a good deal to do with the injury of the workman in an electrical storm. A case has recently been decided in Minnesota, where a driver struck by lightning was allowed judgment as from an accident: State v. District Ct. 129 Minn. 502, 153 N. W. 119, L.R.A.1916A 344. So in the English case of Andrew v. Failsworth Industrial Soc. [1904] 2 K. B. 32, 90 L. T. N. S. 611, the master was held liable for death by lightning when the workman during the storm was at work on the top of a building.

Now, if there be any occasion in which damages can be had for death from lightning, the policy of our law might be to have no debate about it in any instance, because if the workman must contend when he has not the right to recover, he will have to contend also when he has the right to recover. Let us recur to the child who was injured in oiling machinery when he was hired only to work at strands of yarn. From an economic, sociological standpoint it is waste to throw the child helpless upon society for what may have been a well-intended though mistaken act during employment. If he has to debate in a situation like that, then he [604] may have to debate when he walks from his own machine to lend a hand at a co-worker's machine on the other side of the room.

To seek authority in the decisions of other states is useless, for other statutes have no resemblance to ours. Those decisions are but painful struggles at interpretation of "arising out of," "accident," and "course of employment," which we believe were intentionally left out of our statute. Only one good is found in looking at those cases. They show what evils of litigation are escaped in our enactment. For instance, the Connecticut case of Mann v. Glastonbury Knitting Co. 90 Conn. 116, 96 Atl. 368. A room was heated by a pipe two feet in diameter, which brought in warm air. With the acquiescence of the employer workmen would place coffee bottles at the mouth of this pipe, but when one placing his at another opening was injured by a revolving fan, it was held that the injury did not "arise from the employment," notwithstanding it was conceded that employers were liable for injuries suffered by workmen in doing something "outside of obligatory duty permitted for mutual convenience, such as eating his dinner on the premises." These cases show the refinements to which courts are driven, the contests which workmen have to make at every turn under statutes of a qualified sort, that the new controversies over "arising out of" are but revivals of old contests over contributory negligence and assumed risk, though to get rid of these was the express announcement of the law. In our own court an instance is afforded. A workman injured by hernia resulting from a great strain in lifting at his work got his relief only after this court was reached. Zappala v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 82 Wash. 314, 144 Pac. 54, L.R.A.1916A 295. It is perfectly plain that there was a charge which the industry should bear, but assuming in this act the word "accident" and the phrase "arising out of the employment," contest was at once made possible and contest was [605] prolonged. Another instance of our own is Wendt v. Industrial Ins. Commission, 80 Wash. 111, 141 Pac. 311. A carpenter in a department store turns on an electric switch in a repair shop to start the wheel on which he would grind a tool. The electricity was not in his care or department. He was compelled to obtain the decision of our highest court before he could get his redress.

We decline to read into our act either the narrow word "accident" or the phraseology found in the English and other statutes. We prefer to leave it the force of clear and positive language designed to cure the past mischiefs of endless contention. The reports of other states already abound in contests over the new phraseology. It is for the legislature not for this court to modify, if it appear wise so to do, the plain language of our statute.

We have not overlooked an argument in the word "hazardous" and "extrahazardous." Since, it is said, the act compensates only persons in such employments, it meant to compensate them merely for injuries arising out of the work. This is fallacious. In the first place we cannot sustain that construction against plain terminology. Second, the circumstances show a difference in the intention. The workman was giving up unlimited damages and trial by jury. He could in exchange make for his class what terms he pleased, and the statute made those terms between him and his employer. That non-hazardous employments were not making terms too is of little moment.

"Accident," it is urged, does appear in sundry administrative sections of the act. Now it does not appear in any parts deliberately stating the basis of compensation, and even injury was powerfully defined as fortuitous event. "Accident" was used for brevity as a convenient substitute for "fortuitous event" in the administrative details of the act, and no court must construe a statute by general intent against positive definitions.

[606] In one section the employer, being required to make reports of accidents, is directed to state whether the accident "arose out of or in the course of the injured person's employment." By no language whatever is this section made the basis of compensation or so connected with the compensatory provisions of the law as to give it other than statistical value for information to the department. Moreover, in the preceding clause it is stated that the report must be made whenever any accident or injury whatever occurs. This section, in short, makes no attempt to indicate which shall be paid.

In conclusion, even judicial decisions under the qualified statutes show that we can give full vigor to "injured on the premises" without raising a host of claims untolerated elsewhere. We have seen, in a word, the cases of lightning, of protecting a fellow employee, of the engineer killed by the boy from the bridge, of the assaulted cashier, and the assassinated gamekeeper. But since each new situation has always some difference, it is an infirmity if workmen are compelled always to argue over interpretation. Interpretation by instance is endless. The framers of this law having said positively that they wish the jurisdiction of courts ended on these controversies, it is our duty to give liberality as much to that as to other provisions of the law.

The situation indeed does not greatly differ from that which once obtained in life insurance. The early policies reserved to the company a perpetual question for any misrepresentations made to obtain them, and while this right was rarely exercised, yet it was exercised at times, and the right to exercise it was found so disquieting that the practically unqualified policy has taken the place of the other. To obtain this situation under the compensation act was undoubtedly the purpose of the workmen. It is also to our mind the language of the law.

Under our statute the workman is the soldier of organized industry accepting a kind of pension in exchange for absolute insurance on his master's premises.

[607] The judgment of the lower court is reversed and the cause remanded with instructions to enter a judgment against the commission for the amount of appellant's claim.

NOTE.

What Is "Injury" or "Personal Injury" within Meaning of Workmen's Compensation Act.

Introductory, 362.
Nonoccupational Disease, 362.
Occupational Disease, 366.
Under Connecticut Act, 367.
Under Washington Act, 370.

Introductory.

Some of the workmen's compensation acts give a right to compensation for an "injury" or "personal injury" received in the course of the employment, while others require that the injury shall be "accidental" or "by accident." The present note is designed to review the recent cases defining the term "injury" or "personal injury" as used in statutes of the former class. The earlier cases are collated in the note to Hurle's Case, Ann. Cas. 1915C 919.

The question whether disease is an "accident" under an act of the latter variety is considered in the notes to Brintons v. Turvey, 2 Ann. Cas. 137; Broderick v. London County Council, 15 Ann. Cas. 85; Sullivan v. Modern Brotherhood, Ann. Cas. 1913A 1116; and Venen v. New Dells Lumber Co. reported ante, this volume, at page 293.

The following recent cases while they do not determine any question within the scope of the present note contain some discussion by way of dictum of the meaning of the term "injury" or "personal injury" as used in a workmen's compensation act. Eaves v. Blaencydach Colliery Co. (1910) 2 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 329; Yates v. South Kirkby, etc. Collieries (1910) 3 B. W. C. C. (Eng.) 418; Glasgow Coal Co. v. Welsh [1916] 2 A. C. (Eng.) 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E 161, 85 L. J. P. C. 130, [1916] W. C. & Ins. Rep. 79, 114 L. T. N. S. 809, 60 Sol. J. 336, 32 Times L. Rep. 539, affirming [1915] Sc. Ct. Sess. 1020; Westminster Brymbo Coal, etc. Co. v. Evans [1916] W. C. & I. Rep. (Eng.) 241; Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 153 Pac. 24; In re Bowers (Ind.) 116 N. W. 933; State v. District Ct. (Minn.) 164 N. W. 585; Johansen v. Union Stock Yards Co. 99 Neb. 328, 156 N. W. 511; Shinnick v. Clover Farms Co. 169 App. Div. 236, 154 N. Y. S. 423, affirming order 90 Misc. 1, 152 N. Y. S. 649; DeVoe v. New York State Rys. 169 App. Div. 472, 155 N. Y. S. 12; Rist v. Larkin, 171 App. Div. 71, 156 N. Y. S. 875; Hiers v. Hull, 164 N. Y. S. 767; Fassig v. State (Ohio) 116 N. E. 104; Adams v. Iten Biscuit Co. (Okla.) 162 Pac. 938; Archibald v. Ott (W. Va.) 87 S. E. 791.

Nonoccupational Disease.

Where a workmen's compensation act provides for compensation for "injuries" or "personal injuries" incurred in the employment without requiring that the injury shall be "accidental" or "by accident," the term

"injury" or "personal injury" is generally held to include a nonoccupational disease arising out of the course of the employment without the intervention of an accidental injury. Hunnewell's Case, 220 Mass. 351, 107 N. Thus in Madden's Case, 222 Mass. 487, 111 N. E. 379, L.R.A.1916D 1000, wherein it appeared that the pre-existing heart disease of an employee was so aggravated by a strain sustained in the course of her work that she suffered an attack of angina pectoris and became incapacitated for work, the court said: "In this connection it is to be noted that there is no explicit provision for compensation for occupational disease as such. 'Personal injury' is the only ground for compensation. The legislative principal declared by the workmen's compensation act, to the test of which all cases arising under it must be subjected, is that whatever rightly is describable as a 'personal injury,' if received 'in the course of' and 'arising out of' the employment, becomes the basis for a claim. If the harm suffered by the employee in the case at bar had been received as the result of physical endeavor in striving to resist tortious conduct by the employer, or in merely being subjected to such conduct, there would be little doubt that recovery could be had in an action at law as for a 'personal injury' in the common-law sense of those words. Coleman v. New York, etc. R. Co. 106 Mass. 160, 178; Larson v. Boston El. R. Co. 212 Mass. 262, and cases collected; Wiemert v. Boston El. R. Co. 216 Mass. 598. Without undertaking to define 'personal injury' or to go beyond the requirements of the facts here presented, it is enough to say that the occurrence described by the dependent when she said 'she felt something give' and felt 'something else give way' accompanied by the symptoms of angina pectoris, may have been found to be a personal injury."

However, although the Massachusetts act has been held to cover occupational disease in a case discussed in the original note, in the case of In re Maggelet, 116 N. E. 972, wherein a cigar maker claimed compensation for alleged "occupational neurosis," the court in holding that compensation should not have been awarded said: "There is here no foundation for a finding that the employee sustained 'personal injury' which arose out of and in the course of his employment. 'Personal injury' as used in the workmen's compensation act, has been held to be more comprehensive than the 'personal injury by accident' of the English act. The cases which have arisen heretofore under our act have been of a different character from that here presented. . . . Poisoning always has been regarded as a tortious act in the nature of a personal injury, for which damages might be recovered in an action at law if other elements of liability are present. . . . The words 'personal injury' in their connection in this statute do not naturally lend themselves to a situation such as that here disclosed. The act relates to industrial conditions. It has to do with the employment of labor. The act affords no relief against general disease. It is not a scheme for health insurance. It deals only with personal injuries following as an immediate result from the employment as its direct cause. In general it was intended as in the nature of a substitute for actions of tort for personal injuries at common law and under the employer's liability act (Rev. Laws, c. 106) by employees against their employers. That is apparent from the provisions of part 1 of the workmen's compensation act as well as the legislative resolves and reports preceding its enactment. But, as has been pointed out, the act goes beyond those limits and includes such diseases as fairly may be termed personal injuries. The act does not mention disease or occupational disease. See St. 1913, c. 813, § 12. It awards compensation for disease when it rightly may be described as a personal injury. A disease of mind or body which arises in the course of employment, with nothing more, is not within the act. It must come from or be an injury, although that injury need not be a single definite act but may extend over a continuous period of time. Poisoning, blindness, pneumonia, or the giving way of heart muscle, all induced by the necessary exposure or exertion of the employment, fall within well recognized classes of personal injuries. On the other hand the gradual breaking down or degeneration of tissues caused by long and laborious work is not the result of a personal injury within the meaning of the act. A person may exhaust his physical or mental energies by exacting toil, and become unfit for further service, but he is not because of this entitled to compensation, for the reason that this condition cannot fairly be described as a personal injury. The disease must be, or be traceable directly to, a personal injury peculiar to the employment. A nervous condition dependent upon poor posture of the body in our opinion does not constitute a commonly known and well recognized personal injury consequent upon employment. It is difficult to establish and define a plain line of division between what is personal injury within the act on the one hand and simple disease on the other hand. But personal injury and disease are not synonymous. They are different in meaning. One does not include the other. They are classifications differing from each other in kind, although they may overlap in some instances. There is not enough in this record to show that the condition of the employee is a necessary result of his work. It arose on all the evidence from a bad posture of the body while at work. But there is nothing to show that this was a necessary incident of the employment. Scarcely anything is more difficult to control or influence than the position of the body of another. Whether one shall be erect or stooping of figure, whether the carriage of the person shall be lithe or stiff, whether the chest shall be narrow or broad and the place for the lungs correspondingly cramped or enlarged, whether breathing shall be deep and full, or short and impaired, depend in large degree upon the habit, temperament, and appreciation of the requisites of right living on the part of the individual. Interference on these matters by the employer might be regarded as an unwarranted impairment of personal privilege. There are few employments which if pursued without regard to the laws of health, and the requirements of correct method of life, may not invite some form of disease. This record is bare of any evidence to show that it is a reasonably necessary result of the employment that those following it should have neurosis or that the including proximate cause of that condition is the employment. This court has gone further than any other, so far as we are aware, in holding that poisoning, heart lesion and kindred physical ills may be found to be personal injuries under the act. The courts of other states of the Union, in construing workmen's compensation acts more or less similar to our own, have declined to follow In re Hurler, 217 Mass. 223, 104 N. E. 336, L.R.A.1918A 279, Ann. Cas. 1915C 919, and the principle there established, and have held that poisoning arising out of the employment through the inhalation of gases or other substance was not a personal injury under the act. . . . Nevertheless we remain content with our decisions in this particular. But the doctrine has not been established by these decisions that every disease caught by an employee in the course of his employment is a personal injury under the act. . . . It seems clear for these reasons that the present case cannot rightly be termed a personal injury within the meaning of those words in the act."

In Crowley's Case, 223 Mass. 288, 111 N. E. 786, the court in affirming a decree affirming an award of compensation said: "The city contends that no causal connection between the employee's injuries and his general condition of paresis, rendering him insane and requiring his commitment to an asylum, is shown by the record, and therefore that the decree should be reversed. In re McNicol, 215 Mass. 497. But the material evidence before the arbitration committee submitted without the introduction of further testimony to the industrial accident board upon review, warranted the findings, that the employee had a 'pre-existing constitutional disease, known as syphilis,' which, being dormant, left his ability to perform the arduous work for which he was hired unimpaired, and that, because of the nature of the accident arising out of and in the course of employment, his nervous system suffered a shock sufficiently severe to aggravate and accelerate this condition, until general paralysis or insanity resulted depriving him of all capacity for work in the future. The statute prescribes no standard of fitness to which the employee must conform, and compensation is not based on any implied warranty of perfect health or of immunity from latent and unknown tendencies to disease which may develop into positive ailments if incited to activity through any cause originating in the performance of the work for which he is hired. What the legislature might have said is one thing; what it has said is quite another thing; and in the application of the statute the cause of partial or total incapacity may spring from and be attributable to the injury just as much where undeveloped and dangerous physical conditions are set in motion producing such result, as where it follows directly from dislocations or dismemberments or from internal organic changes capable of being exactly located."

In Hunnewell's Case, 220 Mass. 351, 107 N. E. 934, the court said: "The physical injury to the eye of the employee in the case at bar was slight and he soon recovered from it completely so far as concerned harm to the organ itself. But the arbitration committee found that 'the injury to the eye caused a nervous upset and a neurotic condition which is purely functional.' The industrial accident board found that he was 'partially incapacitated for work by reason of a condition of hysterical blindness and neurosis, said condition having a causal relation with the personal injury.' These findings, which seem to be identical in substance, were warranted by the evidence. Apparently he did not have sufficient will power to throw off this condition and go to work as his physical capacity amply warranted him in doing. But such a condition resulting from a battery is an injury for which a tortfeasor would be liable in damages. . . . The same principle applies to injuries flowing as a proximate result from an actual physical impact received by an employee under the act in the course of and arising out of his employment."

In Sponatski's Case, 220 Mass. 526, 108 N. E. 466, L.R.A.1916A 333, it appeared that an employee while at work received an injury from a splash of molten lead and subsequently while insane threw himself from a window and was fatally injured. The court said: "The circumstances of the leap from the window as narrated by all the eyewitnesses, point rather to ungovernable lunacy than to the volition even of a diseased mind. The finding in this respect, although hanging on a rather slender thread of evidence, is not unsupported. Therefore it must stand. This decision rests upon the rule established in Daniels v. New York, etc. R. Co. [183 Mass. 393], supra. That rule applies to cases arising under the workmen's compensation act. It is that where there follows as the direct result of a physical injury an insanity of such violence as to cause the victim to take his own life through an uncontrollable impulse or in a delirium of frenzy 'without conscious volition to produce death, having knowledge of the physical nature and consequences of the act,' then there is a direct and unbroken causal connection between the physical injury and the death. But where the resulting insanity is such as to cause suicide through a voluntary wilful choice determined by a moderately intelligent mental power which knows the purpose and the physical effect of the suicidal act even though choice is dominated and ruled by a disordered mind, then there is a new and independent agency which breaks the chain of causation arising from the injury. . . . The obligation to pay compensation under the workmen's compensation act equally is absolute when the fact is established that the injury has arisen 'out of and in the course of' the employment. Part II, sec. 1. It is of no significance whether the precise physical harm was the natural and probable or the abnormal and inconceivable consequence of the employment. The single inquiry is whether in truth it did arise out of and in the course of that employment. If death ensues, it is immaterial whether that was the reasonable and likely consequence or not; the only question is whether in fact death 'results from the injury.' Part II, sec. 6. When that is established as the cause, then the right to compensation is made out. If the connection between the injury as the cause and the death as the effect is proven, then the dependents are entitled to recover even though such a result before that time may never have been heard of and might have seemed impossible. The inquiry relates solely to the chain of causation between the injury and the death."

In Walsh's Case, 227 Mass. 341, 116 N. E. 496, the court said: "We are of the opinion that subsequent insanity does not deprive an employee of compensation due him under the provisions of the workmen's compensation act. Indeed the effect of subsequent insanity and the only effect of it is to make greater the employee's need to have that compensation which apart from the subsequent disability justice required the employer to pay him."

In McPhee's Case, 222 Mass. 1, 109 N. E. 633, the court said: "The inhalation of damp smoke and drenching with water resulting in lobar pneumonia might have been found to have been a 'personal injury' within St. 1911, c. 751, Part II, sec. 1."

In McManaman's Case, 224 Mass. 554, 113 N. E. 287, which was an appeal from an award in favor of a longshoreman who froze both hands while at work, it appeared that the award was made upon the theory that the employee's work in unloading vessels exposed him to greater danger of personal injury by frostbite than the ordinary person or outdoor worker. The supreme court declined to disturb the award, saying: "In his argument counsel for the insurer has pointed out that the bags of fabric were not cold; that the petitioner's hands would be but little closed when he handled them; that after he had pushed the truck off the boat his hands were free while he was walking back to get another load and that he had ample opportunity to swing his arms and keep up his circulation at that time. All these were matters proper to be urged upon the board and to be considered by them in passing upon the question of fact upon which they had to pass. But they are not matters which are decisive of the question of law which we have to decide, namely, whether on the evidence as a whole the board were warranted in finding (as they did find) that the petitioner was exposed to 'materially greater danger and likelihood of getting frozen than the ordinary person or outdoor worker on the date' in question. Although the question is a close one, we are of opinion on the whole that the evidence before the board warranted the finding made by them."

Occupational Disease.

According to one recent case the term "injury" or "personal injury" as used in a workmen's compensation act does not cover occupational diseases. Industrial Commission v. Brown, 92 Ohio St. 309, 110 N. E. 744, L.R.A.1916A 1277, wherein, in holding that a Workmen's Compensation Law did not include lead poisoning an occupational disease, the court said: "The particular question involved in the instant case is whether the words 'personal injuries sustained in the course of employment' as used in the Workmen's Compensation Law, approved June 15, 1911 (102 O. L. 524), include lead poisoning contracted in course of employment. The defendant in error was employed in August, 1913, by the Eagle White Lead Co. of Cincinnati, such company being at the time a voluntary contributor to the state insurance fund. While thus employed Brown contracted lead poisoning of so serious a nature that he became sick and disabled from work. . . . The question is one of paramount public importance, not only to the industrial classes but to the state as well. The state has been administering this great trust for nearly four years, and during all that period the construction given the statute under consideration by the administrative body has been such as to preclude recovery for occupational disease, or any disease for that matter, incurred in the course of employment. For while the disease under consideration was clearly occupational, yet if the claim of Brown to participate in the fund be sustained, it would at once open wide the doors to all claimants who have suffered from disease of any sort which they may have incurred while employed. The premium rates assessed and collected by the administering board during this period of time have been fixed on a basis of death and injuries by accident solely, to the entire exclusion of injury through disease. It is quite patent that any other construction would necessitate an immediate and striking horizontal elevation of all premium rates and would in all probability prove a serious menace to the law itself. Administrative interpretation of a given law, while not conclusive, is, if long continued, to be reckoned with most seriously and is not to be disregarded and set aside unless judicial construction makes it imperative so to do. This might be said to be particularly true of laws of the nature and character of the one under consideration. The state has entered on a virgin field, not wholly without chart or compass, it is true, yet without much in the way of experience to light the way. In a large measure Ohio may be said to be the pioneer in working out and reducing to a working basis the theories of workmen's compensation. No statute enacted in these latter days has had to encounter so fierce and powerful an opposition as this particular class of legislation. The law is yet on trial. It has to justify itself for its maintenance before the bar of public opinion. To seriously cripple it by a construction that could readily be defended from a legal standpoint, and that would at the same time be held to the more humane interpretation, would in the long run work great injury to the industrial class as a whole. An injustice would likewise be done to the employers of Ohio, who alone are contributing the millions that go to make up the fund. Courts will take judicial notice of the events going to make up the history of a state as well as the transactions and objects intimately connected with it. Why, then, should this court, contrary to the general knowledge possessed by the people of Ohio, blind itself to the real situation and content itself with a mere abstract construction of what might be included in the phrase 'personal injuries,' realizing all the while that to grant the enlarged construction sought by the defendant in error would put in peril the splendid efforts that have been exerted by the public servants of Ohio, with much travail of soul, to provide compensation with promptness and certainty to the unfortunates killed or wounded in their battle for existence? This court, with much show of logic and also authority, could construe this phrase as did the courts below. It is no difficult matter to bring within the purview of the words 'personal injuries sustained in the course of employment' occupational diseases incurred in course of employment. It can be further conceded that had the legislature, in enacting either the original or the present law, desired to make plain its intention to exclude occupational disease from participation in the fund, the exclusion could readily have been made by adding to the words 'personal injuries' the qualifying phrase 'by accident.' As against all this the court feels impelled to follow both the executive and legislative construction of the word 'injury' as employed in this act and to limit recovery of compensation to such as may have suffered injury otherwise than through disease, thereby giving to the legislative and executive construction the added force of judicial construction."

Under Connecticut Act.

The decisions under the Connecticut workmen's compensation act hold in effect that a "personal injury" within the meaning of the act involves both an accident and a personal injury therefrom as distinguished from a disease, but includes the effect of an accidental injury which either superinduces a disease or aggravates an existing disease. Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 90 Conn. 303, 97 Atl. 320; Miller v. American Steel, etc. Co. 90 Conn. 349, 97 Atl. 345; Hartz v. Hartford Faience Co. 90 Conn. 539, 97 Atl. 1020; Linnane v. Aetna Brewing Co. 91 Conn. 158, 99 Atl. 509, L.R.A.1917D 77. Thus in Hartz v. Hartford Faience Co. supra, it appeared that a shipping clerk suffered a strain while lifting or attempting to lift a barrel. In holding that he was entitled to compensation the court said: "By the terms of our compensation act, compensation is not made to depend upon the condition of health of the employee, or upon his freedom from liability to injury through a constitutional weakness or latent tendency. It is awarded for a personal injury 'arising out of and in the course of his employment,' and for an injury which is a hazard of that employment. As Chief Justice Rugg points out in Madden's Case, 222 Mass. 487, 494, 111 N. E. 382, 'it is the hazard of the employment acting upon the particular employee in his condition of health and not what the hazard would be if acting upon a healthy employee or upon the average employee.' Whatever predisposing physical condition may exist, if the employment is the immediate occasion of the injury, it arises out of the employment because it develops within it. When the exertion of the employment acts upon the weakened condition of the body of the employee, or upon an employee predisposed to suffer injury, in such way that a personal injury results, the injury must be said to arise out of the employment. An employee may be suffering from heart disease, aneurism, hernia, as was Mr. Hartz, or other ailment, and the exertion of the employment may develop his condition in such a manner that it becomes a personal injury. The employee is then entitled to recover for all consequences attributable to the injury. The acceleration or aggravation of a pre-existing ailment may therefore be a personal injury within our act: and the test may well be that suggested by Lord Loreburn in Clover, Clayton & Co. v. Hughes, L. R. (1910) App. Cas. 242: Did the ailment develop the injury, or did the employment develop it in any material degree? If it did, the injury arose out of the employment."

In Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 90 Conn. 303, 97 Atl. 320, it appeared that an insurance solicitor and collector while engaged in his usual employment froze his nose and the tissues adjacent thereto which produced a lesion of the skin and surface tissues. The court said: "The first question for decision is whether the frostbite of the decedent was a personal injury 'arising out of and in the course of his employment.' Public Acts of 1913, chap. 138, Part B, sec. 1. The suggestion was made in argument, although not greatly pressed, that 'personal injury' under our statute refers merely to accidental injury. The case does not at this time require us to pass upon the question whether the term 'personal injury' in our act includes disease as well as accident. Upon all authority, if it refers merely to accident, it must include the consequences of accident, whether a development of the injury through derangement of the physical structure of the body, or of a disease from the accident. The finding shows that unusual exposure of the decedent to the weather, due to his employment, caused a frostbite producing lesions of the face, through which the germ erysipelas entered and the disease erysipelas developed. We think the lesion, whether produced by a frostbite or a blow, must be held to be a 'personal injury' within the act. In either case, the injury would be the result of an untoward mishap. If the term 'personal injury' be given its narrowest construction and confined to injuries of accidental origin, it must be held to include any form of bodily harm or incapacity, whether arising by direct contact, or lesion caused by external violence or physical force, or untoward mishap. . . . An attempt to frame an all-embracing definition so as to include all injuries arising in the course of one's employment, would probably prove its inadequacy under the changing conditions of time. In a general way, sufficient for this case, and perhaps helpful in the consideration of other cases, we may say that an injury to an employee is said to arise in the course of his employment when it occurs within the period of his employment, at a place where he may reasonably be, and while he is reasonably fulfilling the duties of his employment, or engaged in doing something incidental to it. 'In the course of' points to the place and circumstances under which the accident takes place and the time when it occurred."

In Miller v. American Steel, etc. Co. 90 Conn. 349, 97 Atl. 345, it appeared that a workman's incapacity resulted from a gradual process of lead poisoning arising out of his employment which could not be traced to any fortuitous or unexpected event which could be located in point of time and place, and which was not the result of a lesion produced by external violence or internal strain. In holding that the term "personal injuries" did not include occupational diseases, the court said: "The record, therefore, does not present the question whether our workmen's compensation act gives compensation for death or incapacity resulting from disease caused by accidental injury. It presents the very different question whether our compensation system includes occupational diseases as well as industrial accidents. More specifically, the question is whether the words 'personal injury . . . arising out of and in the course of his employment,' in our act, were intended by the general assembly to cover disease arising out of and in the course of the employment. There is no reference whatever to disease in our act, and although the case nominally turns upon the proper construction of the single word 'injury,' the real issue is whether the important subject-matter of industrial diseases shall be introduced by judicial construction into a statute which does not mention the subject, or contain any provisions for dealing with the problems peculiar to that subject. . . . Thus, among what may be called the doubtful states, the preponderance of opinion, so far as any has yet been expressed, seems to be against importing occupational diseases into workmen's compensation acts by the process of judicial construction. Turning now to the history of our own act, the first affirmative action taken by the general assembly was the passage of a resolution in 1911 providing for the appointment of a commission 'to investigate and report to the next session of the general assembly upon the legality, advisability, and practicability of establishing a state insurance department, or other form of state insurance, as a means for providing compensation for workmen and others injured through accidents occurring in industrial occupations.' The commission appointed pursuant to this resolution presented its report, entitled 'The Report of the Connecticut State Commission on Compensation for Industrial Accidents, to the General Assembly of 1913,' and the bill recommended by the commission was limited to compensation for 'personal injuries from any accident arising out of and in the course of his employment.' Several other bills, including one representing the views of the association of manufacturers, and another the views of the state federation of labor, were presented to the general assembly. None of them made any reference to occupational disease, and in the course of many days of committee hearings reported and filed with the state librarian, we find no reference to occupational disease and none appears in the bill as finally adopted or in the amendments of 1915. It follows that if we construe the act, as covering compensation for death or incapacity arising from occupational disease we shall introduce into it a most important subject, which, so far as we can ascertain from the public documents, was not considered by the legislature in this connection. In fact the economic importance of the inclusion of disease in an act which contains no special provisions on the subject, can hardly be estimated. In the absence of any definition of occupational disease, the act would include all diseases arising out of and in the course of the employment, and the word injury, if it includes the contraction of disease includes also the aggravation of disease. So construed, our act might almost be said to give compensation for the common fate of all who work because they must. The result would be to increase very greatly the cost of compensation insurance, and might either discourage the acceptance of the act by employers or make it difficult for any but the young and strong to obtain employment. It may be added that in Germany, and so far as we know, in other countries where a comprehensive scheme of workmen's sickness insurance is in force, the workman is required to contribute toward the cost of the insurance. We ought not to import into the act by construction a subject-matter carrying such possible consequences, unless convinced that the general assembly, notwithstanding its omission to refer to the subject, actually intended to include it. It seems more reasonable to suppose that in framing an elective system of compensation for the employer and the employee to accept or reject, the general assembly should attempt to state the essential conditions of the bargain in terms, so that the parties could understand the consequences of their election. And when we find in such a statute, and in the legislative proceedings leading to its adoption, no mention of so important a subject as industrial sickness insurance, the reasonable inference is that the general assembly probably did not intend to include the cost of such insurance in the proposition which it submitted to employers for their acceptance. This seems still more probable, because it appears from chapter 14 of the Public Acts of 1913, p. 1634, entitled 'An Act concerning Reports of Occupational Diseases,' that the general assembly had the subject of occupational disease under consideration at the very time when the workmen's compensation act was pending before it; and the action which it took in respect of that subject was to require physicians to report cases, not to the compensation commissioner of the district, but to the commissioner of the bureau of labor statistics. This would indicate that the general assembly intended to deal separately and at some future time with the subject of occupational disease. . . . It cannot make any substantial difference in the construction of the term 'injury' as used in that context, whether the words 'by accident' are inserted or omitted. This is the crucial point in the literal interpretation of our act. The injury to be compensated is not defined except by the words 'such injury,' meaning as the context says, a personal injury arising out of and in the course of the employment in respect of which the employer is exempted from actions for damages in case of the mutual acceptance by employer and employee of Part B; and in respect of which he is to be deprived of his so-called common-law defenses unless he does accept Part B. The point is not merely a verbal one. The act is in form elective. In Part A it takes away the employer's common-law defenses, and in Part B it offers him a compensation scheme whose disadvantages are more or less nicely balanced against the alternative of facing common-law actions for damages with a crippled defense. It was quite to be expected that the compensation scheme should cover the same ground as the common-law action for damages, and the language of the act was, we think, plainly intended to accomplish that result. Since the common-law action for damages, which was founded on the master's negligence, never attempted to cover the typical case of an occupational disease caused by continual exposure to the ordinary and known risks of the employment, the inference is plain that the alternative compensation scheme was not intended to cover such diseases. As already pointed out, the act, because of its entire omission to refer to the subject, must include all diseases arising out of and in the course of the employment, or none. And if it was not intended to cover the typical occupational disease, it was clearly not intended to cover any except such as are the direct result or natural consequence of an accidental injury."

In Linnane v. Aetna Brewing Co. 91 Conn. 158, 99 Atl. 507, L.R.A.1917D 77, it appeared that a brewery fireman became exhausted from the combined effects of walking to work through deep snow and extra work in wet clothing. Subsequently he contracted a severe cold and pneumonia from which he died.

Ann. Cas. 1918B.—24.

In holding that the decedent did not sustain a "personal injury" entitling him to compensation, the court said: "The claimant's brief correctly states that this case presents two questions of law: first, whether the decedent sustained a 'personal injury' within the meaning of the statute; the second, whether it arose 'out of and in the course of his employment.' In our opinion the first question is decisive of the case, and it must be answered in the light of two recent decisions of this court. Miller v. American Steel, etc. Co. 90 Conn. 349, 97 Atl. 345, and Larke v. John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. 90 Conn. 303, 97 Atl. 320. The Miller case decides that our compensation act does not award compensation for death or incapacity due to disease, unless the disease is the direct result or natural consequence of an accidental bodily injury. This decision covers in principle not only occupational diseases arising from exposure to the normal conditions of the employment, but also diseases arising from accidental exposure to abnormal conditions of employment; and that it was so intended is obvious from the general tenor of the opinion as well as from several specific statements to that effect, of which we quote the following from page 351: 'The record, therefore, does not present the question whether our workmen's compensation act gives compensation for death or incapacity resulting from disease caused by accidental injury. It presents the very different question whether our compensation system includes occupational diseases as well as industrial accidents. More specifically, the question is whether the words "personal injury . . . arising out of and in the course of his employment," in our act, were intended by the general assembly to cover disease arising out of and in the course of the employment.' And again, on page 360 it said: 'As already pointed out, the act, because of its entire omission to refer to the subject, must include all diseases arising out of and in the course of the employment, or none. And, if it was not intended to cover the typical occupational disease, it was clearly not intended to cover any except such as are the direct result or natural consequence of an accidental injury.' In the Larke case it was held that a frostbite was a personal injury within the act, and that compensation was properly awarded to the dependent claimant in that case for the death of her husband from erysipelas which was found to be a direct result of the frostbite. In that case it was said that the term personal injury, when confined to injuries of an accidental origin, 'must be held to include any form of bodily harm or incapacity, whether arising by direct contact, or lesion caused by external violence or physical force, or untoward mishap.' Taking the two cases together, their effect is that reasonably be, and while he is reasonably fulfilling the duties of his employment, or engaged in doing something incidental to it. 'In the course of' points to the place and circumstances under which the accident takes place and the time when it occurred."

In Miller v. American Steel, etc. Co. 90 Conn. 349, 97 Atl. 345, it appeared that a workman's incapacity resulted from a gradual process of lead poisoning arising out of his employment which could not be traced to any fortuitous or unexpected event which could be located in point of time and place, and which was not the result of a lesion produced by external violence or internal strain. Ann. Cas. 1918B.—24.

In holding that the decedent did not sustain a "personal injury" entitling him to compensation, the court said: "The claimant's brief correctly states that this case presents two questions of law: first, whether the decedent sustained a 'personal injury' within the meaning of the statute; the second, whether it arose 'out of and in the course of his employment.' The Miller case decides that our compensation act does not award compensation for death or incapacity due to disease, unless the disease is the direct result or natural consequence of an accidental bodily injury. More specifically, the question is whether the words "personal injury . . . arising out of and in the course of his employment," in our act, were intended by the general assembly to cover disease arising out of and in the course of the employment.' And again, on page 360 it said: 'As already pointed out, the act, because of its entire omission to refer to the subject, must include all diseases arising out of and in the course of the employment, or none. And, if it was not intended to cover the typical occupational disease, it was clearly not intended to cover any except such as are the direct result or natural consequence of an accidental injury.' In the Larke case it was held that a frostbite was a personal injury within the act, and that compensation was properly awarded to the dependent claimant in that case for the death of her husband from erysipelas which was found to be a direct result of the frostbite. In that case it was said that the term personal injury, when confined to injuries of an accidental origin, 'must be held to include any form of bodily harm or incapacity, whether arising by direct contact, or lesion caused by external violence or physical force, or untoward mishap.' Taking the two cases together, their effect is that Sergeant at Arms or House of Representatives, defendant. Judgment for defendant. Relator appeals. The facts are stated in the opinion. REVERSED.

Charles P. Spooner, Jesse O. Adkins and John C. Spooner for appellant.

D-Cady Herrick, Martin W. Littleton and Henry M. Goldfogle for appellee.

[530] WHITE, C. J.—These are the facts: A member of the House of Representatives on the floor charged the appellant, who was the [531] district attorney of the Southern District of New York, with many acts of misfeasance and nonfeasance. When this was done the grand jury in the Southern District of New York was engaged in investigating alleged illegal conduct of the member in relation to the Sherman Anti-trust Law and asserted illegal activities of an organization known as Labor's National Peace Council to which the member belonged. The investigation as to the latter subject not having been yet reported upon by the grand jury, that body found an indictment against the member for a violation of the Sherman law. Subsequently calling attention to his previous charges and stating others, the member requested that the judiciary committee be directed to inquire and report concerning the charges against the appellant in so far as they constituted impeachable offenses. After the adoption of this resolution a subcommittee was appointed which proceeded to New York to take testimony. Friction there arose between the subcommittee and the office of the district attorney based upon the assertion that the subcommittee was seeking to unlawfully penetrate the proceedings of the grand jury relating to the indictment and the investigations in question. In a daily newspaper an article appeared charging that the writer was informed that the subcommittee was endeavoring rather to investigate and frustrate the action of the grand jury than to investigate the conduct of the district attorney. When called upon by the subcommittee to disclose the name of his informant the writer declined to do so and proceedings for contempt of the House were threatened. The district attorney thereupon addressed a letter to the chairman of the subcommittee avowing that he was the informant referred to in the article, averring that the charges were true and repeating them in amplified form in language which was certainly unparliamentary and manifestly ill-tempered and which was well calculated to arouse the indignation not only of the members of the [532] subcommittee but of those of the House generally. This letter was given to the press so that it might be published contemporaneously with its receipt by the chairman of the subcommittee. The judiciary committee reported the matter to the House and a select committee was appointed to consider the subject. The district attorney was called before that committee and re-asserted the charges made in the letter, averring that they were justified by the circumstances and stating that they would under the same conditions be made again. Thereupon the select committee made a report and stated its conclusions and recommendations to the House as follows:

"We conclude and find that the aforesaid letter written and published by said H. Snowden Marshall to Hon. C. C. Carlin, chairman of the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, on March 4, 1916 . . . , is as a whole and in several of the separate sentences defamatory and insulting and tends to bring the House into public contempt and ridicule, and that the said H. Snowden Marshall, by writing and publishing the same, is guilty of contempt of the House of Representatives of the United States because of the violation of its privileges, its honor and its dignity."

Upon the adoption of this report under the authority of the House a formal warrant for arrest was issued and its execution by the Sergeant-at-Arms in New York was followed by an application for discharge on habeas corpus and the correctness of the judgment of the court below refusing the same is the matter before us on this direct appeal.

Whether the House had power under the Constitution to deal with the conduct of the district attorney in writing the letter as a contempt of its authority and to inflict punishment upon the writer for such contempt as a matter of legislative power, that is, without subjecting him to the [533] statutory modes of trial provided for criminal offenses protected by the limitations and safeguards which the Constitution imposes as to such subject, is the question which is before us. There is unity between the parties only in one respect, that is, that the existence of constitutional power is the sole matter to be decided. As to all else there is entire discord, every premise of law or authority relied upon by the one side being challenged in some respects by the other. We consider, therefore, that the shortest way to meet and dispose of the issue is to treat the subject as one of first impression, and we proceed to do so.

Undoubtedly what went before the adoption of the Constitution may be resorted to for the purpose of throwing light on its provisions. Certain is it that authority was possessed by the House of Commons in England to punish for contempt directly, that is, without the intervention of courts, and that such power included a variety of acts and many forms of punishment including the right to fix a prolonged term of imprisonment. Indubitable also is it, however, that this power rested upon an assumed blending of legislative and judicial authority possessed by the Parliament when the Lords and Commons were one and continued to operate after the division of the Parliament into two houses either because the interblended power was thought to continue to reside in the Commons, or by the force of routine the mere reminiscence of the commingled powers led to a continued exercise of the wide authority as to contempt formerly existing long after the foundation of judicial-legislative power upon which it rested had ceased to exist. That this exercise of the right of legislative-judicial power to exert the authority stated prevailed in England at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and for some time after has been so often recognized by the decided cases relied upon and by decisions of this court, some of which are in the [534] margin,¹ as to make it too certain for anything but statement.

Clear also is it, however, that in the state governments prior to the formation of the Constitution the incompatibility of the intermixture of the legislative and judicial power was recognized and the duty of separating the two was felt, as was manifested by provisions contained in some of the state constitutions enacted prior to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, as illustrated by the following articles in the constitutions of Maryland and Massachusetts.

"That the House of Delegates may punish, by imprisonment, any person who shall be guilty of a contempt in their view, by any disorderly or riotous behavior, or by threats to, or abuse of their members, or by any obstruction to their proceedings. They may also punish, by imprisonment, any person who shall be guilty of a breach of privilege, by arresting on civil process, or by assaulting any of their members, during their sitting, or on their way to, or return from the House of Delegates, or by any assault of, or obstruction to their officers, in the execution of any order or process, or by assaulting or obstructing any witness, or any other person, attending on, or on their way to or from the House, or by rescuing any person committed by the House: and the Senate may exercise the same power, in similar cases." Constitution of Maryland, 1776, Article XII.

"They [the house of representatives] shall have authority to punish by imprisonment every person, not a member, who shall be guilty of disrespect to the house, by any disorderly or contemptuous behavior in its presence; or who, in the town where the general court is sitting, and during the time of its sitting, shall threaten harm to the [535] body or estate of any of its members, for anything said or done in the house; or who shall assault any of them therefor; or who shall assault or arrest any witness, or other person, ordered to attend the house, in his way in going or returning; or who shall rescue any person arrested by the order of the house.

"And no member of the house of representatives shall be arrested, or held to bail on meane process, during his going unto, returning from, or his attending the general assembly.

"The senate shall have the same powers in the like cases; and the governor and council shall have the same authority to punish in like cases: Provided, That no imprisonment, on the warrant or order of the governor, council, senate, or house of representatives, for either of the above-described offenses, be for a term exceeding thirty days." Constitution of Massachusetts, 1780, part second, chapter 1, § 3, Articles X and XI.

The similarity of the provisions points to the identity of the evil which they were intended to reach. Clearly they operate to destroy the admixture of judicial and legislative power as prevailing in the House of Commons since the provisions in both the state constitutions and the limitations accompanying them are wholly incompatible with judicial authority. Moreover, as under state constitutions all governmental power not denied is possessed, the provisions were clearly not intended to give legislative power as such, for full legislative power to deal with the enumerated acts as criminal offenses and provide for their punishment accordingly already obtained. The object, therefore, of the provisions could only have been to recognize the right of the legislative power to deal with the particular acts without reference to their violation of the criminal law and their susceptibility of being punished under that law because of the necessity of such a legislative authority to prevent or punish the acts independently [536] because of the destruction of legislative power which would arise from such acts if such authority was not possessed.

How dominant these views were can be measured by the fact that in various other States almost contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution similar provisions were written into their constitutions and continued to be adopted until it is true to say that they became if not universal, certainly largely predominant in the States.*

No power was expressly conferred by the Constitution of the United States on the subject except that given to the House to deal with contempt committed by its own members. Article I, § 5, 8 Fed. St. Ann. 326. As the rule concerning the Constitution of the United States is that powers not delegated were reserved to the people or the States, it follows that no other express authority to deal with contempt can be conceived of. It comes then to this, was such an authority implied from the powers granted? As it is unthinkable that in any case from a power expressly granted there can be implied the authority to destroy the grant made, and as the possession by Congress of the commingled legislative-judicial authority as to contempts which was exerted in the House of Commons would be absolutely destructive of the distinction between legislative, executive and judicial authority which is interwoven in the very fabric of the Constitution and would disregard express limitations therein, it must follow that there is no ground whatever for assuming that any implication as to such a power may be deduced from any grant of authority made to Congress by the Constitution. This conclusion has long since been [537] authoritatively settled and is not open to be disputed. Anderson v. Dunn, 6 Wheat. 204, 5 U. S. (L. ed.) 242; Kilbourn v. Thompson, 103 U. S. 168, 26 U. S. (L. ed.) 377. Whether the right to deal with contempt in the limited way provided in the state constitutions may be implied in Congress as the result of the legislative power granted, must depend upon how far such limited power is ancillary or incidental to the power granted to Congress,—a subject which we shall hereafter approach.

The rule of constitutional interpretation announced in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 4 U. S. (L. ed.) 579, that that which was reasonably appropriate and relevant to the exercise of a granted power was to be considered as accompanying the grant, has been so universally applied that it suffices merely to state it. And as there is nothing in the inherent nature of the power to deal with contempt which causes it to be an exception to such rule, there can be no reason for refusing to apply it to that subject.

Thus in Anderson v. Dunn, supra, which was an action for false imprisonment against the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House for having executed a warrant for arrest issued by that body in a contempt proceeding, after holding
